Publishers' Note

For a quarter of a century, more or less, there has been increasing difficulty in obtaining a full set of law reports. Even if one could find a set and afford the cost on the second hand market, there was yet another stumbling block in the way of the practitioner—the problem of shelf space.

Butterworths claim to have solved the problem by publishing the All England Law Reports Reprint. Working backwards from 1935 (the All England Law Reports are available from 1936 onwards) they are reprinting from the Law Times Reports, which commenced in 1843, a large and carefully selected number of "living cases". The Reprint contains some 4,000 cases after the dead wood has been cut out. The Editor has revised and annotated as he went along, but the judgments, of course, remain unaltered.

The selection of "living cases" is based principally on those cases referred to twice or more in the All England Law Reports since 1936, but the Editor, as a result of many years' experience, has added a number of other cases which he feels may be required by the practitioner from time to time, though they have been less frequently referred to.

By this means, together with their All England Law Reports, Butterworths are providing ready access to cases covering the past 115 years.

WOOLMINGTON v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Sankey, L.C., Lord Hewart, C.J., Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, and Lord Wright), April 4, 5, May 13, 1935]

[Reported [1935] A.C. 462; 104 L.J.K.B. 433; 153 L.T. 232; 51 T.L.R. 446; 79 Sol. Jo. 401; 25 Cr. App. Rep. 72; 30 Cox C.C. 234]

Criminal Law—Murder—Burden of proof—Defence of accident.

On a charge of murder it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt subject to the defence of insanity and any statutory exception. If, at the end and on the whole of the case, there is a reasonable doubt, created by the evidence given by either the prosecution or the prisoner, whether the prisoner killed the deceased with a malicious intention, the prosecution has not made out the case and the prisoner is entitled to an acquittal. When dealing with a murder case the Crown must prove (a) death as the result of a voluntary act of the accused, and (b) malice of the accused. It is not correct to say that once the prosecution have proved that the deceased person died through an act of the prisoner that is presumed to be murder unless the prisoner can satisfy the jury that what happened was something which could be reduced to manslaughter, or was accidental, or could be justified.

Appeal from the Court of Criminal Appeal (AVORY, LAWRENCE and GREAVES-LORD, JJ.) under a certificate given by the Attorney-General under s. 1 (6) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907.

The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SANKEY, L.C.

T. J. O'Connor, K.C., and Casswell for the appellant.

Trapnell, K.C., and Reginald Knight for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

May 13. LORD SANKEY, L.C.—The appellant, Reginald Woolmington, after a trial at the Somerset Assizes at Taunton on Jan. 23, 1935, at which, after an absence of one hour and twenty-five minutes, the jury disagreed, was convicted at the Bristol Assizes on Feb. 14 of the wilful murder of his wife on Dec. 10, 1934, and was sentenced to death. He appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeal, substantially upon the ground that the learned judge had misdirected the jury by telling them that in the circumstances of the case he was presumed in law to be guilty of the murder unless he could satisfy the jury that his wife's death was due to an accident.

The appeal came before the Court of Criminal Appeal upon Mar. 8 and was dismissed. The court said that "it may be that it would have been better" had the learned judge who tried the case said to the jury that if they entertained reasonable doubt whether they could accept his explanation they should either acquit him altogether or convict him of manslaughter only, but, relying upon s. 4 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, which provides > "that the court may, notwithstanding they are of opinion that the point raised in the appeal might be decided in favour of the appellant, dismiss the appeal if they consider no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred," they dismissed the appeal.

Thereupon the Attorney-General gave his fiat certifying that the appeal of Reginald Woolmington involved a point of law of exceptional public importance, and that, in his opinion, it was desirable in the public interest that a further appeal should be brought. The matter now comes before your Lordships' House.

The facts are as follows: Reginald Woolmington is twenty-one-and-a-half years old. His wife, who was killed, was seventeen-and-a-half years old last December. They had known each other for some time and upon Aug. 25 they were married. Upon Oct. 14 she gave birth to a child. Shortly after that there appears to have been some quarrelling between them, and she left him upon Nov. 22 and went to live with her mother. Woolmington, apparently, was anxious to get her to come back, but she did not come. The prosecution proved that at about 9.15 in the morning of Dec. 10 Mrs. Daisy Brine was hanging out her washing at the back of her house at 25 Newtown, Milborne Port. While she was engaged in that occupation, she heard voices from the next door house, No. 24. She knew that in that house her niece, Reginald Woolmington's wife, was living. She heard and could recognise the voice of Reginald Woolmington saying something to the effect: "Are you going to come back home?" She could not hear the answer. Then the back door in No. 24 was slammed. She heard a voice in the kitchen, but could not tell what it said. Then she heard the sound of a gun. Upon that she looked out of the front window and she saw Reginald Woolmington, whose voice she had heard just before speaking in the kitchen, go out and get upon his bicycle which had been left or was standing against the wall of her house, No. 25. She called out to him, but he gave no reply. He looked at her hard and then he rode away.

According to Reginald Woolmington's own story, having brooded over and deliberated upon the position all through the night of Dec. 9, he went on the morning of the 10th in the usual way to the milking at his employer's farm and while milking conceived this idea, that he would take the old gun which was in the barn and he would take it up that morning to his wife's mother's house where she was living and that he would show her that gun and tell her that he was going to commit suicide if she did not come back. He would take the gun up for the purpose of frightening her into coming back to him by causing her to think that he was going to commit suicide. He finished his milking, went back to his father's house, had breakfast, and then left, taking with him a hack-saw. He returned to the farm, went into the barn, got the gun which had been used for rook shooting, sawed off the barrels of it, then took the only two cartridges which were there and put them into the gun. He took the two pieces of the barrel which he had sawn off and the hack-saw, crossed a field about 60 yds. wide and dropped them into the brook. Having done that, he returned on his bicycle with the gun in his overcoat pocket to his father's house and changed his clothes. Then he got a piece of wire flex which he attached to the gun so that he could suspend it from his shoulder underneath his coat and so went off to the house where his wife was living. He knocked at the door, went into the kitchen and asked her: "Are you coming back?" She made no answer. She came into the parlour, and on his asking her whether she would come back she replied she was going into service. He then, so he says, threatened he would shoot himself and went on to show her the gun and brought it across his waist, when it somehow went off and his wife fell down and he went out of the house. He told the jury that it was an accident, that it was a pure accident—that while he was getting the gun from under his shoulder and was drawing it across his breast it accidentally went off and he was doing nothing unlawful, nothing wrong, and this was a pure accident. There was considerable controversy whether a letter in which he set out his grievances was written before or after the above events. But when he was arrested at 7.30 on the evening of the 10th and charged with having committed murder he said: "I want to say nothing except I done, I done it. They can do what they like with me; it was jealousy I suppose. Her mother enticed her away from me. I done all I can to get her back. That's all."

The learned judge in summing up the case to the jury said:

> "If you accept his evidence, you will have little doubt that she died in consequence of a gunshot wound which was inflicted by a gun which he had taken to this house, and which was in his hands, or in his possession, at the time that it exploded. If you come to the conclusion that she died in consequence of injuries from the gun which he was carrying, you are put by the law of this country into this position: 'The killing of a human being is homicide, however he may be killed, and all homicide is presumed to be malicious and murder, unless the contrary appears from circumstances of alleviation, excuse, or justification. In every charge of murder, the fact of the killing being first proved, all the circumstances of accident, necessity, or infirmity are to be satisfactorily proved by the prisoner, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him, for the law will presume that the attack would be founded in malice unless the contrary be shown.' That has been the law of this country for all time since we had law. Once it is shown to a jury that somebody has died through the act of another, that is presumed to be murder, > unless the person who has been guilty of the act which causes the death can satisfy a jury that what happened was something less, something which might be alleviated, something which might be reduced to a charge of manslaughter, or was something which was accidental, or was something which could be justified."

At the end of his summing up he added:

> "The Crown has got to satisfy you that this woman, Violet Woolmington, died at the prisoner's hands. They must satisfy you of that beyond any reasonable doubt. If they satisfy you of that, then he has to show that there are circumstances to be found in the evidence which has been given from the witness-box in this case which alleviate the crime so that it is only manslaughter, or which excuse the homicide altogether by showing that it was a pure accident."

In the argument before the Court of Criminal Appeal cases were cited by the learned counsel on either side and textbooks of authority were referred to, but the learned judges contented themselves with saying "there can be no question to start with that the learned judge laid down the law applicable to a case of murder in the way in which it is to be found in the old authorities." They repeated the learned judge's words and said: "No doubt there is ample authority for that statement of the law." They then relied, as I have already mentioned, upon the proviso to s. 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, and dismissed the appeal.

It is true, as stated by the Court of Criminal Appeal, that there is apparent authority for the law as laid down by the learned judge. But your Lordships' House has had the advantage of a prolonged and exhaustive inquiry dealing with the matter in debate from the earliest times, an advantage which was not shared by either of the courts below. Indeed your Lordships were referred to legal propositions dating as far back as the reign of King Canute (994–1035). I do not think it is necessary for the purpose of this opinion to go as far back as that. Rather would I invite your Lordships to begin by considering the proposition of law which is contained in Foster's Crown Law, written in 1762, and which appears to be the foundation for the law as laid down by the learned judge in this case. It must be remembered that Sir Michael Foster, although a distinguished judge, is for this purpose to be regarded as a textbook writer, for he did not lay down the doctrine in any case before him, but in an article which is described as "The Introduction to the Discourse of Homicide." In the folio edition, published at Oxford at the Clarendon Press in 1762, at p. 255, he states:

> "In every charge of murder, the fact of killing being first proved, all the circumstances of accident, necessity, or infirmity, are to be satisfactorily proved by the prisoner, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him; for the law presumeth the fact to have been founded in malice until the contrary appeareth. And very right it is, that the law should so presume. The defendant in this instance standeth upon just the same foot that every other defendant doth: the matters tending to justify, excuse, or alleviate must appear in evidence before he can avail himself of them."

Now the first part of this passage appears in nearly every textbook or abridgment which has been since written. To come down to modern times, the passage appears in Stephen's Digest of the Criminal Law, 7th ed., at p. 235; also in the well-known treatise of Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, which is the companion of lawyers who practise in the criminal courts: see 29th ed., 1934, at p. 873. It also appears almost textually in Russell on Crimes, 8th ed. (1923), vol. 1, p. 615, and in the second edition of Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 9, which purports to state the law as on May 1, 1933, where it is said at p. 426:

> "When it has been proved that one person's death has been caused by another, there is a primâ facie presumption of law that the act of the person causing the death is murder, unless the contrary appears from the evidence either for > the prosecution or for the defence. The onus is upon such person when accused to show that his act did not amount to murder."

The authority for that proposition is given as Foster, p. 255, and also R. v. Greenacre (1).

The question arises: Is that statement correct law? Is it correct to say, and does Sir Michael Foster mean to lay down, that there may arise in the course of a criminal trial a situation at which it is incumbent upon the accused to prove his innocence? To begin with, if that is what Sir Michael Foster meant, there is no previous authority for his proposition, and I am confirmed in this opinion by the fact that in all the textbooks no earlier authority is cited for it. Before, however, one considers the earlier criminal law several facts have to be remembered.

First, it was not till 1907 that the Court of Criminal Appeal was set up. It is perfectly true that from time to time there have been famous occasions on which the judges and barons were called together to give their opinion upon the law bearing on murder. Examples of this will be found. In the year 1611, in R. v. Mackalley (2) all the judges and barons were moved to give their opinion; in 1706, in R. v. Mawgridge (3), which was argued before all the judges, and all of them except Trevor, L.C.J., were of opinion that Mawgridge was guilty of murder; and in 1843, in R. v. M'Naghten (4), where all the judges gave answers to your Lordships' House upon the test of insanity.

M'Naghten's case stands by itself. It is the famous pronouncement on the law bearing on the question of insanity in cases of murder. It is quite exceptional and has nothing to do with the present circumstances. In M'Naghten's case the onus is definitely and exceptionally placed upon the accused to establish such a defence: see R. v. Oliver Smith (5) where it is stated (6 Cr. App. Rep. at p. 19) that the only general rule that can be laid down as to the evidence in such a case is that insanity, if relied upon as a defence, must be established by the defendant. But it was added that all the judges had met and resolved that it was not proper for the Crown to call evidence of insanity, but that any evidence in the possession of the Crown should be placed at the disposal of the prisoner's counsel to be used by him if he thought fit: see also Archbold, 29th ed., pp. 18 and 874. It is not necessary to refer to M'Naghten's case again in this judgment for it has nothing to do with it.

It is true that, at a later period, certain cases were reserved by the judges for the consideration of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, but many of the propositions with regard to criminal law are contained either in the summing up of the judges or in textbooks of authority as distinguished from a court sitting in banc.

The learned author of Stephen's Digest of the Criminal Law, 7th ed. (1926), has an interesting note on the definition of murder and manslaughter at p. 461. But his remarks are rather directed to the ingredients of the crime than to the proof of it. None the less, the author does not hesitate to tread a path of very robust criticism of the previous authorities. He speaks of the "intricacy, confusion, and uncertainty of this branch of the law." He refers to the definition of Coke (1552–1623) and says:

> "These passages, overloaded as Coke's manner is, with a quantity of loose, rambling gossip, form the essence of his account of murder."

He describes (at p. 463) Coke's chapter on manslaughter as "bewildering," and adds that Hale (1609–1676) treats manslaughter in a manner so meagre and yet so confused that no opinion of it can be obtained except by reading through chapters 38 to 40 and trying to make sense of them, and concludes by saying, p. 466, that:

> "Sir Michael Foster to some extent mitigates the barbarous rule laid down by Coke as to intentional personal violence."

Next, it must be remembered that prisoners were not entitled to be represented by counsel except in cases of felony, where counsel might argue the law on their behalf. Thirdly, it must not be forgotten that the prisoner himself was not allowed to give evidence before the Act passed in 1898.

Bearing these considerations in mind, I now turn to some of the cases cited to us. I doubt whether in any of the early ones the question of the burden of proof was considered. Rather they were concerned with the ingredients of the crime of murder. One of the first difficulties was to settle the meaning of express and implied malice. It was not till 1825 that Bayley, J., in Bromage v. Prosser (6) gave his famous definition of malice as meaning a wrongful act, done intentionally without just cause or excuse. The older cases were rather concerned to give examples of what might be malice. This was so in Mackalley's case (2). The prisoner was there accused of murdering a serjeant of London. The courts were already considering cases of express or implied malice, and the passage in Coke appears simply to mean that if a man does acts calculated to kill and actually does kill that is evidence of malice or intent—in other words, evidence of one of the ingredients of murder, but it does not seem to be at all concerned with onus of proof or to support the statement of Sir Michael Foster on that point.

One of the most famous of the earlier treatises on criminal law was the History of the Pleas of Sir Matthew Hale. That celebrated judge died on Christmas Day, 1675. It was known that he had left a treatise on the subject and upon Nov. 29, 1680, it was ordered by the House of Commons that the executors of Sir Matthew Hale be desired to print the manuscript relating to Crown Law and a committee be appointed to take care of the printing thereof. It is not said that anything appears in Hale suggesting that the burden of proving his innocence lay on the prisoner. Looking at the edition of 1800, c. 37, vol. 1, p. 454, is again concerned with what malice is. It is headed "Concerning murder by malice implied, presumptive or malice in Law," and Mackalley's case (2) is duly cited.

As appears from Foster's Pleas of the Crown, Sir Michael Foster was familiar with Hale's treatise (see his preface), and although in the course of his book he makes reference to Hale, he gives no authority for the proposition which is under discussion. It cannot be doubted that at that time in English courts of justice the law of evidence was in a very fluid condition. Indeed, in some civil cases it differed on different circuits: see Weeks v. Sparke (7) and also the note 20, p. 182, in Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence, 10th ed. (1922). It was only later that the courts began to discuss such things as presumption and onus. In Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 4, s. 2513, note p. 3562, a reference is made to the judgment of Weaver, J., in The State v. Brady (8). This was cited in R. v. Stoddart (9):

> "The use of the terms 'presumption of guilt' and 'primâ facie evidence of guilt' with reference to the possession of stolen goods has perhaps been too long indulged in by courts and text-writers to be condemned; but we cannot resist the conclusion that, when so employed, these expressions are unfortunate, and often misleading. . . . 'Presumptions' of guilt and 'primâ facie' cases of guilt in the trial of a party charged with crime, mean no more than that from the proof of certain facts the jury will be warranted in convicting the accused of the offence with which he is charged."

We were referred to R. v. Legg (10) where it is said that > "at the Newgate Session in 1674, one John Legg being indicted for the murder of Mr. Robert Wise, it was upon the evidence agreed that if one man kill another and no sudden quarrel appeareth, this is murder."

Mackalley's case (2) is quoted as an authority and the report goes on, "and it lieth upon the party indicted to prove the sudden quarrel." With regard to Kelynge's Reports, the critics have greatly differed. Sir John Kelynge was Chief Justice of the King's Bench. He died in 1671, and, whatever opinion may be held about him as a judge, upon which see Foss's The Judges of England (1870), p. 381, the critics have differed greatly upon the value of his reports. Lord Campbell in his Life of Kelynge, Lives of the Chief Justices (1849), vol. 1, p. 511, says: "He compiled a folio volume of decisions in criminal cases which are of no value whatever." But, on the other hand, there are others who regard the book as of high authority: see The Reporters, by Wallace (Boston, 1882), p. 327.

The report of Legg's case (10) is meagre and unsatisfactory, and cannot, I think, be held to mean that, unless the prisoner prove the sudden quarrel, he must be convicted of murder. The word "onus" is used indifferently throughout the books, sometimes meaning the next move or next step in the process of proving or sometimes the conclusion of the whole matter.

Mawgridge's case (3) was cited to us from Kelynge's Reports, but it was not reported by Kelynge for the simple reason that it was not tried till 1706. Campbell (ubi sup.), vol. 2, p. 176, says it was reported by Holt and makes caustic comments on Holt's English composition. It was added by Holt to his edition of Kelynge's Reports and is described as a case of "great expectation," and gives the history of murder trials in English courts from the earliest times. The case, however, is no authority for saying that the prisoner at any time is called upon to prove his innocence; quite the contrary. It is another of those cases which deal with malice and with what is such provocation as will make the act of killing to be manslaughter only.

In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, 8th ed. (1824), vol. 1, p. 88, s. 25, it is stated:

> "It is also agreed that no one can excuse the killing another by setting forth in a special pleading that he did it by misadventure or se defendendo, but that he must plead 'Not Guilty' and give the special matter in evidence."

This points to the fact that the verdict must be given, not on any special pleading given by the prisoner, but upon, and as the result of, the whole of the case, and it nowhere suggests that the burden of proof either at the beginning or at the end of a case is not on the prosecution.

The case of R. v. Greenacre (1) was certainly heard by a very distinguished judge, Tindale, C.J. But it is to be observed that the dictum relied upon by the prosecution in this case, namely, > "that where it appears that one person's death has been occasioned by the hand of another, it behoves that other to show from evidence, or by inference from the circumstances of the case, that the offence is of a mitigated character, and does not amount to the crime of murder," was contained in the summing up of the learned judge to the jury. It is the passage in Sir Michael Foster and this summing up which are usually relied on as the authority for the proposition that at some particular time of a criminal case the burden of proof lies on the prisoner to prove his innocence. The presumption of innocence in a criminal case is strong, see Taylor on Evidence, 11th ed. (1920), vol. 1, pars. 113 and 114, and it is doubtful whether either of these passages mean any such thing. Rather do I think they simply refer to stages in the trial of a case. All that is meant is that, if it is proved that the conscious act of the prisoner killed a man and nothing else appears in the case, there is evidence upon which the jury may—not, must—find him guilty of murder. It is difficult to conceive so bare and meagre a case, but that does not mean that the onus is not still on the prosecution.

If at any period of a trial it was permissible for the judge to rule that the prosecution had established its case and that the onus was shifted on the prisoner to prove that he was not guilty, and that, unless he discharged that onus, the prosecution was entitled to succeed, it would be enabling the judge in such a case to say that the jury must in law find the prisoner guilty and so make the judge decide the case and not the jury, which is not the common law. It would be an entirely different case from those exceptional instances of special verdicts where a judge asks the jury to find certain facts and directs them that on such facts the prosecution is entitled to succeed. Indeed, a consideration of such special verdicts shows that it is not till the end of the evidence that a verdict can properly be found and that at the end of the evidence it is not for the prisoner to establish his innocence, but for the prosecution to establish his guilt. Just as there is evidence on behalf of the prosecution so there may be evidence on behalf of the prisoner which may cause a doubt as to his guilt. In either case, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt.

But while the prosecution must prove the guilt of the prisoner, there is no such burden laid on the prisoner to prove his innocence, and it is sufficient for him to raise a doubt as to his guilt; he is not bound to satisfy the jury of his innocence.

This is the real result of the perplexing case of Rex v. Abramovitch (11) which lays down the same proposition, although, perhaps, in somewhat involved language. Juries are always told that, if conviction there is to be, the prosecution must prove the case beyond reasonable doubt. This statement cannot mean that in order to be acquitted the prisoner must "satisfy" the jury. This is the law as laid down in the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Davies (12) the head-note of which correctly states that where intent is an ingredient of a crime there is no onus on the defendant to prove that the act alleged was accidental. Throughout the web of the English criminal law one golden thread is always to be seen—that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt subject to what I have already said as to the defence of insanity and subject also to any statutory exception. If, at the end of and on the whole of the case, there is a reasonable doubt, created by the evidence given by either the prosecution or the prisoner, as to whether the prisoner killed the deceased with a malicious intention, the prosecution has not made out the case and the prisoner is entitled to an acquittal. No matter what the charge or where the trial, the principle that the prosecution must prove the guilt of the prisoner is part of the common law of England and no attempt to whittle it down can be entertained. When dealing with a murder case the Crown must prove (a) death as the result of a voluntary act of the accused and (b) malice of the accused. It may prove malice either expressly or by implication. For malice may be implied where death occurs as the result of a voluntary act of the accused which is (i) intentional and (ii) unprovoked. When evidence of death and malice has been given (this is a question for the jury) the accused is entitled to show by evidence or by examination of the circumstances adduced by the Crown that the act on his part which caused death was either unintentional or provoked. If the jury are either satisfied with his explanation or, upon a review of all the evidence, are left in reasonable doubt whether, even if his explanation be not accepted, the act was unintentional or provoked, the prisoner is entitled to be acquitted. It is not the law of England to say, as was said in the summing up in the present case,

> "if the Crown satisfy you that this woman died at the prisoner's hands, then he has to show that there are circumstances to be found in the evidence which has been given from the witness-box in this case which alleviate the crime so that it is only manslaughter or which excuse the homicide altogether by showing it was a pure accident."

If the proposition laid down by Sir Michael Foster or in the summing up in R. v. Greenacre (1) means this, those authorities are wrong.

We were then asked to follow the Court of Criminal Appeal and to apply the proviso of s. 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, which says:

> "the Court may, notwithstanding that they are of opinion that the point raised in the appeal might be decided in favour of the appellant, dismiss the appeal if they consider no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred."

There is no doubt that there is ample jurisdiction to apply that proviso in a case of murder. The Act makes no distinction between a capital case and any other case, but we think it impossible to apply it in the present case. We cannot say that if the jury had been properly directed they would have inevitably come to the same conclusion. In the result we decline to apply the proviso and, as already stated, we order that the appeal should be allowed and the conviction quashed.

LORD ATKIN, who is engaged in the Privy Council, has asked me to say that he concurs in the judgment I have just read.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—I concur.

LORD TOMLIN.—I also concur.

LORD WRIGHT.—I concur.

Appeal allowed.

DEEN v. DAVIES

[COURT OF APPEAL (Slesser and Romer, L.JJ., and Singleton, J.), April 5, 1935]

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 282; 104 L.J.K.B. 540; 153 L.T. 90; 51 T.L.R. 398; 79 Sol. Jo. 381]

Animal—Negligence of owner—Horse insecurely tethered in stable adjoining highway—Escape of horse into street—Injury to pedestrian.

In so far as a horse allowed unattended on a highway in a town may prove a danger to others, it is the duty of a person bringing that horse into the town and stabling it there temporarily for his convenience to see that it is properly tethered. He must have regard to the fact that the horse will naturally tend to stray and guard against the dangers which persons in the street may run by the horse not having been securely tethered.

The owner of a quiet horse rode it from the country into the town and there fastened it in a stable so insecurely that it got loose, and while trying to make its way home injured a pedestrian lawfully on the highway.

Held: that the owner of the horse had been guilty of negligence, that the injuries to the pedestrian were the natural and probable result of that negligence, and that she was entitled to recover damages from the owner for the injuries sustained.

Appeal by the defendant, Morgan William Davies, from a judgment given at D Merthyr Tydfil County Court on July 11, 1934, awarding to the plaintiff, Eileen Deen, £150 damages for personal injuries which she alleged were due to the negligence of the defendant.

The plaintiff brought her action against Mr. Davies, a farmer, and a Mr. Collins, a stable proprietor. On May 31, 1934, the plaintiff, who is a cripple, was on the footpath of Penry-street, Merthyr Tydfil, when the defendant's pony came along E the street. In seeking to avoid the pony she fell and sustained serious injuries. The defendant Davies had tied up the pony in a stable adjoining the street and belonging to the defendant Collins, but it broke loose and escaped. The county court judge found that the pony caused the plaintiff to fall, that its conduct was what was to be expected from the pony if it escaped, but that it did not exhibit dangerous or savage propensities. He found that Davies was guilty of negligence F in omitting to tie the pony up securely in the stable, and that there was no negligence on the part of Collins. There was, he said, no authority which compelled him to say that the owner of a horse was not liable for damage caused by it if it escaped through his negligence. He, therefore, gave judgment for the plaintiff against Davies, but dismissed the action against Collins. The defendant Davies appealed. G

Joshua Davies for the defendant, Davies.

W. S. Morrison, K.C., and Derek Parsons for the plaintiff.

SLESSER, L.J.—The defendant, Morgan William Davies, has a farm about two miles outside Merthyr Tydfil. From time to time it is his habit to ride into Merthyr Tydfil on a Welsh mountain pony some eight years old, ride through the H streets of Merthyr Tydfil, and ride home again when he has transacted his business. There is no evidence in this case, nor is it suggested, that the pony is anything but a quiet, tame, normal animal. On the occasions when Mr. Davies rides into Merthyr Tydfil it is his custom to stable the pony from time to time in a stable which belongs to Mr. Collins. On the occasion which gave rise to this action Mr. Davies tied the pony to a stall, to a piece of wood which he believed to be firm, as I was his custom, rather than tethering it to a staple which was there provided.

The pony was taken into Mr. Collins's stable at about midday on the date when the accident happened. At two o'clock Mr. Davies came back and found the pony in the same stall. But it appears that the pony pulled at the piece of wood to which it was tethered, the wood gave way, and the pony dragged the wood attached to the halter through Penry-street. There is no evidence that the pony was bolting or was doing anything but trotting home in the ordinary way through that street. Unfortunately, there was in the street the plaintiff, Miss Eileen Deen, who was more or less a cripple. On this particular occasion she was proceeding along Penry-

A street when the pony ran out across the road from the stable door. There is some conflict of evidence whether Miss Deen was or was not actually hit by the pony. She said: "The horse hit me down, knocked me down." Although another witness spoke to the same effect, other witnesses took a different view, and, in particular, a Mr. Ernest James Wagstaffe, who gave evidence on behalf of the defendant. He was about three or four yards from Miss Deen when she was picked up. He stated: B "The horse passed Miss Deen at a distance of 9 in. to 1 ft., and did not touch her. She seemed to half turn towards the direction of the horse and then she dropped quietly with her crutches on the side of her. She said"—this is Mr. Wagstaffe speaking—"the horse had not touched her."

On that the learned county court judge came to the following conclusion: "That the evidence does not establish satisfactorily that the plaintiff was knocked down C by the pony or the piece of wood, but I am satisfied that the conduct of the pony caused the plaintiff to fall, and without any negligence or lack of care on her part." So, there is a finding by the judge, a finding, in my opinion, supported by evidence, that Miss Deen fell and sustained her injuries by reason of the conduct of the pony. If the fact that the pony passed her so near and caused her so to fall was the result of a failure of duty on the part of Mr. Davies, then, I think, it cannot but be that D that negligence, that failure of duty, was, or, at any rate, the judge was entitled to find that it was, the cause of her damage. Therefore, I think, we have not to consider whether the fact of the pony escaping was or was not sufficiently the cause of Miss Deen's damage, but rather the more difficult point (on which we have heard very interesting and exhaustive arguments) whether in the circumstances there was any duty on Mr. Davies which he failed to perform so as to render him liable E to an action for negligence.

I think that the authorities establish that there may be circumstances—I do not say there always are; it is a question of fact—in which it is negligent to allow a horse or a horse and cart to be unattended in a highway. As GREER, L.J., has said in Haynes v. G. Harwood & Son (5) ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 153):

> "Of course it does not follow that in all circumstances it is negligence to leave F horses unattended in a highway; each case, with all its circumstances, has to be considered."

Then he mentions matters which may be the proper subject of consideration—whether it is a crowded street in which many people, including children, were likely to be about, and so on. That decision appears to me to be in harmony with a G decision of MCCARDIE, J., in Gayler and Pope, Ltd. v. B. Davies & Son, Ltd. (6), where he said that he was of opinion that to leave unattended a horse or a horse and cart might constitute negligence, and that he found authority for that in Tolhausen v. Davies (7), a case of a runaway horse and cart in a highway, where, in the Divisional Court, A. L. SMITH, J., said (57 L.J.Q.B. at p. 394):

> "I held in the case of Watson v. Weekes (8), in which I was affirmed by the H Court of Appeal, that upon proof given by a plaintiff that the defendant's horse, harnessed to a cart, was running away unattended along a highway, whereby the plaintiff, being lawfully thereon, was injured, a judge could not rightly non-suit, for that such facts were more consistent with the absence of ordinary care in the superintending the horse than with such care having been used."

In the present case, this being entirely a question of law, if the judge could not I non-suit, it became a question of fact for the jury whether there was or was not sufficient evidence of negligence in the particular case. A Scottish decision to the same effect (Snee v. Durkie) (9) decided that where a runaway horse and carriage run down a person in broad daylight in a public street the presumption is that the owner of the horse and carriage is in fault.

Counsel for the defendant says that, even if he were not disposed to dispute that as a general proposition, a distinction can be drawn in the present case by reason of the fact that, although the pony was unattended when it was in the public street, it only came to be in that position because it broke away from a piece of wooden structure to which it was attached, the structure being in a stable which was not on the highway. He cited a number of authorities, some of which are easier to understand than others, but which have the general effect that the owner or occupier of land, and, I think, also a person who is a licensee, who is entitled to pasture, to place horses, cattle, sheep, fowls, or any other tame animal in a field, is not responsible if, by reason of the absence of hedges, those animals get on the highway. I do not think that that general proposition can be disputed. It is pointed out in the cases that in early days the majority of roads had no hedges at the sides of them and that there is no obligation in law on persons to hedge their fields to keep animals from straying. But there does appear very clearly at least one exception to that general rule—where the animal is known to be of a vicious propensity, known to be a danger. The general doctrine, as contained in Chasemore v. Richards (10), and the other authorities, that a person detains a dangerous thing in a particular place at his peril, then applies, and he cannot take advantage of the privilege of not being bound to fence or hedge his property, but counsel for the appellant is quite right in saying that this is not such a case, that there is no suggestion that this animal is of a dangerous or vicious propensity, and it is not necessary to consider that class of case.

It is equally clear from the authorities that, whereas that is the general rule, there may be circumstances in a case which may make a person liable for negligence—that is, may put a particular duty on him. Irrespective of the general duty to control on one's property what is dangerous, there may arise from the nature of the circumstances of a particular case a particular duty. LORD ATKIN makes the distinction very clear where he said in Fardon v. Harcourt-Rivington (11) (146 L.T. at p. 392):

> "In the first place he [counsel for the plaintiff, who was the appellant] relied upon the liability of the owner of an animal of known mischievous propensities to keep it under control, with the consequence that damage caused by the mischievous propensities is damage which falls upon the person who fails to exercise the control. That is a liability which exists only in the case either of wild animals, which have by their nature a mischievous propensity, or of tame animals, which are known to the persons having control to have a particular propensity."

He goes on to say:

> "But it is also true that, quite apart from the liability imposed upon the owner of animals or the person having control of them by reason of knowledge of their propensities, there is the ordinary duty of a person to take care either that his animal or his chattel is not put to such a use as is likely to injure his neighbour—the ordinary duty to take care in the cases put upon negligence."

GREER, L.J., in Sycamore v. Ley (12) (147 L.T. at p. 345), speaks first of the dog which is not a tame dog, where he is known to be dangerous, and he says that the liability to keep him under control is absolute, like the liability of the defendant in Rylands v. Fletcher (13). He then states:

> "But that is not the end of his liability. He may, in my judgment, be liable for the conduct of a dog which has not been taken out of the category of tame animals if he puts it in such a position and in such circumstances as render it likely that the dog will get excited, will lose its temper, and will cause damage to people lawfully passing along the highway."

In my judgment, on the facts of this case, and having regard to all the circumstances, Mr. Davies did so put his pony in such a place that if it were not properly tethered it was likely to cause damage to persons who were on the highway. The county court judge has found as a fact that he ought to have tied the pony to the staple. He said: "The defendant Davies was guilty of negligence in omitting to tie up the pony properly in the stall where he had placed it." There was evidence, some to the effect that the pony was perfectly properly tied to this piece of wood, and other evidence, mostly given on behalf of Mr. Collins, the owner of the stable, to the effect that the proper way of dealing with the pony was to tie it to the staple. Mr. Collins said that he always himself tied it to the staple and that he never had a horse break it before. There was ample evidence on which the county court judge could come to the conclusion to which he did come, that Mr. Davies was guilty of negligence in omitting to tie up the pony properly in the stall. That means that, if he had the duty not to place the pony in such a position and deal with it in such circumstances that it would be a danger, he failed to satisfy that duty just as much as if he had not tied up the pony at all, but had left it loose in the stable.

Are the circumstances of this case so particular that, whatever may be the general immunity of persons with regard to horses which break out of their fields, it can be said that no liability exists? I think not. In so far as a horse allowed unattended on a highway in a town may prove a danger to others, it is the duty of a person bringing that horse into the town and stabling it there temporarily for his convenience to see that it is properly tethered. He must have regard to the fact that the horse will naturally tend to stray. Be that as it may, there is in this case, in addition, an express finding on the evidence that this particular pony would tend, if it were loose, to stray home. The evidence is that Mr. Davies anticipated that the pony would return home if it were not securely tethered—indeed, the object of tethering it was for the very purpose of preventing its returning home, and necessarily so through the streets where it might be a danger to persons. No doubt, equally, Mr. Davies had the motive that he did not want to lose his pony, although that motive cannot have weighed quite so seriously with him in this sense that, when he got home, he would have found the pony, but he would have had to walk home and would not have had the amenity of riding back. Whatever his motives may have been, he tethered the pony (on the evidence) anticipating all the risks and the dangers which might arise if it were not tethered, and, as I see it, for the express purpose of preventing its doing the very sort of things which in this case it did. It is impossible, I think, on the facts, to say that Mr. Davies did not anticipate all the dangers. He failed to guard against the dangers which persons in the street might run by the pony not having been securely tethered.

Finally, Turner v. Coates (14) is an illustration of what I was saying that, notwithstanding that there is a right normally to bring a horse on a highway, there may be particular circumstances which render such an act negligent. The headnote in Turner v. Coates states:

> "A young unbroken colt belonging to the defendant, a farmer, was being taken along a highway on a dark night. It was allowed to go loose behind a mare which was being led and in front of a trap driven by the defendant. The plaintiff, who was riding a bicycle, was coming from the opposite direction when the colt, being startled by the light on the bicycle, suddenly ran across the road and collided with and injured the plaintiff."

The county court judge found:

> "That it was well known, especially to a farmer, that a young unbroken colt when loose on the highway is apt, when startled, to rush about and to kick, and that there is grave risk of danger to the public in allowing such a colt to go loose on the highway in the dark," and he held that the defendant was guilty of negligence in allowing the colt to be on the highway in the dark without being under proper control. The case was appealed to the Divisional Court which upheld the decision of the county court judge. LUSH, J., referring to what LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., had stated in Heath's Garage, Ltd. v. Hodges (4), said ([1917] 1 K.B. at p. 674):

> "The Master of the Rolls implies, therefore, that if an animal, having regard to its natural propensities under such circumstances as those with which we are dealing, is likely to come into collision with a person on a bicycle or with a motor car, what he was saying will not apply."

What the Master of the Rolls had said in Heath's Garage, Ltd. v. Hodges (4) ([1916] 2 K.B. at p. 376) was this:

> "I am prepared to hold that in ordinary circumstances, in an ordinary highway, it is no breach of duty not to prevent harmless animals like sheep from straying on to the highway, and that it makes no difference whether the action is sought to be based on negligence or on a nuisance on the highway."

LUSH, J., came to the conclusion that the case of the colt in the dark behind the mare is one of those exceptional cases where the circumstances are such that a duty to take care is specifically cast on the person responsible for the colt, and that for a failure of that duty he may be liable, notwithstanding the more general right, to take animals unrestrained on the highway. BAILHACHE, J., came to the same conclusion and quoted what, I think is rather important here—a passage from the judgment of BRAY, J., in Hadwell v. Righton (2) ([1907] 2 K.B. at p. 349):

> "In the absence of anticipated danger, there is no room for the suggestion of negligence."

I think that in the present case there was danger which either was or ought reasonably to have been anticipated, namely, the danger that if the pony got loose, through improper tethering, from the stable, it would try to go home, that it would pass along the highway, and that, being unattended on the highway, it would be liable to cause damage to persons there. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. Counsel for the defendant, in the course of his argument, very properly called our attention to a series of cases in which the courts had to deal with the position of the owner of an animal which escapes from land adjoining a highway on to the highway and injures somebody who is lawfully using the highway. In reading the judgments in these cases it is essential to distinguish between those parts where the court is dealing with the question of what duty is owed to the public by the owner of an animal which is in a field—say, adjoining the highway—and where it is dealing with the question whether, if he does owe a duty not to let the animal escape on to the highway, the damage sustained by a plaintiff is the natural consequence of his breach of that duty. An interesting illustration of that is to be found in Cox v. Burbidge (1) where a horse which had no vicious propensities escaped on to the highway. Having got on to the road, it damaged the plaintiff by kicking him. The decision, which was in favour of the defendant, could have been supported on either of two grounds—either because, as the horse had no vicious propensity, there was no duty on the part of the defendant to prevent its getting on the highway, or because, if there was a duty to prevent its getting there, the damage done to the plaintiff was not the necessary or probable cause of that breach of duty, since it was not the habit of that horse to kick. The result would have been a little strange if the court had arrived at the conclusion that the owner of an animal which is in a field adjoining a highway owes a duty to the public to prevent its getting on to the highway, because, if the plaintiff had then been damaged merely by the horse trotting along the highway in a natural manner, the defendant would have been liable, but if the plaintiff had been damaged by reason of the horse kicking him, which was an unnatural act on the part of the animal, the defendant would not have been liable.

However, the court decided in favour of the defendant on both grounds—first of all, on the ground that the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff to prevent his horse from getting on to the highway because he did not know that the horse was of a vicious character, if, indeed, the horse was of a vicious nature; secondly, that supposing there was such a duty, yet, inasmuch as the plaintiff had been damaged by the horse behaving not in a natural manner, but in a way which the defendant could not reasonably have expected it to do, the damage was too remote. Bearing that distinction in mind, I do not think it emerges clearly from the authorities to which our attention was called that, whether he does or does not know that it is a

A natural tendency of an animal to get on the highway from a field if it can, the owner of an animal which is being depastured on land adjoining or near a highway owes no duty to the public to prevent the animal from straying on to the highway. I say that because I observe that ERLE, C.J., in dealing with the question of duty of the owner of such an animal, in Cox v. Burbidge (1), said:

> "The owner of a horse must be taken to know that the animal will stray if not properly secured."

I should think it is common knowledge that sheep will get out of a field if they can, if there is a gap in the hedge, and if one gets out the whole lot will come out, and that if chickens can get on to a highway to dust themselves they will do so. But C neither the owner of a chicken which is feeding near the highway nor the owner of a sheep which is being depastured near a highway owes any duty to the public to prevent the chicken or the sheep from getting on to the highway unless he knows that the chicken or the sheep—or, in the case of a horse, the horse—is of a vicious propensity and is likely to damage His Majesty's lieges. If, therefore, Mr. Davies had turned his pony into a field while he was pursuing his lawful occupation in the D town, and the pony had escaped on to the highway through a gap in the hedge or through an open gate and had damaged Miss Deen, he would not, in my opinion, have been liable.

But there is another series of cases to which our attention was called, again very properly, by counsel for the appellant. In those cases the court had to deal with the position of the owner of an animal which he himself had brought on the highway E and which, having been so brought, damaged somebody else who was lawfully using the highway. Again, on examining those cases, it is very necessary to draw a distinction between two different matters—(i) whether the owner of such an animal owes any duty at all to the public, and, (ii) whether, if he does owe such a duty, he has committed a breach of it, because, if he does owe a duty to take all reasonable care that the animal which he has brought on to the highway does not F damage other parties, what is reasonable care in one case may not be reasonable care in another. It will be found in some cases that where a man has so brought an animal on to the highway he has been held liable for damage caused to another party, and in other cases that he has not been held liable. As I read those cases, bearing that distinction again in mind, it has been clearly established that the owner of an animal who brings it on to the highway does owe a duty to those who G are using the highway to use all reasonable care to prevent the animal damaging other persons. What may be reasonable care in the country may not be reasonable care in the town. What may be reasonable care in the case of one animal may not be reasonable care in the case of another.

In one case to which SLESSER, L.J., has just referred (Turner v. Coates) (14) the owner of a colt, which he had tethered behind a cart or which was following a cart, which colt was of an excitable disposition (as most untamed colts are), was held H liable for the damage done to a person using the highway by the colt suddenly swerving to one side. It was held that, having regard to the nature of the animal, the owner had not taken all reasonable care to prevent it from damaging somebody else. As I say, it appears to me that in those cases the general principle is established that the owner of an animal which he brings on to the highway must use all reasonable care to prevent the animal from doing damage. One can instance many I cases of animals doing damage in spite of reasonable care being taken. Sheep driven along a road will very likely cause damage, and it has been held, in general, that the owner of a flock of sheep, driving them along a road, is not liable for the damage which they have done because it was not shown that he has not taken all reasonable care to prevent them from causing damage.

In the present case the difficulty, as it seems to me, is to ascertain within which of those two principles the defendant in this case is brought. In my opinion, he is brought within the second principle. He had his pony on the highway and he rode it into a town. While he was riding it into the town he owed a duty to take all reasonable care to prevent its doing damage to other persons. If he had tethered it in the street he would have owed a duty to take all reasonable care to see that it was so securely tethered, and tethered in such a place, that it could not do damage to other people. What he did was to put it into a stable the door of which opened on to the street and was, in fact, open at the time the pony eventually escaped from the stable into the street. The pony was tethered, not to the staple (which was, apparently, used by the owner of the stable for tethering horses), but to a bit of wood nailed—as the defendant thought, securely nailed—against the side of the stable. In my opinion, the defendant's duty had not ceased when he so tethered his pony. It is not necessary to say whether in general the first principle to which I have referred extends to a thing like a stable opening on to the road of a town. Speaking for myself, I doubt very much whether it does. I do not know that anyone really knows the origin of the principle which excuses the owner of an animal depasturing near a highway from the duty of seeing that the animal does not get on to the road, but it probably was that which, I think, lies at the bottom of the judgment of Neville, J., in Heath's Garage, Ltd. v. Hodges (4), that in days long before country roads existed it was the habit of our ancestors to depasture their cattle all over the place, and that when the road was subsequently dedicated to the public by the owner of the land the dedication was made subject to this well-known habit of landowners. If that is so, it is difficult to imagine that when a highway through a town was dedicated it was dedicated subject to any right of known habit on the part of the public to let their domestic animals roam over the road from the houses of the town.

However that may be, I think this case can be decided on its particular facts. In my opinion, the defendant had not discharged the duty which he owed to the public—a duty which began when he took his pony on to the highway and rode it along the highway into the street—and that duty had not come to an end and had not been fully discharged when he tethered it in the stable.

Two other questions only remain. The first is this: Was the defendant negligent —that is to say, did he fail to take all reasonable care to prevent the pony from getting on to the highway? So far as I can judge, on the evidence which was given, I should not have arrived at the same conclusion as that at which the learned county court judge arrived. Nevertheless, it seems to me impossible to say that there was no evidence on which he could arrive at the conclusion that the defendant had been negligent.

The second question is whether the damage sustained by the plaintiff was too remote to enable her to recover. If this unfortunate crippled woman had been damaged by reason of the pony doing something which could not reasonably have been expected of such a well-behaved pony, then the defendant would be entitled to escape. But the county court judge has found (and so far as I can see he was justified in finding) that the pony was behaving in a way which was normal in an ordinary pony unattended on the roadway in a town, and that it was by reason of that behaviour that the plaintiff was injured. That being so, it seems to me impossible to say that the damage was too remote. Therefore, while feeling some sympathy for the defendant, I think that the appeal fails.

SINGLETON, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are not concerned in this court with the learned county court judge's findings of fact if and so far as there is evidence on which those findings could be based. I agree in general with the conclusions of law at which he arrived.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] It is to be noticed that in the course of the case evidence was called on both sides as to what a pony of this character might be expected to do if, being placed in a strange stable and not safely fastened, it became hungry and desired to get to its home. That evidence, we were told, was given on a suggestion of the county court judge, who, no doubt, had considered the case of Turner v. Coates (14). In that case, Lush, J., said ([1917] 1 K.B. at p. 674):

A
> "I see no objection to evidence being given that under certain circumstances a particular animal exhibits habits which are dangerous to mankind."

In this case evidence was given by a witness on each side of what ponies would do generally, and evidence was also given by the defendant of what one might expect this pony to do. I observe that LUSH, J., in Turner v. Coates (14) said:

> "Therefore, without taking reasonable care, the defendant turned on to the highway an animal likely to cause damage, not by doing something mischievous, but by doing exactly what under the circumstances this colt was likely to do."

It seems to me that, among a large number of authorities which have been cited to us, that is nearest to the circumstances generally of this case. I do not think C that those authorities (accepting, as I do completely, the principle with regard to the escape of a horse or sheep or a chicken or a pig, or any other animal of a tame or domestic nature, from a field on to a highway because of fences being defective) meet the circumstances of this case. GREER, L.J., pointed out recently [in Haynes v. G. Harwood & Son (5)]—indeed, it has been pointed out many times—that every case depends on its own circumstances, and to ascertain whether or not in the D particular circumstances the defendant has been negligent or not one must, in the first place, ask oneself what is the duty which he owed in order to find out whether or not there had been any breach of that duty.

One must bear in mind that the pony in this case was taken from the country into a town; that, being in the town, it was thought right by its owner to place it in a stable both for its own protection and the protection of the public; that he E placed it in a stable hoping, no doubt, that it would be safe; that he did not take care to see that the place to which he tied it was safe; that the pony thereafter did that which he—and everybody who knew anything about ponies or horses—ought to have anticipated a pony would do—that is, that when it got tired of being in the place or when it got hungry it would pull at its manger and, if the piece of wood gave, walk out; and that if then it walked directly from the doorway through the F yard and into the street the natural thing was, if it got into a crowded place, that its speed would tend to increase.

The circumstances are quite different from the facts and circumstances in most of the authorities which have been cited to us. Merthyr Tydfil is a large and busy town; I gather it has some 80,000 inhabitants. I cannot think that one who takes into the middle of that town a pony from the country and leaves it in such a G position that it is not only able but likely to get on to the road is fulfilling his duty to the public. I agree with the Lords Justices that, if a defendant in such circumstances takes into the middle of a town a pony or a horse, he does not discharge his duty by placing that animal in a stable without securing it in any way, or without securing it satisfactorily. Counsel for the appellant agreed that, if the pony had been left in the highway and had then caused damage of the very kind H which should have been anticipated from its nature, there would be liability on the defendant. For myself, I wholly fail to appreciate that there is a distinction between the case of a man who leaves a pony of that kind in a street and the man who places it just off the street in a stable or in a yard without any security or without taking steps to prevent its getting on to the highway, to which, according to the evidence, it would naturally go. Each case must depend on its own circumstances. I

I agree entirely with the judgment of the learned county court judge and with the judgments of the Lords Justices, and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Gaming—Football pool—Conduct by bookmakers in or through newspaper—Stakes divided among competitors—Pool betting—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (Geo. 5, c. 58), s. 26 (1) (a).

The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company, who were bookmakers within s. 20 (1) of the Betting & Lotteries Act, 1934, from conducting in or through a newspaper a competition in which prizes were offered for forecasts of the results of football matches, contrary to s. 26 (1) of the Act. Lists of matches pending were printed on coupons contained in a newspaper published by the defendants, and the public were invited to fill in the coupons with forecasts of the results of the matches and send them to the company. Later, those who did not correctly forecast the results sent their stakes to the defendants, and the money less 10 per cent. was distributed among those who had correctly forecasted.

Held: the wagering was not made with the company by those who sent in coupons, but was made between the latter inter se, and the company was not conducting any competition within the mischief of s. 26 (1).

Motion by which the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company, its servants and agents, from conducting in or through a newspaper any competition in which prizes were offered for the forecast of the results of football matches and of goals, contrary to the prohibition contained in s. 26 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934.

The plaintiff was a director of the defendant company, incorporated in 1930, to carry on the business of sporting accountants in football, horse-racing, dog-racing, and other sports. They advertised regularly in a newspaper inviting the public to fill in forms predicting the results, with scores, of a selection of football matches to be played on the following Saturday, and to fill in the stake proposed. Six betting pools were so advertised. Each person entering signed a form promising to remit £ , the total amount invested by him on such matches, and to abide by the rules and conditions printed on the back of the forms. By r. 1 all business was conducted on a credit basis, and through the post only. Lists containing investments were to be posted not later than the Friday before the day of the matches. Ready money was not accepted (as infringing the Football (Ready Money) Betting Act, 1920). Losing clients were to send on the following Monday a remittance for the amount lost, and any client who did not so settle was blacklisted. No commissions were accepted from defaulters or from any person under twenty-one.

Rule 13 guaranteed payment to winning clients of the whole of the moneys in that pool, less a commission of 10 per cent. and expenses at the company's discretion.

They also advertised a "goals points pool," in which competitors were not asked to predict results, but to make a X against the five matches which would produce most goals. There was a list of forty-three matches to select from. Fifty per cent. of the pool was to be paid to the competitor whose five matches totalled up the most points and the competitor who scored the lowest number was to receive a consolation prize of £5.

Section 26 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, provides:

> "(1). It shall be unlawful to conduct in or through any newspaper, or in connection with any trade or business or the sale of any article to the public (a) any competition in which prizes are offered for forecasts of the result either of a future event or of a past event the result of which is not yet ascertained or not yet generally known; (b) any other competition success in which does not depend to a substantial degree upon the exercise of skill; Provided that nothing in this sub-section with respect to the conducting of competitions in connection with a trade or business shall apply in relation to pari-mutuel or pool betting operations carried on by a person whose only trade or business is that of a bookmaker as defined in Part I of this Act."

By s. 29:

> "Where a person convicted of an offence under this Act is a body corporate, every person who at the date of the commission of the offence was a director or officer of the body corporate shall also be deemed to be guilty of that offence unless he proves that the offence was committed without his knowledge."

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6. EVE, J., read the following judgment: The plaintiff claims an injunction to restrain the defendant company, its servants and agents, from conducting in or through a newspaper called the Winner, or any other newspaper, any competition in which prizes are offered for forecasts of the results of football matches contrary to the provisions of s. 26 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934.

The company, incorporated in 1930, is a bookmaker within the meaning of s. 20 (1) of the Act, and the plaintiff, who alleges that the company's main activities constitute an offence under s. 26, is a director of the company and as such seriously involved by reason of the fact that by s. 29 of the Act, where a person convicted of an offence under the Act is a body corporate every director of that body is also to be deemed to be guilty of that offence unless he proves that the offence was committed without his knowledge, and this the plaintiff does not suggest he can do. Section 26 of the Act deals with lotteries and prize competitions. So far as it is relevant on the present occasion it reads as follows. Subsection 1 says:

> "It shall be unlawful to conduct in or through any newspaper or in connection with any trade or business or the sale of any article to the public—(a) any competition in which prizes are offered for forecasts of the result either of a future event, or of a past event the result of which is not yet ascertained or not yet generally known; (b) any other competition success in which does not depend to a substantial degree upon the exercise of skill."

Then follows a proviso, the construction and effect of which are not quite clear; but, as the plaintiff's claim for an injunction is based on the allegation that the defendant company has conducted a competition in or through a newspaper, it is not necessary on this occasion to inquire further as to the meaning and effect of the proviso, which it will be seen relates mainly to competitions conducted in connection with a trade or business. The proviso is as follows:

> "Provided that nothing in this sub-section with respect to the conducting of competitions in connection with a trade or business shall apply in relation to pari-mutuel or pool betting operations carried on by a person whose only trade or business is that of a bookmaker as defined in Part I of this Act."

The particular operations to which the plaintiff takes exception and upon which the claim to an injunction is founded are two pools, the one known as the "United Kingdom Totalisator football pool No. 6" and the other as the "United Kingdom goals points pool." Both are conducted in or through the newspaper known as the Winner, and in the case of the second one, the "goals points pool," it is clearly a competition in which prizes are offered for forecasts of future events, including a consolation prize to the competitor who scores the lowest number of points. The defendants do not contend that this is not within s. 26, and they offer, and the plaintiff is ready to accept, an undertaking to discontinue operating or conducting this kind of pool in the future.

The arguments relating to the football pools call for some further consideration. In approaching this part of the case it must be noted that pari-mutuel, or pool betting, was recognised as an existing and lawful business when the Act was passed. It is one of the four classes of betting on which restrictions are imposed by the first four sections of the Act. The restrictions affecting this particular class of betting are to be found in s. 3 of the Act, and it is not suggested that the defendant company has in any way contravened any of the provisions of that section. According to the plaintiff's evidence, which is accepted as correct, the defendants' pools are conducted in the following manner: Coupons containing a list of a number of football matches then about to be played are published in the Winner newspaper, and members of the public are invited to fill up the coupons with their respective forecasts of the results of the said matches and with the amounts of their respective stakes thereon and to forward the coupons so filled up to the defendant company before the determination of the said results. Participants whose forecasts are proved by the results of the matches to be incorrect are required to, and do, forward the amount of their respective stakes to the defendant company upon a date specified in the advertisement, and the total amount invested by investors less 10 per cent. is distributed by the defendant company among those persons whose forecasts are proved to be correct. A copy of the newspaper for Monday, Dec. 17 last, is in evidence (Exhibit "B") containing the advertisement of Pool 6 and the standard rules regulating the operations are to be found in Exhibit "C." The advertisements and rules are framed to keep the operation within the statutory restrictions imposed on this class of betting and to avoid everything in the nature of ready-money betting.

The relationship established between the investors or clients who subscribe to the pool and the promoters or organisers, and also between the subscribers inter se, are to be found fully described and explained in the speeches of the learned Lords in A.G. v. Luncheon and Sports Club, Ltd. (1). That was a case wherein the question was raised whether the participants were betting with the operating company or inter se, and in order to decide this question it was necessary to ascertain the procedure and the relationship thereby brought about between the investors in such a pool. At [1929] A.C., p. 403, Lord Buckmaster describes the course pursued by the would-be investor in the following language:

> "He [the intending participant] 'operates' in the following manner. In anticipation of a horse-race he hands in to the clerk in charge of the machine a credit voucher numbered and dated, on which is placed the name of a horse with a space containing the words 'Win or Place,' the irrelevant word to be struck out or, if not struck out, the 'investment' is taken to be on 'win.' Thereupon the clerk in charge of the instrument makes the consequent alteration and the machine duly records the amount 'invested' on each horse, so that each investor can estimate what he will be likely to receive if his investment is successful by the following calculation: After 10 per cent. of the gross amount shown on the vouchers has been retained by the company 'in respect of the facilities provided' and expenses of management, the balance is divided among the investors on the winning horse in the proportion of their respective stakes. The winnings for each week are paid by the respondents from their own funds on every Saturday, irrespective of any possible loss owing to dishonour of the > vouchers. The respondents thus take the risk of bad debts but, owing to their control of membership, this is probably not serious, 2½ per cent. of the 10 per cent. being regarded by the respondents as sufficient security against such a contingency. Apart from this possible loss, the respondents can lose nothing on any race nor, apart from their 10 per cent., which is immutable, can they ever gain. This then is the respondents' [the Luncheon and Sports Club, Ltd.] position in relation to the members of the pool:—They receive the vouchers; they manipulate the machine; they collect the money which the vouchers represent; they distribute the moneys represented by the vouchers received; they guarantee the honesty of its members, and they take a percentage for their pains."

Then he deals with the rules of that particular pool, and on the opposite page he says:

> "What is the contract each member makes with the respondents? It is nothing but this: in consideration of your providing me with the use of the machine, placing at my disposal the clerical assistance, undertaking to pay me, if I win, the money other members have promised me to pay and guaranteeing the amount, you shall have 10 per cent. of my stake. In this I can see no trace of gaming or wagering with the respondents. To them the rise and fall of odds, the success or failure of a horse and all the hopes and hazards of the turf are completely immaterial. They can never lose except to the extent of discredited vouchers, and loss due to that act of dishonesty is itself independent of the race. Rowlatt, J., and Lord Hanworth, M.R., who alone decided in favour of the appellant, base their judgment on the view that the club are principals, but, even if this view were right, it does not follow they are principals in making bets. . . . A bet has been defined as something staked to be lost or won on the result of a doubtful issue, but no doubtful issue affects the respondents—they neither win nor lose on any such chance. Nor does it seem to me that the test applied by both these learned judges 'that the winners look to the club and the club to the losers' is a critical test of whether or no they made a bet. To guarantee the honesty of a gambler, though it may be taking a risk, is not making a bet."

That judgment was concurred in by Lord Sumner, Viscount Dunedin and Lord Blanesburgh.

Such being the relations subsisting between the company and its clients and between the clients inter se, where does the plaintiff find any justification for asserting that those operations, perfectly legal under Part I of the Act, are not part of the pool betting business regulated by s. 3 of the Act, but are prize competitions within s. 26? If so, who are the competitors, what is the competition, and where are the prizes? It is true that in rule 13 the word "prize" occurs, but that, it will be seen, is in connection with the goals points pool. The language used is: "In the points pool should the dividend for the second and third prize work out higher than that for the first and second prize respectively the awards will be adjusted at company's option," and in the paper Exhibit "B," par. 24, where the results of the goals points pool are tabulated, "competitors" are mentioned, and a statement is added that "Six competitors with five points share the consolation prize."

One does not compete with a man with whom a bet is made, nor does the winner regard the money paid by the loser as a prize. In my opinion, there is nothing in the Act or in the rules or procedure to justify me in holding that in operating the football pools the defendant company is conducting any competition within the mischief of s. 26.

If the costs have not been provided for, the judgment, after reciting the agreement of the parties to treat the hearing of this motion as the trial and the undertaking given by the company in relation to the goals points pool, will dismiss the action with costs to be paid by the plaintiff except in so far as they have been increased by the claim in respect of the goals points pool. The excepted costs to be paid by the company, and there will be the usual set-off.

Judgment for defendant.

Court of Appeal—Damages—Assessment by jury—Test for intervention by appellate court.

Counsel—Cross-examination—Principles of conduct.

The Court of Appeal has power to review an award of damages by a jury where no reasonable proportion exists between the assessment and the circumstances of the case. The question to be decided is whether the evidence so preponderates against the verdict as to show that it was unreasonable and unjust. If the finding of the jury is absolutely unreasonable, the Court of Appeal may consider that that shows that they have not really performed the judicial duty cast upon them, but the principle must be that the judgment upon the facts is to be the judgment of the jury and not the judgment of any other tribunal. The rule of conduct for an appellate court when considering whether a verdict should be set aside on the ground that the damages given by the jury are excessive is as nearly as possible the same as where the court is asked to set aside a verdict on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence.

Observations of Lord Fitzgerald in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (6) (1886) (11 App. Cas. 155), of Lord Halsbury (ibid., p. 156), and of Lord Esher, M.R., in Praed v. Graham (12) (1889) (24 Q.B.D. 55) applied.

Per Lord Sankey, L.C.: A protracted and irrelevant cross-examination not only adds to the cost of litigation, but it is also a waste of public time. Such a cross-examination becomes indefensible when it is conducted without restraint and the courtesy and consideration which a witness is entitled to expect in a court of law. It is not sufficient for the due administration of justice to have a learned, patient, and impartial judge. Equally with him, the solicitors who prepare the case and the counsel who present it to the court are taking part in the great task of doing justice between man and man.

Mar. 14. LORD SANKEY, L.C.—This is an appeal and cross-appeal from an order of His Majesty's Court of Appeal (England) dated March 27, 1934, varying the judgment of HAWKE, J., dated Nov. 15, 1933, after a hearing by him and a special jury.

The appellants, who were the plaintiffs in the court of first instance, are Dr. Edouard Ernest Lehwess, a French subject resident in Paris, and a British company, Mechanical and General Inventions Company, Limited, of which he is a director. The respondents, who were defendants in the court of first instance, are Sir Herbert Austin and the Austin Motor Company, Limited, Sir Herbert being the chairman of directors of that company. A firm of Stephen Watkins, Son and Groves, who are chartered patent agents and who acted for Sir Herbert and the Austin Company were also defendants in the court of first instance. The action was for damages for breach of contract and conspiracy. Substantially, the appellants relied upon two alleged agreements.

The questions raised by this appeal are: (a) Whether the Court of Appeal was right in law in setting aside a finding by the jury that there was an agreement between the appellants and the respondents, the Austin Motor Company, Limited, giving the respondent company an option for a licence under letters patent then being applied for by the appellants, upon the ground that no jury properly directed could reasonably find that there was any such agreement; and (b) whether the Court of Appeal was right in law in holding that upon the evidence only nominal damages could result from the breach by the respondents of another agreement by which certain information, to be communicated by the appellants to the respondents, relating to the said application should be used confidentially, that is, only for certain specified purposes, and in setting aside a finding of the jury that the damages resulting from the breach of such agreement were £35,000, and substituting therefor a finding of nominal damages, namely, 40s.

The appellants were patentees of a system of fitments for motor car bodies of the "sunshine roof" type, having upon May 22, 1928, applied for provisional protection in this country in respect of certain features thereof under number 14956/28. The said system was known as "the Solcar system." In July, 1928, the appellant Mr. Lehwess approached the respondent, Sir Herbert Austin, giving him certain particulars (including a mémoire descriptif and a sheet of drawings) relating to the Solcar system, with a view to interesting him in its development in this country in connection with Austin motor cars. The appellants, on Aug. 2, 1928, filed at the Patent Office a cognate provisional specification under number 22412/28 and a complete specification with claims covering both provisional specifications. Later in the same day Mr. Lehwess, at the invitation of Sir Herbert Austin, visited the works of the respondent company at Longbridge, Birmingham. The Solcar system was outlined by Mr. Lehwess to Sir Herbert Austin, and the appellants contended that as a result thereof it was agreed that certain information should be disclosed by the appellants to the respondents, and in particular the patent documents and drawings which had been filed at the Patent Office, upon the terms that such information and documents were to be used confidentially only, and were not to be disclosed to others except for the purpose of deciding whether the respondents desired to become licensees of the patent. This alleged agreement has been conveniently called the "confidence agreement."

With regard to the second alleged agreement, Mr. Lehwess and Sir Herbert Austin met on Sept. 3, 1928, and had before them a letter of Aug. 31. One of the main issues at the trial was whether at this meeting a concluded oral agreement was reached between the parties. The appellants contended that a binding agreement was reached upon the terms set out in the said letter subject to certain alterations as to the time and manner of the giving of notice by the respondent company of their intentions with respect to the exercise of the options given. This agreement has been conveniently called the "licence agreement."

The conspiracy alleged was a combination between all three defendants to commit the alleged breach of the confidence agreement. The defendants relied primarily upon a denial that either agreement had ever been made or that there had been any conspiracy.

The action was tried before Hawke, J., and a special jury in the King's Bench Division. The trial began on Oct. 18, 1933, and lasted fourteen-and-a-half days. The jury found that both agreements had been broken and that the conspiracy alleged had been entered into by Sir Herbert and the Austin company but not by the firm of Watkins. They awarded £63,550 as damages for breach of the licence agreement and £35,000 as damages for breach of the confidence agreement and for conspiracy.

The claims under the two agreements were alternative in the sense that the appellants, as they conceded, could not have suffered any damage under the breach of the confidence agreement if the licence agreement were implemented. The learned judge directed judgment to be entered for the appellants against the Austin company for £63,550 with costs, and against Sir Herbert Austin and the Austin company for £35,000 with costs, with the proviso that any sum recovered by the plaintiffs under either of the judgments should be taken to be in satisfaction pro tanto of the liability under the other judgment.

There was no evidence that the Austin company had acted in the matter through any agent other than Sir Herbert himself; but the judge allowed the finding of a conspiracy between the two to stand.

The defendant firm of Watkins was successful in the only issue in which it was involved—that of conspiracy—and judgment was entered for it with costs against the plaintiffs, but the judge ordered that the plaintiffs should recover such costs against the two unsuccessful defendants.

The unsuccessful defendants appealed and the appeal was heard before the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Slesser and Romer, L.JJ.) on and after Feb. 12, 1934, the arguments occupying ten-and-a-half days. Judgment was delivered on March 27, 1934, and was unanimous. The court set aside the judgment on the licence agreement on the ground that no jury could reasonably have found that such an agreement had been made. The court refused to disturb the finding of the jury that the confidence agreement had been made and broken, but they found that no substantial damage had been suffered by reason of the breach and reduced the amount of the judgment to 40s. The whole costs of the appeal were awarded to the appellants, and the court ordered that there should be no costs, on either side, of the proceedings in the court of first instance.

The issues were simple, namely, whether the two agreements were made, and, if so, were they broken and what were the damages? Unfortunately, however, the facts were of a somewhat complicated character, as may be gathered when one considers that the case for the appellants occupied nineteen pages of print and contained seventeen reasons why the Court of Appeal was wrong and the case for the respondents occupied no less than seventy-seven pages of print and contained thirteen reasons why the Court of Appeal was wrong on certain issues. The transcript of the proceedings before the learned judge occupies nearly 1,000 closely printed pages. I will now state the facts as briefly as possible, taking first the licence agreement.

Whether there was such an agreement depends primarily upon the interview which took place between Mr. Lehwess and Sir Herbert Austin on Sept. 3, and upon this the jury saw and heard both these gentlemen. It is enough to say that they accepted the evidence of Mr. Lehwess and did not believe the evidence of Sir Herbert Austin—a fact which is not surprising having regard to the admissions of Sir Herbert Austin made in the course of his cross-examination. No doubt, if the only material before the jury had been the evidence of these two gentlemen, it would have been open to counsel for Sir Herbert Austin to argue that his evidence should be accepted and to suggest improbabilities in the evidence of Mr. Lehwess and on that it would have been difficult to impeach a verdict for the plaintiff. The matter, however, does not entirely depend upon what took place at this interview. There is a very large amount of correspondence which has to be taken into account and carefully weighed and considered. Especially are there a number of letters in July and August of 1929 written by Mr. Lehwess which throw very great doubt upon his story. It may well be that at the time of the interview he thought that he had got an agreement with Sir Herbert Austin, but the letters point to quite an opposite conclusion. For example, a letter of July 20 from one company to the other, where Mr. Lehwess's company say, "we should like to know whether you are willing to adopt our Solcar hood licence or not. Our Mr. Lehwess, who has been conducting these negotiations personally with Sir Herbert Austin is most anxious that we should come to some final arrangement with your firm before we offer our system elsewhere." Again on July 27 Mr. Lehwess's company write: "We should be glad if you will give us an appointment at the latest towards the middle of next month to try and settle on a definite agreement in this matter." Sir Herbert Austin writes on July 30: "I am still awaiting the copies of the patent's specifications which you promised to send to me showing what rights you could give us a licence for to manufacture this type of body." And Mr. Lehwess writes on Aug. 1 to Sir Herbert Austin: "I sincerely trust that round about Aug. 15 you will be able to see me at Northfields or in London, so as to settle something regarding the manufacture of the Solcar."

Now these letters upon their face were really fatal to the contention that there was any such agreement as Mr. Lehwess no doubt thought he had concluded upon Sept. 3 in the previous year. Both gentlemen were examined and cross-examined upon these letters and no satisfactory explanation was given by Mr. Lehwess of letters which showed almost to demonstration that the agreement that he thought he had concluded had not really been arrived at. It is true that the jury found that such an agreement had been made and I should be very loath to set aside any verdict of a jury arrived at after they had seen the witnesses and heard them. I cannot help thinking, however, that in the present case, after a prolonged trial and thousands of questions in examination and cross-examination, it was impossible for the jury to have kept all the facts in their minds. Both in the Court of Appeal and in your Lordships' House we have had the advantage of a transcript of the shorthand note, a copy of all the letters and a book containing all the documents. A By one counsel or another we have been repeatedly referred to letters and to passages in the evidence which we had in front of us in order that we should see them and weigh them. If the jury had had the same advantages as we have had in this long and complicated case of having such a transcript of the evidence before them and the whole of the correspondence under their eyes, they could not have arrived at the conclusion that the licence agreement was made. I agree with the B Master of the Rolls who says that no jury properly directed could reasonably find that there was any such agreement and the verdict on this point must be set aside.

In reaching this result I must not be thought to impugn the ability of the jury to come to a proper verdict, but rather to stress the difficulty of their task. The appeal, in so far as it concerns the licence agreement, must be dismissed.

With regard to the confidence agreement, the appellants are in this position that C they have in their favour a verdict of the jury for £35,000, though a judgment of the Court of Appeal for nominal damages of 40s. only. It is unnecessary to lengthen this judgment by reciting all the facts and the considerations for or against the verdict. The real point at issue is whether there was evidence on which a jury properly directed could come to the conclusion that the confidence agreement had been made and broken. There are no such letters as there were in the case of the D licence agreement to throw any doubt upon this and there were abundant facts upon which a jury were entitled to come to the conclusion they did. I can see no misdirection by the learned judge and I again find myself in agreement with the learned Master of the Rolls where he says:

> "there is evidence given by Mr. Lehwess that the documents were sent to the E defendant Austin on the basis of an agreement that they should be treated as confidential and only used for the purpose of considering whether a licence to use the patent should be taken or not."

The one difficulty is the question of damages. Were the Court of Appeal right in setting aside the verdict of the jury, £35,000, and awarding only nominal damages of 40s.? Undoubtedly, £35,000 is a very large amount, but it must be F remembered that this was essentially a case for the jury to assess damages. If there was an agreement and if there had been a breach of it, it is very difficult to say that the jury were wrong. To begin with, it is impossible to say it was a case for nominal damages only. What are the facts? It must be remembered that the jury were entitled to take into consideration that one of the things that might have happened was that the Austin company, a great and prosperous concern, G might have taken and pushed the invention. The hood was the sort of hood which might have got a good market. It was a good proposition and it was actually put on the road and advertised by the Austin company. There was evidence as to the number of cars upon which a rival roof was placed and the profits derived therefrom. Over and above that, when the time arrived at which Mr. Lehwess's patent would have been dealt with not only was there a "slump" throughout the country, H but a rival patent had got in first. It was said that Mr. Lehwess really waited because he thought he had a licence agreement, which turned out not to be a fact, and that, therefore, he is to a very great extent the author of his own wrong or misfortune and it was due to his dilatoriness that the patent was not a success. But the learned judge told the jury that they must take this matter into account. He says:

> "To a certain extent, of course, your damages will have to be estimated, I can I see that, but they must be as near the actual truth as you can get from the evidence and, of course, I say that at this moment, I shall have to return to it, but I say that at this moment because of the minorisation or lessening of the damages from his lack of diligence, it must be very difficult."

The judge later on says:

> "Well, on whatever date you think it would have been reasonable for him to say, 'well, I am dealing with a lot of people who do not intend to carry out > their bargain and do not intend to do anything, and I must do what I can'; when you have decided in your own mind what would be a reasonable date for him to take up that attitude, you have then got the even more difficult question; that is to say, what do you think he could have made, with reasonable diligence, after that date?"

It was pointed out to the jury that if Sir Herbert Austin had turned the invention down in November instead of, as it was put in the Court of Appeal, "keeping Mr. Lehwess on a string," the plaintiffs might have been able to interest some other big motor company in their invention and to get them to take it. In other words, the plaintiffs were delayed in their exploitation by the conduct of the defendant company. All these were matters for the jury and, although, undoubtedly, the sum is a large one, in my view, this is not a case for sending the matter down for a new trial for the assessment of damages only. The jury were the proper constitutional tribunal to assess the damages and it is impossible to say they have gone so wrong that their assessment must be set aside. It is not a case merely for nominal, but for substantial damages of which the jury were the judges. In the result, the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be varied, the appeal should be allowed and the appellant company should have judgment for the sum of £35,000. I should very much hope that, to save the expense of a protracted and long discussion, the parties might agree amongst themselves as to the costs. If they do not, I am for making the following order. The plaintiffs should have the costs of the action except in so far as they have been increased by the claim under the licence agreement, which costs should be awarded to the defendants. The defendants should have the costs of the appeal to the Court of Appeal, except in so far as they were increased by their appeal against the £35,000 verdict on the confidence case, which costs should be awarded to the plaintiffs; and in this House the plaintiffs should have the costs except in so far as they have been increased by the appeal against the licence agreement, which costs should be awarded to the defendants.

I cannot part from this case without referring to the remarks made in the Court of Appeal upon the method in which it was conducted in the court of first instance. The learned Master of the Rolls said:

> "There remains one feature of this case upon which, in association with my colleagues, I desire to make serious comment—that is the cross-examination to which the leading actors on either side, Mr. Lehwess and Sir Herbert Austin, were subjected. Measured by the shorthand note, it appears that Mr. Lehwess's examination occupied eighty pages; his cross-examination occupied 265. The examination of Sir Herbert Austin occupied thirty-nine pages and his cross-examination 148 pages. There is a tedious iteration in some of the questions asked, and prolonged emphasis is laid on some matters, trivial in relation to the main issues. Cross-examination is a powerful and valuable weapon for the purpose of testing the veracity of a witness and the accuracy and completeness of his story. It is entrusted to the hands of counsel in the confidence that it will be used with discretion, and with due regard to the assistance to be rendered by it to the Court, not forgetting at the same time the burden that is imposed upon the witness. We desire to say that in our opinion the cross-examination in the present case did not conform to the above conditions, and at times it failed to display that measure of courtesy to the witness which is by no means inconsistent with a skilful, yet powerful, cross-examination."

With that censure I agree, except that I cannot think it can be justly applied to the counsel who appeared on behalf of the plaintiffs or to any of the counsel who appeared at the Bar of your Lordships' House. It is right to make due allowance for the irritation caused by the strain and stress of a long and complicated case, but a protracted and irrelevant cross-examination not only adds to the cost of litigation, but is a waste of public time. Such a cross-examination becomes indefensible when it is conducted, as it was in this case, without restraint and without the courtesy and consideration which a witness is entitled to expect in a court of law. It is not sufficient for the due administration of justice to have a learned, patient and impartial judge. Equally with him, the solicitors who prepare the case and the counsel who present it to the court are taking part in the great task of doing justice between man and man.

LORD BLANESBURGH.—Except only upon one question, I find myself in full accord with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in everything he has said. I have been privileged to read his judgment in print. Subject to that one reservation I would, if I may, without another word in support of them, associate myself with all its conclusions. As a result of these very little of the jury's original verdict remains in being. Their significant finding on the conspiracy issue against the respondents alone, to the exclusion of Mr. Watkins and his firm, did not survive the Court of Appeal. It was not revived in this House. Their findings on the licence agreement are now finally set aside. Their assessment of damages at the sum of £63,550 for breach of that agreement shares, of course, the fate of the agreement itself. It may remain significant for illustrative purposes. But that is all. The verdict upon the confidence agreement stands. That my noble and learned friend leaves intact. It is there my difficulty arises. I regret that I cannot go so far. As in duty bound and with no reluctance I accept the finding that there was such an agreement and that it was broken by the respondents to the extent found by the jury. There was evidence to justify them in so finding. But their assessment of damages for that breach at £35,000, is, in my considered judgment, an assessment incapable of justification. It can, I believe, be shown affirmatively, and what follows is an attempt on my part to show, that, applying the language of FITZGERALD, J., approved by PALLES, C.B., in M'Grath v. Bourne (1) no reasonable proportion exists between the assessment and the circumstances of the case. If that be so (it may be a large "if," I agree), but if it be so, then especially, in a case like this where the damages assessed are for breach of contract and not in tort, it will hardly, I take it, be gainsaid that in a court of review, such an assessment will not be allowed to stand.

The verdict of the jury in question now was not a verdict at large. This assessment of damages was based upon their own answers to specific questions submitted to them. Its real meaning can only, I think, be fully appreciated if the range of these questions with the answers be kept clearly in view. The questions on this as on all other issues were agreed by counsel on both sides and accepted by the learned judge as the only questions upon which the jury's assistance was required. It would overburden a judgment like this again to set forth at length those now relevant. It will suffice to describe as the result of both question and answer the situation with reference to which in relation to the confidence agreement the jury were required to assess damages.

(a) There was nothing to be taken as confidential between the appellants and the respondents except in relation to the "plaintiffs' specification and drawings," i.e., their draft complete specification and drawings deposited at the Patent Office on Aug. 2, 1928, and accepted with slight modification on Nov. 22, 1929.

(b) The breach of confidence complained of and found consisted exclusively in the taking out by Sir Herbert Austin of the Letters Patent No. 320486 applied for on Sept. 8, 1928, and accepted on Oct. 12, 1929.

(c) It was in respect of that breach and that breach only that the assessment of damages was called for.

And there was something more. There were two heads, and two only, under which the appellants were alleged to have been damaged by the respondents' breach, (a) they were thereby delayed in the exploitation of their construction: and (b) they were thereby prevented from entering into a formal licence agreement with the respondent company. This second allegation in the amended statement of claim was, except for the addition of the word "formal," a survival of one in the original statement of claim in which the existence of a licence agreement was not alleged, and ROMER, L.J., I see, so construes the amended pleading as to exclude this second allegation from consideration in relation to the confidence agreement. But although its original application was to something quite different, the allegation appears to have been treated at the trial as applicable to a breach of the confidence agreement. And I will so regard it.

The question, therefore, is whether an award of £35,000 as damages under heads (a) and (or) (b) for the only breach as alleged and found of the only confidence reposed in the respondents, also as found, can be justified? Does any reasonable proportion exist between that assessment and the circumstances of the case—to repeat the Irish judicial test?

There are two "circumstances of the case" which are important to be remembered now. The breach of confidence was in respect only of the terms of the appellants' British patent which until that patent was accepted on Nov. 22, 1929, had not been published to the world. The licence agreement was to be for an exclusive licence of that patent for its full term under minimum royalties, but with no covenant on the part of the licensees either to work or develop the invention. The value to the appellants of such an agreement under which the whole beneficial interest in the patent would have passed to the respondents was hailed by Dr. Lehwess himself in his letter to Mr. Jameau of Sept. 3, 1928, as being £75,000—the amount of the minimum royalties extending over the whole sixteen years of the patent. The value of these royalties at the date of the writ was at the trial agreed at £39,900. That is one circumstance. The second is that on June 10, 1930, the appellants pressed upon the respondents for their acceptance a proposal to sell their whole patent rights for £1,000 a year over sixteen years, payments, that is to say, with a present value of probably not more than £11,000. With these two circumstances remembered, each of the jury's assessments of damages asks for criticism—the first assessment, of course, being only now relevant as throwing some light on the second. But the facts are that while the whole present value to the appellants of the licence agreement on the terms that the whole beneficial interest in the patent rights had passed to the respondents was £39,900, the jury awarded to the appellants £63,550 as damages for repudiation by the respondents of that contract, and on the footing that all the patent rights remained with the appellants: while they awarded to the appellants in respect of the breach of the confidence agreement the sum already stated of £35,000—which either by accident or design is seven-eighths of the value at the date of the writ of the minimum royalties payable under the licence agreement, i.e., £34,975, with £25 added to make a round figure, and again on the terms that the patent rights remain with the appellants—the assessment being £24,000 above the price asked by the appellants in June, 1930, for their entire interest in the patent.

But it is not necessary to rely upon such general considerations, striking as they seem to be. It is safer to consider this present assessment in detail. It is one that can be tested.

And it is convenient to deal first with the second allegation already stated, namely, that as a result of the respondents' breach the appellants were delayed in the exploitation of their construction and were prevented from entering into a formal licence agreement with the respondent company. It is hardly, I think, open to doubt that the sum of £35,000 at which the jury quantified the appellants' damages in respect of the confidence agreement resulted from their acceptance of the view that, owing to the taking out of the Austin letters patent, the appellants lost the chance they would otherwise have had of an acceptance by the respondent company of a licence in the terms specified in the licence agreement. That £35,000, as the sum quantified, is not a mere coincidence, is a conclusion I could elaborate if it were necessary. But it is really unimportant whether the explanation already offered of the jury's figure is more than a guess. The real question is whether an award of damages on this head for any sum at all can be justified.

Owing possibly to some error in the shorthand note the learned judge's direction to the jury here is not quite clear. The passage is as follows, and will be found at p. 233:

> "Sir Stafford [Cripps] tabulated his claims, and one of the things he suggested was loss of a contract with Sir Herbert Austin. Well on this part of the case —I am not now talking about the licence at all—there is not any agreement by Sir Herbert to make a contract with the plaintiffs and Mr. Pritt is quite right in saying that you must not take that into consideration. Of course, if the plaintiffs had had a chance and assuming that they have lost that chance because in breach of contract the defendants have taken it from them, why then it may be that if that chance had not been taken away the public demand for these cars might have become so great it may be that Sir Herbert or his company would have been driven to using them. You must take that into consideration."

Now, here the learned judge does seem to direct the jury that loss resulting from Sir Herbert Austin's refusal to enter into an agreement with the appellants must not be considered, but if his further observations amounted to a direction to them to take this so-called "chance" into consideration it was, I suggest to your Lordships, a serious misdirection. For it is, I submit, clear that the taking out by Sir Herbert of his patent could in reason have had no connection with or influence upon the question whether or not the respondents should take a licence from the appellants. It is not only that there is no evidence, so far as I can find, that the existence of his own patent influenced Sir Herbert Austin at all in his decision that his company should not take a licence. His own evidence was that he abandoned the whole idea of the appellants' construction because in his view it was not wanted in the market and was in itself unsatisfactory. But apart from all evidence does it not stand to reason that the taking out of this patent of his own could have had no influence upon his decision?

He did not, by taking out a patent subsequent in date to the appellants', annex the appellants' construction or any part of it or strengthen his or his company's position as against the appellants in any way. His patent in this respect even if it made claims included in the appellants' specification gave him as against them no rights which he did not possess without one. His taking out of his patent made a licence from the appellants neither more nor less desirable for the respondent company from a business point of view than it had been before. Apart from the extravagance of such a sum as £35,000 being the measure of damages on this head —a subject to which I have already alluded—I suggest to your Lordships that an award of any damages at all on this score is quite inadmissible.

In this result I find myself in agreement with the Master of the Rolls. Nor can I find any answer to Romer, L.J., when he says:

> "Neither the defendant Austin nor the defendant company can be made liable to the plaintiffs in damages because the company refused to enter into a licence agreement with the plaintiffs whatever may have been the reason for that refusal."

But, although this claim of the appellants may well have been the real basis of the jury's assessment, little was made of it in this House. Here the assessment was mainly sought to be justified on the first head pleaded—that of delay. The registration of the Austin patent on the file of the Patent Office it was said was a complete bar while it continued to the exploitation of the appellants' construction, and by the time that patent was removed every possibility of marketing the appellants' monopoly had disappeared. An award of £35,000 on that head could be justified: for as a result of the appellants' delay in exploitation due to the registration of Sir Herbert's patent the appellants' patent had become worthless. It will be seen that this claim is alternative to the first. The two claims are not concurrent.

Now there are many answers to these contentions, if in truth they were ever even considered by the jury, which I gravely doubt.

First of all the assertion that his patent was, even at the time of the trial, worthless was one that Dr. Lehwess would not have permitted himself to make. But the final answer is that if it had become worthless and if its worthlessness was due to delay in exploitation, that delay was in no way attributable to the registration of the Austin patent or to any interference with the appellants' activities by reason of its existence. On Dec. 10, 1929, so soon as Mr. Watkins heard of the acceptance of the appellants' patent he intimated Sir Herbert's intention to withdraw all competing claims from his patent accepted a month or so earlier. On Jan. 10, 1931, Sir Herbert consented to a revocation of his patent; but this consent was not accepted by the appellants, as they claimed to have the patent registered in their name, a claim which failed but which delayed the formal revocation of the patent until July, 1931. It is difficult to suppose in these circumstances that the appellants were ever delayed in the exploitation of their patent by the presence on the register of the respondent's patent—one subsequent in date and with all competing claims withdrawn. Some reason for their failure to exploit their system which, to the great surprise of the learned judge, Dr. Lehwess stated continued up to the trial in November, 1933, must be looked for, and I suggest to your Lordships that if it did not result from doubts as to its monopoly value it was due to the fact that the appellants so soon as they realised that the respondents had abandoned the projected licence agreement, set themselves by negotiations to induce them to enter into a fresh agreement even to purchase their patent outright. They always expected, said Mr. Negon, to come to such an arrangement. But to be able to do so it was essential that they should retain their patent rights intact so that they might be included either in a sale or in a licence to the respondents, could such be arranged. I have been at a loss to understand, as I have said, how failure to negotiate successfully for a sale or licence to the respondents could be attributable to the existence of Sir Herbert's patent: I am at a loss here to understand how any damage can be claimed to result from the appellants' inability to negotiate for sale in another direction when that inability was the necessary accompaniment of their abortive negotiations with the respondents by which they hoped to benefit.

It was asked whether a plaintiff was to be prejudiced by an attempt to settle. Surely not. But if he considers it to be to his interest to make that attempt and as a term incident to its success it is necessary that he do not offer the subject of negotiation elsewhere, a claim for damages for any loss thereby sustained on that score is like a gambler seeking a return of his stake after he has lost his bet. I suggest to your Lordships that no kind of damage on this head was proved traceable to the existence of the Austin patent—certainly none that had any relation to such a sum as £35,000.

The jury in this case were clearly of opinion that the appellants had been shabbily treated by Sir Herbert Austin. They doubtless enjoyed his polite but severe cross-examination just as much as they resented the attack on the veracity of Dr. Lehwess made also in cross-examination. They resented such a cross-examination at the instance of the respondents. They were warned by the learned judge not to punish the respondents. Their verdict in nearly every part of it indicates in my eyes that the warning was unheeded. The exoneration from the charge of conspiracy of Mr. Watkins and the impossible finding of a conspiracy between Sir Herbert and himself under the alias of his company: the two assessments of damage with no feature in common except the magnitude of their amount all indicate this to me.

I hold no brief for either Sir Herbert or his company in this matter. Had I been sitting in a court of honour I would not in relation to his conduct have discriminated too closely between the mémoire descriptif with Fig. 1 and the draft complete specification. I would have seen in each and not in one more than the other an obligation in honour on the part of Sir Herbert not to utilise for his own purposes any information thereby disclosed to him for the first time without at least informing the appellants of his intention so to do. But the jury were not sitting as a court of honour. The punishment of the respondents for any offence was beyond their province. The endowment of the appellants out of the proceeds was even more indefensible. The proper compensation of the appellants for any legal wrong alleged and proved to have been done them by the respondents was their only duty. And I conceive it to be one of the most important functions of the court in any case in which it finds that a jury has yielded to the besetting weakness, disclosed, as I think, here, to correct it. If it were to hesitate in the exercise of that function, a jury in civil cases would soon become a tribunal for the punishment of defendants for other than legal wrongs committed or for the denial to plaintiffs of their legal rights, and all according to the length of its own foot, instead of being, as in this case it alone was, a tribunal for compensating the appellants for legal wrong suffered by them at the hands of the respondents.

This assessment should, therefore, I think, be set aside as excessive and unreasonable, but I am not prepared to say, as did the Court of Appeal, that no damage has been proved. I am not therefore ready to support their order for nominal damages only. That does not mean, however, that the issues on the confidence agreement shall all be sent for a new trial. It only means that, following the precedent set by this House in Tolley v. J. S. Fry & Sons, Ltd. (2), the new trial will be one confined strictly in its scope to an assessment of damages on this head. Fortunately this should be a simple inquiry enough, one that need not be either heated or prolonged in the circumstances which I find existing. I note also that both the appellants and the respondents unite in proposing the adoption of that course. The appellants make the suggestion in their printed case and the respondents in theirs.

I will close with the citation of an authoritative statement of the function of the court in cases of this kind which is to be found in Johnston v. Great Western Rail. Co. (3) where Vaughan Williams, L.J., says ([1904] 2 K.B. at p. 254):

> "If the court from the circumstances of the case and the amount of damages can draw the inference that the jury must have applied a wrong measure of damages in contravention of the direction of the judge, the court may order a new trial, although it is not in a position to say that the mere quantum of excess is so large that no reasonable jury could have arrived at such an amount."

And, my Lords, I have reached the conclusion, satisfactory at all events to my own mind, that the inference referred to by the Lord Justice is, in this case, inevitable.

LORD ATKIN.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinion read by the Lord Chancellor and the opinion about to be read by my noble and learned friend Lord Wright, and, as I agree with their reasoning and conclusions, I should have added nothing were it not that we are differing in one respect from the decision of the Court of Appeal. On the important question as to the duty of an appellate court when dealing with the verdict of a jury, I desire to endorse in every respect the detailed exposition contained in the opinion of Lord Wright. I would only desire to add that once it has been decided that a civil case has to be tried by a jury, that tribunal and that tribunal alone is the judge of fact, and no appellate court can substitute its own findings for those of the lawful tribunal. An appellate court has a revising function to see, first, whether there is any evidence in support of the issue found by the jury; and, secondly, whether the verdict can stand having regard to the considerations which I will not re-state lest I should appear to seek to vary the expressions in the two opinions I have mentioned. If in the latter kind of dispute it is obvious that no verdict for the plaintiff on all the available evidence could be supported the court may save the waste of time in ordering a new trial which could have only one possible result by ordering the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant. I do not think that the rules of court go beyond that: and, if they did, I should doubt whether they would be within the rule-making power.

In the present case as far as the licence agreement is concerned it appears to me that the finding of the jury is inconsistent with and impossible to reconcile with ascertained facts, namely, the contemporaneous correspondence, and, therefore, cannot stand.

I do not think that this decision should throw any doubt on the correctness of the finding of the jury on the other facts of the case. It is plain that they accepted Dr. Lehwess as in substance a witness of truth. His bona fides in maintaining that the parties had come to an agreement on important points at the interview on Sept. 3 was made manifest by the terms of a contemporaneous letter to a business associate in Paris, rightly admitted in the circumstances by the trial judge. But it is plain from the correspondence that Dr. Lehwess did not, in fact, consider that the measure of agreement, large as it was, which the parties had reached in conversation, was sufficient in itself to constitute a contract by which the parties were bound. The documents which are referred to by the Lord Chancellor and LORD WRIGHT make it clear that he did not consider the Austin company bound. In these circumstances the letters plainly show that there was no contract and the jury's verdict that there was cannot stand. It is the kind of evidence in respect of which any jury is at a disadvantage in a complicated case involving many disputed allegations of fact and a correspondence extending over many months. It can hardly be said that the jury lose sight of the documents, for they barely see them. It is not surprising in the circumstances that even a competent special jury may have failed to notice the compelling significance of the written word.

On the other branch of the case I can find no facts uncontroverted or incontrovertible which justify an appellate court in interfering with the verdict. There was ample evidence to support the finding of contract and breach. I am inclined to think that too much importance was attached to the supposed intrinsic confidential nature of the information disclosed. It is quite sufficient to support the contract averred that the terms upon which the information was disclosed were that it was to be used for a particular purpose only. The giving of the information is ample consideration, and use for any other purpose would be a breach. The analogy of a contract of bailment I think supports this view. The confidential nature of the information, the fact that it was not known, and could not be known to members of the public, would in this view be relevant to damages rather than to formation of the contract. But in any case here there was ample evidence upon which the jury could find both the contract put to them and the breach, a breach instantaneous, surreptitious, and made for the advantage of the defendant who was specially qualified to form an opinion as to the value of the information which he was wrongfully using. I find it impossible to agree that the damages which flowed from the breach of the contract were only nominal. The members of the Court of Appeal, with respect, attached too much importance to the isolated expressions of Dr. Lehwess that he considered himself bound by the licence agreement and on that account refrained from exploiting his patent. It is unstable ground in view of the fact that the Court of Appeal also took the view, shared by your Lordships, that, in fact, Dr. Lehwess did not consider himself bound, and that for that reason the verdict on the licence agreement must be set aside. But, in fact, Dr. Lehwess could very properly treat himself as bound to the Austin company for commercial purposes by a very close negotiation intentionally long drawn out while all the time the defendant Austin was secretly busy availing himself of the plaintiff's information in obtaining patents for himself in England and all over the globe. The jury were entitled to find a substantial period of time after discovery of the breach in which Dr. Lehwess was entitled to hold his hand. There was also evidence that the Lehwess invention was of value, that the plaintiff lost a market which would have been available for him at the time and that the rewards of a successful invention of the type would be very great. It was pointed out that in one year the output of the Austin factories alone was about 60,000 saloon cars, out of which about 49,000 were fitted with what was then a competing sunshine roof. I have not to consider whether I myself would have found so large a sum. The amount of damages was a matter peculiarly fit for determination by a jury and I see no reason to set their decision aside. I also wish to express my agreement with the concluding remarks of the Lord Chancellor, and particularly with his statement that no censure was deserved in any respect by counsel who appeared at the trial on behalf of the plaintiffs. I agree with the motion proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I concur.

LORD WRIGHT.—I have had an opportunity of considering in print the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I am in complete agreement with everything that is said in that opinion, and merely proceed to add a few observations because of the important questions raised in regard to the functions of an appellate court when dealing with the verdict of a jury.

I concur with the Court of Appeal in the conclusion that the jury's verdict in respect of what has just been described as "the licence agreement" should be set aside. I do so for the reasons set out by the Lord Chancellor which seem to me to bring the case within the language used by LORD ATKINSON in Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (4) in reference to Allcock v. Hall (5). What LORD ATKINSON said ([1918] A.C. at p. 678) was that in that case:

> "on an application for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, the Court of Appeal, applying the principle laid down in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (6), set aside the verdict, holding that it was utterly irreconcilable with the evidence in the case when reasonably considered."

He describes ([1918] A.C. at p. 679) another case in which the Court of Appeal set aside the verdict of a jury on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence as being a case where the court acted on the basis that it was one where there was conflicting evidence, but an overwhelming balance of it on one side. That was Millar v. Toulmin (7), where, however, on appeal this House took a different view and restored the verdict of the jury (Toulmin v. Millar (7)). In the present case it is clear that the jury believed the evidence given by Dr. Lehwess to the effect that an agreement had been orally concluded; there was accordingly evidence on which they could so find. Indeed, as the Lord Chancellor has explained, it seems clear that Dr. Lehwess himself honestly believed that he had made the agreement, though no doubt at certain periods he thought the contrary. The Lord Chancellor has pointed out how easy it might be for even a careful jury to give undue weight to that evidence and forget that it was completely irreconcilable with the totality of the evidence in the case, in particular with the conduct and statements of Dr. Lehwess himself. His conduct was in truth quite inconsistent on a careful contemplation of the documents with there having been the agreement which he subsequently alleged and sought to establish at the trial; equally inconsistent were his letters, to some of which the Lord Chancellor has referred, and if I may take one further instance of inconsistency, I may refer to the statutory declaration which Dr. Lehwess made in the proceedings for the revocation of Sir Herbert Austin's patent. In that declaration he stated: "On Sept. 3, 1928 (the date on which the oral agreement was afterwards alleged to have been made), the draft agreement was discussed with Sir Herbert Austin and generally agreed upon." It is on the ground of this inherent inconsistency of Dr. Lehwess's own story when the totality of the material, oral and documentary, is considered that I think the verdict of the jury on this matter cannot stand. I do not so decide simply because I myself should have come to a different conclusion, or that the verdict of the jury is one which on a mere balance of evidence does not appear to me to be reasonable. The appellate court is never the judge of fact in a case where the constitutional judge of fact is the jury.

For the appellate court to set aside the verdict of a jury as being against the weight of evidence merely because the court does not agree with it, would, in my judgment, be to usurp the functions of the jury and to substitute their own opinion for that of the jury; that would be quite wrong. Much more is necessary in order to justify the setting aside of a jury's verdict where there is some evidence to support it. No doubt, the test can be roughly described as being whether the verdict of the jury was reasonable, but what is meant by reasonable in this connection, must be carefully defined. I shall not seek to make an anthology of the epithets applied in the authorities to the word "reasonable" in order to warn appellate courts that they must not act merely on what appears to them, on a reading of the shorthand notes, to be a conclusion more reasonable than that arrived at by the jury. The right and duty of the court to control the verdicts of juries was recognised in early days; thus in 1655 in Wood v. Gunston (8), Glyn, C.J., said (Sty. 466):

> "It is in the discretion of the court in some cases to grant a new trial, but this must be a judicial but not an arbitrary discretion and it is frequent in our books for the court to take notice of miscarriage of juries and to grant new trials upon them."

And in Barker v. Dixie (9) it was said:

> "New trials came in the room only of attaints as a more expeditious and easy remedy."

The objection in Wood v. Gunston (8) was that the damages were excessive, and a new trial was there ordered. The use of the phrase "miscarriage of juries" is significant. It indicates what there must be to justify the appellate court in interfering with or controlling the verdicts of juries. Since then many cases have been reported on these matters, but I think most useful guidance to help the appellate court is to be found in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (6). Lord Fitzgerald (11 App. Cas. at p. 155) states the question to be:

> "whether the evidence so preponderates against the verdict as to show that it was unreasonable and unjust" and he adds that the onus is on the appellants to establish that this condition is fulfilled. But the most illuminating statement is, I think, to be found in the observations of Lord Halsbury (11 App. Cas. at p. 156). He refers to Solomon v. Bitton (10), where the question, according to the report (the correctness of which was afterwards disputed in Webster v. Friedeberg (11)), was stated to be "whether the verdict was such as reasonable men ought not to have come to." Lord Halsbury said that was an erroneous statement of the principle. He proceeded:

> "If a court not a Court of Appeal in which the facts are open for original judgment, but a court which is not a court to review facts at all, can grant a new trial whenever it thinks that reasonable men ought to have found another verdict, it seems to me that they must form and act upon their own view of what the evidence in their judgment proves. That, I think, is not the law. . . . I think the test of reasonableness, in considering the verdict of a jury, is right enough, in order to understand whether the jury have really done their duty. If their finding is absolutely unreasonable, a court may consider that that shows that they have not really performed the judicial duty cast upon them; but the principle must be that the judgment upon the facts is to be the judgment of the jury and not the judgment of any other tribunal. If the word 'might' were substituted for 'ought to' in Solomon v. Bitton (10), I think the principle would be accurately stated."

Lord Halsbury, in these valuable observations, is, I think, going back to the test applied in Wood v. Gunston (8), which was whether there was a miscarriage of the jury. Thus, the question in truth is not whether the verdict appears to the appellate court to be right, but whether it is such as to show that the jury have failed to perform their duty. An appellate court must always be on guard against the tendency to set aside a verdict because the court feels it would have come to a different conclusion.

A In this case, on these principles and for the reasons which I have indicated, but which are more fully set out in the speech of the Lord Chancellor, I think the appellants in the Court of Appeal (the respondents in this House) satisfied the onus which always rests on appellants who seek to set aside the verdict of a jury as being against the weight of evidence. The balance of the evidence was overwhelmingly in their favour and the totality of the evidence of Dr. Lehwess, oral and documentary, was irreconcilable with that part of his evidence which asserted B the oral agreement. The verdict was one which the jury, however comprehensible in all the circumstances their decision might be, were not competent to find, that is, "might" not find, on the evidence.

On the second and alternative issue in the case, what has conveniently been called "the confidence agreement," I, like the Lord Chancellor, concur with the conclusions of the Court of Appeal until I come to the question of damages. On C this question it is all-important to note carefully the exact terms of the answer of the jury to Question 7. By that answer the jury found that the information was used in breach of the confidence agreement by the defendants for the purpose of securing for the defendant Austin patent protection in respect of the plaintiff's construction or some substantial part thereof by taking out letters patent No. 320486. Apart from any question of damages, it is immaterial how or why the D respondents committed a breach of that agreement, but in relation to damages the essence of that finding is that the abuse of the confidential information which constituted the breach was not by inadvertence but was deliberate, and with the object of securing a patent covering substantially the plaintiff's construction; that finding involves an intention on the part of the respondents to do what must necessarily prejudice the appellants in their endeavour to exploit their own patent E for their profit. It seems on the evidence to be established that what the respondents did had that effect. The whole evidence on this issue has been examined before your Lordships, and is summarised by the Lord Chancellor. It is ample to support the finding of the jury that there was this disingenuous design on the part of the respondents thus to benefit themselves at the expense of the appellants and by an abuse of confidence; it is clear that all this was concealed from the F appellants, who were systematically induced to think that the respondents were contemplating the purchase from the appellants of a licence under the appellants' patent, at least up to December, 1929; when they discovered what had been going on the appellants were placed in a difficult position. Substantial damage to the appellants must, it seems, have been inevitable. The jury were, as the Lord Chancellor explains, properly directed and had all the facts fully before them. In G considering their award on damages, that view of the evidence most favourable to their finding must be taken, not the view most adverse to it if or where two views are competent. It is true that the damages awarded ran into big figures, but damages cannot be treated as excessive merely because they are large. Excess implies some standard which has been exceeded. It is true that the damages could not be arrived at otherwise than by estimate and conjecture; but that was H because the respondents' own conduct had made it impossible to put to practical test during the period of delay complained of, the money value of the appellants' invention. As to definite figures, the jury had before them, besides the other considerations adverted to by the Lord Chancellor, the fact that in a single year the respondents had paid (to another concern) £5,000 in royalties under a non-exclusive licence to use on their cars a type of "sunshine" roof competing with that patented I by the appellants.

I cannot agree with the Court of Appeal that the damages were nominal. Their reasoning is, in my opinion, on lines too narrow to accord with the realities of the situation. My only doubt has been whether the amount found by the jury was so large as to make it necessary after three prolonged hearings to order yet a further trial which would in that case be limited to the question of damages. I have had some difficulty on this matter. I do not in the least say that I should have awarded the same amount myself. But that is not the relevant consideration.

Most of the reported cases on the question of excessive damages are naturally cases of tort; in contract the damages are generally capable of more or less precise ascertainment, though it sometimes happens—as here—that they must be matter of conjecture. But in general in contract a new trial is ordered if at all, because of some error in law. But where there is no error in law the principles are well stated by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Praed v. Graham (12), where he said (24 Q.B.D. at p. 55):

> "The rule of conduct for the appellate court when considering whether a verdict should be set aside on the ground that the damages given by the jury are excessive, is as nearly as possible the same as where the court is asked to set aside a verdict on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence."

LORD ESHER adds that the court cannot set aside the verdict merely because it is larger than they themselves would have given, but only if

> "having regard to all the circumstances of the case the damages are so excessive that no twelve men could reasonably have given them."

He treats that statement as equivalent to the definition given by FITZGERALD, J., and approved by PALLES, C.B., in M'Grath v. Bourne (1) ([1876] I.R. 10 C.L. at p. 164), that to justify setting aside the verdict on the ground of excessive damages

> "the amount should be such that no reasonable proportion existed between it and the circumstances of the case."

LORD ESHER's statement of principle was approved by another master of the common law, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Johnston v. Great Western Rail. Co. (3).

These tests seem to me to correspond to the tests which I have sought to apply in considering the verdict of the jury on the licence agreement. But whereas in the former matter I find that the verdict was one the jury could not "reasonably" find because it involved an irreconcilability or want of proportion between it and the whole circumstances of the case, I do not find in the verdict on damages any such irreconcilability or want of proportion between these damages and the whole circumstances of the case. On the question of damages the respondents have not satisfied me that the verdict was one which was "unreasonable" in the sense that the jury "might" not come to it, or one which was against the overwhelming balance of the evidence. Nor can I find that the jury were partial or perverse; and, again, I should desire to quote and apply here the observation which LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., made in Tolley v. J. S. Fry & Sons, Ltd. (2) ([1931] A.C. at p. 341) in reference to that case:

> "I cannot see in the facts of this case any ground for saying that the amount of the damages awarded is so excessive as to warrant the inference that the jury took a biased or mistaken view of the whole case."

Thus, applying mutatis mutandis the same principle to the verdict of the jury on the question of damages as I applied on the question of the licence agreement, I conclude that the verdict on damages should not be interfered with.

I may add that the order of the Court of Appeal on the issue of the licence agreement not merely setting aside the verdict of the jury, but ordering judgment to be entered upon it was, in my opinion, justified under Order LVIII, r. 4. That course was followed in Banbury v. Bank of Montreal (4), where the verdict of the jury for the plaintiff being set aside, judgment was entered by the appellate court for the defendants. That was a case where the verdict was set aside on the ground that there was no evidence at all to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, but I think it is clear that under rule 4 the same course is competent where the verdict is set aside as being against the weight of evidence; in this respect no distinction can be drawn between the two grounds for setting aside a verdict. That was the opinion of the Court of Appeal in Allcock v. Hall (5), where judgment was entered for the defendant not because there was no evidence at all to support the verdict but because the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. In Millar v. Toulmin (7) the Court of Appeal had gone further and entered judgment for the plaintiff after setting aside the verdict as being against the weight of the evidence. When this House reversed that judgment in Toulmin v. Millar (7), Lord Halsbury expressed a doubt whether rule 4 gives jurisdiction to the Court of Appeal to find a verdict for themselves. I should venture to think that for the court so to do would amount, not to controlling, but superseding the jury and exercising the function of affirmatively finding the facts. Apart from Millar v. Toulmin (7), I know of no case where this course has been taken. I agree with the observations on this point of my noble and learned friend Lord Atkin. But with him I think it is clear that the order of the Court of Appeal in the present case so far as it deals with the issue under the licence agreement is justified under Order LVIII, r. 4.

On the whole case I desire to concur with the motion proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Appeal allowed in part.

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Discharge—Adultery—Pendency of divorce suit—Issue of adultery—Ouster of justices' jurisdiction—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict., c. 39), s. 7.

Where a charge of adultery is made in a court of summary jurisdiction and at the same time the Divorce Court is seised, either directly or by necessary implication, of that issue, magistrates have no jurisdiction to decide the issue so long as the suit in which it is raised is pending in the Divorce Court.

In July, 1931, a wife was granted by magistrates a maintenance order on the ground of her husband's wilful neglect to provide her with reasonable maintenance. On Jan. 18, 1935, the husband issued a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, for the discharge of the order on the ground of the wife's alleged adultery. On Feb. 26 the wife filed a petition for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's alleged adultery with a named woman. On March 5, 1935, the husband's summons came before the justices who found the adultery of the wife proved and discharged the maintenance order.

Held: the finding of the magistrates must be set aside on the ground that they should not have proceeded to a determination of the matter after their attention had been called to the conflict of jurisdiction. The case would be remitted to them for re-hearing, but that re-hearing should be stayed until the determination by the Divorce Court of the issue of the wife's adultery.

Per Sir Boyd Merriman, P.: The moment a decree nisi has been pronounced on a finding that a wife has been guilty of adultery it is at once open to magistrates to apply that finding on any application, whether already subsisting or newly made, for the discharge of a maintenance order previously made by them, and to do so without further evidence than is required to show that the adultery found is subsequent to their order. If that finding were finally reversed, a fresh order could be made by the magistrates in the wife's favour, while, if a new trial were ordered, she could get alimony pendente lite.

Semble.—S. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which enables magistrates to refuse to make an order where the case would be more conveniently dealt with by the High Court does not apply to a plaint for the discharge of a maintenance order on the ground of a wife's adultery.

Appeal by the wife from the decision of the Wealdstone (Middlesex) magistrates discharging a maintenance order made in her favour on July 20, 1931.

The parties were married in 1928 and there were two children. In July, 1931, the wife was granted by the magistrates at Wealdstone a maintenance order on the ground of her husband's wilful neglect to provide her with reasonable maintenance, he being ordered to pay her 30s. a week and 10s. a week for each of the two children, the custody of whom was granted to her. On Jan. 18, 1935, the husband issued a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, for the discharge of the order on the ground of the wife's adultery. A week later the wife signed a petition for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's alleged adultery with a named woman. There was no admission of adultery on her part by way of a plea for the exercise of the discretion, and that petition, which was filed on Feb. 26, remained pending. On March 5, 1935, the husband's plaint, which had been adjourned on Jan. 29, was heard. The wife denied adultery, and on her behalf the jurisdiction of the magistrates was challenged in view of the pending divorce suit. After hearing the evidence the magistrates found the adultery of the wife proved and discharged the maintenance order. On the next day the wife's petition was served on the husband. The wife appealed from the magistrates' decision and asked the Divisional Court either to set it aside or to remit the case to the justices for a re-hearing on the grounds: (i) that the justices had no jurisdiction and (ii) that they were wrong on the facts and in law in discharging the order.

S. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, provides that:

> "No orders shall be made under this Act on the application of a married woman if it shall be proved that such married woman has committed an act of adultery: Providing that there has been no condonation, connivance, or conduct conducing on the part of the husband."

S. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, empowers magistrates to alter, vary, or discharge a maintenance order on cause being shown on fresh evidence, and provides as follows:

> ". . . If any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made under this Act . . . shall commit an act of adultery, such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged."

Under s. 2 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, magistrates may refuse to discharge an order if such adultery was conduced to by the failure of the husband to make such payments as in the opinion of the court he was able to make under the order.

S. 10 of the same Act provides:

> "If in the opinion of a court of summary jurisdiction the matters in question between the parties or any of them would be more conveniently dealt with by the High Court, the court of summary jurisdiction may refuse to make an order under this Act, and in such case no appeal shall lie from the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction: Provided always, that the High Court or a judge thereof shall have power by order in any proceeding in the High Court relating to or comprising the same subject matter as the application so refused as aforesaid, or any part thereof, to direct the court of summary jurisdiction to rehear and determine the same."

Cur. adv. vult.

June 7. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P.—At the hearing before the magistrates the solicitor for the wife took the point that the court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, or to make the order asked for, and he cited in support of this proposition R. v. Middlesex Justices, Ex parte Bond (1) and Higgs v. Higgs (2). The court ruled that they had jurisdiction to hear the case, heard the evidence as to the wife's adultery at length, found that it was proved, and discharged the order of July, 1931, accordingly. The wife then appealed to this court to set aside the order of March, 1935, on the ground that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to make the order, or, alternatively, that the decision was wrong on the facts. As regards the latter ground, I propose to say no more than that, as at present advised, I am not prepared to accept this contention. Having regard to the view which I take on the question of jurisdiction, it would be most undesirable that this court should express any opinion on the evidence. At the same time the point with regard to the jurisdiction of the magistrates appears with full force if it is assumed as an hypothesis, but for the purposes of the argument only, that their decision would not be reversed on the evidence heard by them and submitted to this court.

The question, stated broadly, is whether magistrates have jurisdiction to decide the issue of a wife's alleged adultery at a time when there is pending in this court a suit between the spouses in which that very issue must necessarily be decided. It is true that in the divorce suit in this case the wife is the petitioner, and that she has not shown in her petition that she is invoking the discretion of the court on the ground of her own adultery. It is also the fact that the husband had not at the time of the hearing before the magistrates (and so far as I am aware has not yet) filed his answer. He is not obliged to recriminate with a counter-charge of adultery (L. v. L. (3)) and possibly may elect not to do so. It would, of course, have been possible for us to adjourn the hearing of the appeal until it was known whether the husband had counter-charged adultery in his answer. But counsel agree that it is inevitable that, in one form or another, having regard to the evidence tendered before the magistrates, the question of the wife's adultery will be put in issue, and that the fact that at the material date no counter-charge by the husband had actually been made is immaterial. The issue in the present case may be, therefore, stated as follows: Whether, where there is a charge of adultery made in a court of summary jurisdiction and at the same time this court is seised, either directly or by necessary implication, of that issue, magistrates have or have not jurisdiction to decide the issue so long as the suit in which that issue is raised is pending in this court. To put the matter beyond doubt we direct that, if the issue is raised in no other way, the record of the proceedings before the magistrates shall be submitted to the King's Proctor so that the facts may be investigated on his intervention. In these circumstances I am satisfied that this appeal really does raise in an acute, though not in the simplest, form the question as to the proper course to be followed where there is a conflict of jurisdiction in a matrimonial dispute between a court of summary jurisdiction and this court, and that it is unnecessary to adjourn the appeal to await the closing of the pleadings in the suit.

It might be sufficient to say that I consider that we are bound by Higgs v. Higgs (2), in which this court, following the decision of a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division in R. v. Middlesex Justices, Ex parte Bond (1), held that during the pendency of a petition for divorce in the High Court no order for maintenance should be made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, by a court of summary jurisdiction. I think, however, that it would be better that we should consider the question anew, for two reasons. First, because, as a matter of history, the decision in Higgs v. Higgs (2) was given without this court being made aware that the decision of the King's Bench Divisional Court, which we followed, had been the subject of an appeal, and that the Court of Appeal, while upholding the decision of the Divisional Court on another ground, expressly declined ([1933] 2 K.B. 1) to decide the point which we were then considering. Secondly, counsel submits that the decisions in Higgs v. Higgs (2) and R. v. Middlesex Justices, Ex parte Bond (1), even if correct, are distinguishable. The ground on which he distinguishes these cases is that in both the subject-matter with which the magistrates had dealt was identical, in respect both of the facts involved and of the relief sought (in the one case custody and the other maintenance) with that of which this court was seised, whereas in this case, while he admits that the issue of adultery may be identical, though the periods covered by the allegation need not necessarily be coterminous, he submits that the relief resulting from the determination of that issue, here and before the magistrates, is entirely different. The Divorce Court, he argues (rightly, as I think), has no jurisdiction to set aside the order for maintenance: magistrates alone have that power under the Act of 1895. In the Divorce Court, on the other hand, the finding of adultery on the part of the wife may or may not lead to a decree for dissolution of the marriage, and with that the magistrates have no concern.

I appreciate the force of that argument, and I do not ignore the difficulties which may arise from holding that the hand of the magistrates must be stayed until this court has decided the issue of adultery. For example, as counsel for the respondent points out, even if it is assumed that, so far as amount is concerned, the magistrates' order is reasonable at the time when the petition in this court is filed, and although the wife would be entitled to alimony pendente lite, it may well be that in certain cases the amount of the alimony would be less than the amount awarded by the magistrates; and as the husband cannot, though the wife can, take steps to substitute an order for alimony for a subsisting order for maintenance, there would be no opportunity of seeking to reduce the amount of the magistrates' order if the husband's position changed for the worse during the pendency of the suit.

He argued further that different methods of enforcing the respective orders prevail, and that, whereas proof of means is necessary before an order for alimony can be enforced by committal, magistrates can commit without proof of means. It may be that as a matter of law—see R. v. Richardson (4)—formal proof of means is not a condition precedent to the making of a committal order; but I do not think that I ought to assume that magistrates would be prepared, in practice, to commit a man to prison for non-payment of a maintenance order if it were brought to their knowledge that he had not the means to pay. It is true also that the opportunities of appealing from a committal order differ in the two cases: (Ruther v. Ruther (5)).

A further complication might arise, though it could not very well arise in this case having regard to the evidence brought before the magistrates, if it were left in doubt, after the issue of adultery had been decided in the Divorce Court, whether the adultery found included adultery subsequent to the making of the magistrates' order. I do not think, however, that this affects the substance of the matter; for, if it is clear that adultery subsequent to the order is found by the Divorce Court, that would be conclusive evidence in support of the claim that the order should be discharged (Pratt v. Pratt (6)), whereas, if the only adultery found were antecedent to the order, it would be a ground for reversing the order itself under s. 6 of the Act of 1895, if necessary, by an extension of the time for appealing. It is right, however, to notice in passing that, by the terms of s. 6, adultery before the date of the order would not be a bar to the making of an order if the husband had condoned or connived at, or by his wilful neglect or misconduct conduced to such adultery. It would, however, by virtue of s. 178 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, be the duty of the judge trying the suit to consider these very matters, among others. By reason of the amendment to s. 7 of the Act of 1895 by s. 2 (i) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, the right to refuse to discharge the order if adultery is proved is limited to one instance only of conduct conducing, namely, where the adultery was conduced to by the failure of the husband to make such payments as in the opinion of the court he was able to make under the order. Here again, however, if in any particular case the conduct of the husband were in question that limited issue would incidentally be decided by the judge trying the suit. I have mentioned these points, which may not be exhaustive, to show that I do not fail to recognise that there are undoubtedly practical difficulties in applying the rule laid down in R. v. Middlesex Justices, Ex parte Bond (1) and Higgs v. Higgs (2).

On the other hand, the issue of adultery is the most important issue which can be decided as between spouses. With certain exceptions to which it is unnecessary to refer, it is the essential basis of a petition for dissolution of marriage. If it is undesirable that a court of summary jurisdiction should decide ancillary matters such as questions of custody or maintenance when there is a suit pending in the Divorce Court in which such questions may be raised (see the cases last cited), it is manifest that it is still less desirable that the most important issue of all should be decided in a court of summary jurisdiction at a time when it is pending in this court. The undesirability is seen to be the greater if, while a suit is pending, a Divisional Court of this Division is obliged to decide on appeal from magistrates whether their decision is right without the advantage, which the judge trying the suit itself would have, of seeing the witnesses. It is quite true—see Harriman v. Harriman (7), per Cozens Hardy, M.R., and Fletcher Moulton, L.J.—that no estoppel binds this court, as distinct from the parties, on the issue of adultery.

In Hyman v. Hyman (8) the present Master of the Rolls adopted and emphasised this expression of the rule. It is not necessary to decide whether a judgment of the Divisional Court upholding a finding of adultery by the magistrates is conclusive against the world, as a decision of a judge of this Division would be, but a decision of the magistrates would not be (see Pratt v. Pratt (6); Broadbent v. Broadbent (9)), but it is at least clear from Order LIX, r. 7, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which provides:

> "On any motion by way of appeal from an inferior court, the court to which any such appeal may be brought shall have power to draw all inferences of fact which might have been drawn in the court below, and to give any judgment and make any order which ought to have been made. . . ."

that a decision by way of appeal on the merits would be a decision of this court that adultery had been committed, and, although it might not bind the judge who tried the suit, the judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., to which I have just referred, shows that at the very least it would have the highest evidential value, and would of itself entitle the court, if it were satisfied that no additional evidence was required, to find the fact proved. I confess that I was unable, in view of the decision in Harriman v. Harriman (7), to understand that part of the argument of counsel for the respondent in which he urged that it would not even be permissible to refer at the trial to the judgment of this court.

It seems to me to be in the highest degree undesirable that when a judge of this Division comes to try the cardinal issue of adultery he should be confronted with the judgment of a Divisional Court holding that the fact had already been established before a court of summary jurisdiction at the very time when the same issue was actually pending in this court. The inconveniences which may arise in any given case if the decision of the magistrates is postponed until the issue has been decided in this court seem to me, by comparison, to be quite inconsiderable. It must be conceded that if a decision of the magistrates were affirmed on appeal at a time when no suit was pending the situation to which I have referred might result. But in those circumstances the magistrates alone would have jurisdiction at the material time, and there would be no ground whatever for interfering with their jurisdiction under the statute. In a case like the present, however, the court already has seisin of the cardinal issue of adultery, and ought, unless the statute impels the opposite conclusion, to be able to try that issue on the evidence of the witnesses, unembarrassed by the fact that a Divisional Court has accepted, or rejected, on evidence necessarily viewed at second hand, a decision of the magistrates given at a time when the very issue was pending in this court. It might very well be that, on seeing the demeanour of the witnesses, the judge trying the suit would come to a conclusion different from that arrived at by the magistrates and affirmed by this court on the notes of the evidence recorded by the magistrates' clerk. Though such a result might be justifiable as a matter of logic, it would obviously be most unfortunate, and might very well be characterised in the robust words of AVORY, J., in R. v. Middlesex Justices (1), on which we based our decision in Higgs v. Higgs (2). On further consideration, therefore, I am not prepared to depart from the decision of this court in Higgs v. Higgs. Though I recognise the distinction to which counsel for the respondent has called attention, I think that, whatever may be the ultimate relief sought, the substance of the matter is that, when the issue of the adultery of the wife is pending in both courts, it should be decided exclusively by this court.

It was contended, however, in further illustration of the anomalies which might result from a decision to this effect, that the husband might still be liable between the decree nisi and decree absolute to pay under the magistrates' order, notwithstanding the finding of adultery. I do not think that this is so. It must be plainly understood that the jurisdiction of this court is regarded as exclusive only when substantially the same issue is raised in both courts. Similarly, when that issue, whatever it may be, has been decided by this court, there is no further ground for staying the hand of the magistrates, assuming that the decision of this court leaves any issue for decision by them. In Lindsay v. Lindsay (10) I have already decided incidentally, on a consideration of the forms of the decree nisi and the decree absolute respectively, that the decree nisi contains the substantive finding of fact. In that instance it was a finding as to the paternity of a child of the marriage. I think that the same applies to the finding of adultery, notwithstanding that cause may be shown against the granting of the relief prayed on the ground that the court was deceived as to the facts, or for some other reason. In my opinion, the moment the decree nisi has been pronounced on a finding that a wife has been guilty of adultery, it is at once open to the magistrates to apply that finding on any application, whether already subsisting, or newly made, for the discharge of their original order, and to do so without further evidence than is required to show that the adultery found is subsequent to their order: see Pratt v. Pratt (6). If that finding were finally reversed, a fresh order could be made by the magistrates in the wife's favour, while, if a new trial were ordered, she could get alimony pendente lite.

One other point must be noticed. It was argued that the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, by s. 10, provided a means of escaping the undesirable consequences to which I have alluded. The same point arose under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, and was considered by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Middlesex Justices, Ex parte Bond (1). SCRUTTON, L.J., without deciding the matter, does appear to have inclined to this view. SLESSER, L.J., however, again without deciding the matter, plainly indicates that he considers that the section supports the view that the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court is exclusive. In considering the application of s. 10 it is clear that, if the words "the matters in question between the parties" refer to the relief sought, namely, the discharge of the order, that matter could not possibly be referred to the High Court, since it is conceded that the magistrates alone have jurisdiction to make that order. In this view the section would have no application. If, on the other hand, the words quoted refer to the decision of the issue of fact, I respectfully agree with SLESSER, L.J., that it would be inapt for the legislature to give to a court of summary jurisdiction the right to decide whether or not it was more convenient that an issue of which the High Court was already seised should be decided by the High Court. I think that the existence of that section supports the view which I have expressed. If, on the other hand, the presence of that section in the Act tends the other way, it is unfortunate that in this case, as I think, it is not possible to deal with the matter under the section. If the jurisdiction of the magistrates and of this court is concurrent I am bound to say that I should feel that a decision of the magistrates that it was more convenient that they should try the issue of adultery than that this court should do so would be open to challenge on appeal. But I also think that it would be a condition precedent to any attempt to upset their decision that the justices themselves should have been invited to act under s. 10 and should have declined to do so. In this case it is admitted that they were not invited to do so, and I should not be prepared, therefore, to deal with the point in the absence of a decision by them.

In my opinion, the finding of the magistrates should be set aside on the ground that they should not have proceeded to a determination of the matter after their attention had been called to the conflict of jurisdiction and to the authorities, and that the matter should be remitted to them for re-hearing, but that such hearing should be stayed until the determination of the issue of the wife's adultery by this court. This will keep the complaint alive. I need scarcely add that if in this, or in any other case in which this question arises, this court were satisfied that the suit was not being duly prosecuted, but was merely being used for the purpose of prolonging the payments under the order, the court would have ample power to deal with the matter in such a way that the magistrates would regain jurisdiction.

BUCKNILL, J.—The question for decision is whether the magistrates had jurisdiction to hear the application of the husband that an order made against him under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, to pay his wife 30s. a week and 10s. a week for each of the two children of the marriage should be discharged on the ground that his wife had committed adultery since the making of the order. The objection to the jurisdiction is based on the fact that before the magistrates heard the application of the husband his wife filed a petition in the High Court for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery.

In my opinion, the reasoning of the decision of this court in Higgs v. Higgs (2) applies to this case. In that case a husband left his wife, who then took out a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, for a weekly payment to her on the ground of the husband's neglect to maintain her. Before the hearing of the summons the husband filed a petition for divorce. Before the petition for divorce was heard and determined the magistrates made an order for a weekly payment to the wife. The husband then appealed to the High Court and succeeded on the ground that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to make the order because the petition for divorce was pending in the High Court. As I understand it, the decision of the Divisional Court was based on the principle that the legislature could not have intended to give concurrent jurisdiction to the magistrates over a matter which was already pending in a suit in the High Court, with the possible result that the magistrates might make one order and the High Court might make an exactly opposite order in the same matter.

It appears to me that s. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, has an important bearing on the question before the court in this case. I do not think that the words "matters in question" in s. 10 refer to the issue of adultery by a wife, which may be raised under the Act, if at the time when it falls to be determined by the magistrates the same issue has been raised in divorce proceedings in the High Court. The legal result of proof of the adultery of a wife is so different in divorce proceedings in the High Court to the legal result of her adultery under s. 6 or s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, that it seems to me to be impossible to suppose that the legislature would empower the magistrates to decide whether the question of the wife's adultery in such a case "would be more conveniently dealt with" by the High Court or by the magistrates.

I also doubt whether "the order" which the magistrates may refuse to make under s. 10 was intended to apply to an order for discharge of a previous order on the ground of the wife's adultery. The concluding words of s. 7 are peremptory. The "order shall upon proof thereof (i.e., adultery of wife) be discharged." S. 10, on the other hand, enables the magistrates to refuse to make the order. Now, if s. 10 of the Act does not apply to a case where the issue of the wife's adultery is already pending in the High Court at the time when the husband seeks to obtain from the magistrates the discharge of an order for maintenance on the ground of her adultery, the position is that the magistrates have no power of exercising a discretion whether they shall decide that issue or leave the issue to be dealt with by the High Court, and are bound to hear and determine the issue as to the wife's adultery although the High Court may decide the exact opposite the next day. This seems to me to be such an unreasonable result that I think that the legislature cannot have intended it and therefore I think that the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, must be so interpreted as to exclude the jurisdiction of the magistrates to hear and determine the issue of the wife's adultery when that issue is pending in divorce proceedings in the High Court.

I agree with the learned President's judgment that in this case the issue as to the wife's adultery must be raised during the course of the proceedings, either by the husband or at the instigation of the King's Proctor, and that the issue is therefore pending in divorce proceedings in the High Court. For these reasons this appeal, in my opinion, should be allowed.

[House of Lords (Lord Tomlin, Lord Thankerton, Lord Macmillan, Lord Wright and Lord Alness), May 17, 20, June 21, 1935]

Master and Servant—Truck Acts—Deductions from wages—Discharge of debt due to employers by third person—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), s. 3, s. 4.

The appellant was a minor, and was employed as an oncost colliery worker by the respondents, who had deducted from his earnings the rent payable to them by his father, as occupier of a dwelling-house belonging to them, together with a proportional sum in name of rates. During the material time the father, who had been in the respondents' employ, was unemployed, but notwithstanding this fact he was allowed to remain in occupation of the house. The appellant, who lived in the house with his father, had assented to these deductions, and in consideration of this the respondents took no steps towards evicting the appellant and his father, and they, moreover, continued to supply them with coal at a special cheap rate. In an action brought by the appellant against the respondents for payment of the deductions, as being illegal, null, and void under s. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831,

Held: the retention by the respondents of part of the appellant's wages and its application in discharge of the liability to themselves of the appellant's father resulted in the payments which were made to the appellant not being "in the current coin of this realm" within s. 3, and, therefore, as being "illegal, null and void" under that section.

Per Lord Macmillan: There is all the difference in the world between the case where the workman directs his employers to pay part of his wages to a third party and that where the workman assents to his employers retaining part of his wages for their own behoof, whether in discharge of a debt due to them by the workman himself or in discharge of a debt due to them by some third party.

Per Lord Alness: Retention of wages due by employers to a workman cannot equiparate payment to him, although payment to a third party, with his consent, may be payment in the sense of the statute.

Hewlett v. Allen & Sons (1), [1892] 2 Q.B. 662, distinguished.

Held, further: the deductions being "illegal, null and void," the appellant, by acquiescing in them, could not give them validity, and, therefore, the respondents could not plead them in bar of the claim of the appellant who was entitled to recover under s. 4 of the Act.

Appeal from the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, reported 1934 S.C. 254.

Between June, 1931, and January, 1933, the appellant, Alexander Penman, of 8 Beaumont-street, Low Valleyfield, Newmills, Fife, who was at all material times a minor, was in the employment of the respondents, Fife Coal Company, Ltd., as an oncost worker in their collieries. During the period in question the respondents deducted from the weekly wages earned by the appellant the rent payable to them by the appellant's father as occupier of a house belonging to the respondents, and a proportional sum in name of rates. The appellant's father had formerly been in the employment of the respondents, but had ceased to be so before the material period, during the whole of which he was unemployed. While he was in the respondent's employment he occupied one of the houses provided by them for their workmen, and after he ceased to be in their employment he was allowed to continue to occupy it. The sums deducted by the respondents from the appellant's wages for rent in respect of his father's occupancy of the house were retained by the respondents in payment of the father's rent. It was expressly found by the sheriff-substitute that the appellant assented to the deductions so made from the wages earned by him and to the "application of said deductions for said purpose." It was further found that in respect of the appellant's "assent to said deductions and application of wages," the respondents refrained from taking proceedings for the eviction of his father and himself from the respondents' house, and also supplied house coal to the appellant "at the special cheap rate granted by them to workmen in their employment who were paying rents under contracts of let." The appellant thereafter brought an action against the company for payment of the sums so deducted from his wages, and founded on the provisions of the Truck Act.

In the Second Division it was held (the Lord Justice Clerk dissenting) that while the company had not in terms of the Truck Act, 1831, paid to the appellant his whole wages in current coin of the realm, nevertheless the deductions in question were not illegal, in respect that they had been made under an arrangement between the parties of the nature of a gratuitous mandate, revocable at any time, whereby part of the appellant's wages was allocated in payment of rent due by his father.

R. Gibson, K.C., and T. J. D. Connolly (both of the Scottish Bar) and Michael Marcus (of the English Bar) appeared for the appellant.

T. Graham Robertson, K.C., and John Cameron (both of the Scottish Bar) and A. M. Wallace (of the English Bar) for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

June 21. LORD THANKERTON.—My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD MACMILLAN, in which I entirely concur.

LORD MACMILLAN.—My Lords, I am authorised by my noble and learned friend, Lord Tomlin, who is unable to be present, to say that he concurs in the opinion which I am about to read.

The questions affecting the scope and effect of the Truck Act, 1831, which are raised in this appeal have given rise to considerable divergencies of opinion in the course of the progress of the case through three courts in Scotland to this House.

The facts are set out in the interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session now under appeal. The cause having originated in the Sheriff Court, the judgment of the Court of Session, in so far as it relates to the facts, has "the force and effect of a special verdict of a jury, finally and conclusively fixing the several facts specified in the interlocutor." It is only in so far as the judgment "depends on or is affected by matter of law" that it is open to review in your Lordships' House (The Court of Sessions Act, 1825).

It appears that between June, 1931, and January, 1933, the appellant, who was then and is still in minority, was in the employment of the respondents as an oncost worker in their collieries. During the period in question the respondents deducted from the weekly wages earned by the appellant the rent payable to them by the appellant's father as occupier of a house belonging to the respondents and a proportional sum in name of rates. The appellant's father had formerly been in the employment of the respondents but had ceased to be so before the material period, during the whole of which he was unemployed. While he was in the respondents' employment he occupied one of the houses provided by them for their workmen and after he ceased to be in their employment he was allowed to continue to occupy it. The sums deducted by the respondents from the appellant's wages for rent in respect of his father's occupancy of the house were retained by the respondents in payment of the father's rent. It is expressly found that the appellant "assented to the deductions so made from the wages earned by him and to application of said deductions for said purpose." It is further found that in respect of the appellant's "assent to said deductions and application of wages" the respondents refrained from taking proceedings for the eviction of his father and himself from the respondents' house and also supplied house coal to the appellant "at the special cheap rate granted by them to workmen in their employment who were paying rents under contracts of let."

The action is a simple petitory action for a sum of money representing the deductions which were made from the appellant's wages and which are now agreed to amount to £37 2s. 11d. The sum is sued for as representing the "balance of his wages" on the plea that the deductions in question were "illegal under the Truck Act." The sheriff-substitute held that the deductions were illegal, null and void and that the appellant was entitled to recover the amount thereof as wages earned but unpaid. The sheriff on appeal, while agreeing with the sheriff-substitute that the deductions were illegal, nevertheless found in law that the appellant was "barred by acquiescence and mora from recovering the sum sued for." In the Court of Session the Second Division found in law that "the deductions made from the [appellant's] wages and the application thereof and any arrangement or contract relating to said deductions or their application were not illegal, null and void under the Truck Acts" and accordingly assoilzied the respondents. The Lord Justice Clerk (Aitchison) dissented, holding that the deductions were struck at by the statute and that the appellant was not barred from recovering the amount thereof.

There are two questions to be decided: First, whether the deductions made from the appellant's wages were in contravention of the statute; second, if so, whether the appellant is barred from recovering them.

(i) On the first question the words of s. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, are clear. "The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer" to whom the Act applies "in respect of any labour by him shall be actually paid to such artificer in current coin of this realm." I underline the emphatic words "entire amount" and "actually paid to such artificer." As Lord Bowen, when Lord Justice, said in Hewlett v. Allen & Sons (1) ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 666):

> "The statute insists (in all but the excepted cases) on actual payment in coin. Payment in account will not do. Payment in goods will not do. Nothing is to discharge the wages debt except actual payment in current coin."

In the present case the appellant is an artificer to whom the Act applies and the deductions challenged do not fall within any of the permissible exceptions set out in s. 33. On the facts as found nothing can be more certain than that the entire amount of the wages earned by the appellant was not actually paid to him in current coin. A part of the wages earned by him was not paid to him at all, in current coin or otherwise; it was deducted by the respondents from the sum actually paid to him and applied by them in discharge of the rent due to them by the appellant's father. So far as the deductions are concerned there was no payment in current coin or at all. No coin passed from one hand to another. On this part of the case it seems to me quite immaterial that the deductions were assented to by the appellant. The statute is none the less contravened by reason of the fact that the appellant has assented to the contravention. Were it otherwise what Lord Bowen described as the "tutelary shelter" of the statute would afford but a sorry protection.

From this apparently unanswerable reasoning the respondents seek to extricate themselves by invoking the interpretation which they represent as having been placed upon the language of the statute by this House in Hewlett v. Allen (1). In that case the workwoman on entering her employment signed an agreement undertaking to conform to the rules of her employers' works, one of which rules required all employees to become members of a sickness and accident club. The rules of this benefit club in turn required its members to contribute a weekly subscription to its funds. The employers when paying the workwoman her wages deducted every week her subscription to the club and paid it over to the club treasurer who banked it. The workwoman after leaving the employment of the firm sued them for the amount of the deductions so made from her wages. It was held in the Court of Appeal that the deductions were in contravention of the statute, but in this House it was held that there had been no contravention.

The following quotations will show the process of reasoning by which this result was reached. Lord Herschell, L.C., said ([1894] A.C. at p. 389):

> "I can myself entertain no doubt that a payment made by an employer at the instance of a person employed to discharge some obligation of the person employed, or to place the money in the hands of some person in whose hands the person employed desires it to be placed, is in the sense and meaning of those sections a payment to the person employed as much as if the current coin of the realm had been placed in his or her hands."

And again ([1894] A.C. at p. 392):

> "The question, then, is whether, in the present case, it is established that the total wages of the plaintiff have been paid, either by handing them to her in the current coin of the realm or by making on her behalf payments which she has authorised. I cannot doubt that, on the true view of the circumstances of this case, it has been established that the employer has thus discharged himself, and unless there are provisions in the Truck Act which prevent the inferences being drawn which otherwise would be drawn, the conclusion is absolutely irresistible."

His Lordship found no such provisions in the statute. Lord Watson thought ([1894] A.C. at p. 394) that the House should:

> "hold that the contributions advanced by the respondent firm, on behalf of the appellant, were substantially equivalent to payments made by them to the appellant herself, in current coin within the meaning of the Act."

Lord Shand said ([1894] A.C. at p. 398):

> "I think that a payment made presumably, as and when wages have become due, at the request or on the mandate of one of the persons employed, to meet an obligation or for a purpose which he or she desires to fulfil is a payment which is not invalid as being struck at by the requirements of the statute."

I have made these full quotations in order to exhibit quite clearly the principle upon which their Lordships proceeded, namely, that a debtor discharges his debt to his creditor when he pays the creditor's creditor on his creditor's instructions. I cannot refrain from observing that the statutory requirement that there shall be not only payment but payment in current coin seems to have been held satisfied without any evidence of current coin having actually passed between the employers and the club treasurer, but, be that as it may, the decision must of course be accepted as binding in all cases where the facts are the same.

The facts, however, in the case now under your Lordships' consideration are not the same and the difference goes to the root of the matter. Here there was no payment at all, whether in current coin or otherwise, by the respondents to anyone. The respondents simply retained part of what they were bound to pay, and applied what they retained in discharge of the liability of the appellant's father. No doubt it may be said in popular parlance that they paid themselves. But I cannot think that this was payment in current coin to the workman within the meaning of the statute. I adopt the words of BOWEN, L.J., in Hewlett's case (1) where he said ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 666): A

> "The employer cannot for the purpose of compliance with the statute be both payer and payee. To hold otherwise would be to make the statute idle."

B Nothing that was said in this House detracted from the soundness of this view, which was subsequently referred to with approval by LORD DAVEY in Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries, Ltd. (2) ([1906] A.C. at p. 142). In Hewlett's case the payment which was upheld was payment by the employers to a third party. The employers themselves derived no personal benefit. In the present case the retention was for the employers' own benefit and it is a cardinal object of the Truck Act to prevent the employer from making deductions from his workmen's wages in C his own interest. LORD HUNTER in the Court of Session (1934 S.C. at p. 261) sought to surmount this difficulty by regarding the arrangement in the present case as:

> "amounting to a mandate by the pursuer to the defenders to allocate part of his wages in payment of the rent due by his father. . . . In reality what was D done was a voluntary employment by the pursuer of his wages, or part of his wages. If the pursuer had authorised his father to receive his wages or part thereof, and if his father, on receiving the wages, had paid the defenders, apparently the case would have come within the situation figured by LORD HERSCHELL. The mere fact that this procedure was not followed is, in my opinion, an insufficient reason for holding the arrangement illegal." E

I cannot approve this reasoning, which seems to me to afford an excellent illustration of the danger which attends the process, once it is started, of accepting equivalents for the plain requirements of the statute. There is, in my opinion, all the difference in the world between the case where the workman directs his employers to pay part of his wages to a third party and the case where the workman assents to his employers retaining part of his wages for their own behoof, whether F in discharge of a debt due to them by the workman himself or in discharge of a debt due to them by some third party. In Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries, Ltd. (2) it was held that employers, when paying their employee's wages, could not, without contravening the Act, set off a judgment debt due by their employee to them. No more, in my view, could they legally have set off a debt due to them by a third party. In Williams's case the employee objected to G the set off but the contravention would have been committed equally if he had assented.

I accordingly reach the conclusion that the deductions which, in the present case the respondents made from the appellant's wages, were in contravention of the statute and cannot be justified by anything that was decided in Hewlett v. Allen (1).

(ii) The question next arises whether the appellant can recover the amount of H the deductions. He invokes s. 4 of the Act of 1831, which, as amended, provides that:

> "every artificer shall be entitled to recover from his employer . . . the whole or so much of the wages earned by such artificer as shall not have been actually paid to him by such his employer in the current coin of this realm" I

Here again the statute seems sufficiently clear in its terms, but again it is said that authority provides the respondents with a means of escape.

In considering this question it must be borne in mind that under s. 3 the deductions which I have found to be in contravention of the Act are to be treated as "illegal, null and void," and that under s. 9 the respondents by making these deductions incurred the statutory penalties. Nevertheless, it is said that in a civil action for recovery of the amount of the deductions the respondents can successfully plead the appellant's assent to the deductions as operating to bar his claim. There are certainly unmistakable indications of judicial opinion that when the parties come into a civil court the employers may put forward, in answer to a claim for recovery of illegal deductions, defences which would afford no answer to a charge of contravention of the statute. In Hewlett's case (1) in the Court of Appeal this was clearly the opinion of BOWEN, L.J. That eminent judge took the view that because s. 5 expressly precluded the employer from pleading certain specific heads of set-off in answer to a suit for recovery of wages illegally deducted the inference was that other heads of set-off might legitimately be pleaded. He says ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 668):

> "Beyond these lines [i.e., the specifically forbidden set-offs] . . . all legal and equitable defences other than payment, are still left open in any civil action to the employer," and he and his colleagues accordingly held it a good defence "in the nature of a set-off or counterclaim" that the sum deducted had been paid over professedly on the plaintiff's behalf

> "to the treasurer of the benefit club and that the plaintiff had subsequently ratified and assented to such payment and expenditure" (p. 672).

This, as I have already shown, was not adopted as the ground of judgment in your Lordships' House, where it was held that there had been no contravention of the Act. But in Williams's case (2) there are also indications of opinion by LORD DAVEY ([1906] A.C. at p. 142) and LORD ATKINSON ([1906] A.C. at p. 146), that deductions which the employer cannot legally make at his own hand when paying wages may nevertheless in some cases be admissible by way of set-off when the employee seeks to recover the deductions by civil process. I may point out that in Williams's case the action was one, not for recovery of the deductions, but for a declaration of their illegality and the observations of the noble and learned Lords to which I have referred were therefore obiter. I do not, however, presume, nor do I find it necessary, to express an opinion whether they were well founded. Assuming that they were, I do not find that they assist the respondents here. The respondents are not pleading set-off in answer to the appellant's claim. They are pleading personal bar founded on acquiescence or assent.

In my opinion, the respondents cannot avail themselves of this plea. Under the statute the deductions were illegal, null and void. I cannot see how a party, by acquiescing in a nullity, can give it validity for purposes of defence. A nullity cannot be ratified, for there is nothing to ratify. The appellant's assent to the deductions is, in my opinion, of no more avail to the respondents in these civil proceedings than it would have been in a prosecution for penalties. The respondents have committed an illegality in withholding part of the appellant's wages. I do not think that when the appellant now seeks to recover what has been illegally withheld from him the respondents can effectively plead his assent to the illegality.

I accordingly move your Lordships to allow this appeal, to recall the findings in law of the Second Division of the Court of Session and of the Sheriff and to restore the findings in law of the Sheriff-Substitute.

LORD WRIGHT.—I am so fully in agreement with the reasoning and conclusions expressed in the speech of my noble and learned friend LORD MACMILLAN, that I should not add anything were it not that we were taking a different view from that taken by the majority of their Lordships of the Second Division.

The crucial question in this case is whether the sums deducted and retained week by week by the respondents from the appellant's wages are deductions which are illegal and null and void, so that a suit lies for the recovery of these sums under s. 4 of the Truck Act, 1831. On the imperative words of the section the right of recovery would seem to be plainly secured in respect of so much of the wages earned as have not been paid to the appellant "in the current coin of this realm''; and the main ground on which the judgment appealed from proceeds, seems to be that as the sums retained were so retained on the mandate or with the assent of the appellant, these sums can be deemed to be substantially equivalent to payments made to the appellant himself in current coin within the meaning of the Act on the principle laid down by Lord Watson in Hewlett v. Allen (1) ([1894] A.C. at p. 394), whose words appear to sum up the effect of the decision of this House on the facts of that case. But that decision is based on the fact that the sums in question were paid on the worker's mandate to a third party in order to discharge a debt of the worker due to that third party. The worker's request to pay the third party on her behalf, made, so it was held, the third party the worker's agent or hand to receive the current coin. In the present case the respondents retained the sums now in suit in order to pay a debt due, not to a third party, but to themselves, and not due from the appellant, but due from another party, namely, his father; and furthermore, the father's debt was for rent in respect of premises belonging to the respondents of which the father was tenant. If express provision was required in s. 23 of the Act to validate a deduction for the rent of premises demised or let to the workman, it would seem impossible to justify a deduction of the rent of premises not demised or let to the appellant, but to another person. The fact that the appellant lived with his father in the premises, is, I think, immaterial.

That Hewlett's case (1) went to the limit of what is permissible in the way of liberal construction of the Act is, in my opinion, clear from a consideration of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries, Ltd. (2). It is not true to say that Williams's case was distinguished from Hewlett's case on the ground that in the former case, the workman did not assent, whereas in the latter he did assent, to the deduction. Lord Davey ([1906] A.C. at p. 142) thus sums up the statutory position:

> ''By s. 23 and s. 24 certain deductions are permitted to be made, or, to use the language of the marginal note, 'particular exceptions to the generality of the law,' are made under strictly defined conditions, and no other deductions or particular exceptions are in my opinion authorised.''

Subsequent statutes have enlarged the list of permissible deductions but have not affected the principle. Lord Davey further emphasised that the employer was not entitled to retain a part of the workman's admitted wages in payment of a debt to himself: ''Payment on account will not do''; ''the employer cannot for purposes of the Statute be both payer and payee.'' These phrases, quoted by Lord Davey from Bowen, L.J.'s judgment in Hewlett v. Allen (1) apply with even greater force where, as here, the money was retained for a debt not due from the workman, but from another party.

Some reliance was placed in support of the respondents' contention on s. 5 of the Act. That section was applied by Bowen, L.J., in Hewlett's case (1) as justifying in the action a set-off or reduction of the plaintiff's demand on the ground that the sums in debate had been actually paid away to a third party in satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt and under his mandate: that was held to constitute a ground of cross-claim or set-off subsequent to and independent of the contract of employment on the footing that the actual deduction was illegal, as Bowen, L.J., held it was, under s. 4. In the present case there was no actual disbursement of money by the respondents, who simply kept for themselves the part of the wages retained. The ruling of Bowen, L.J., accordingly does not cover the present case. S. 5, whatever may be its precise scope, which is far from clear, may here, in my opinion, be disregarded: indeed, I do not gather that any specific set-off is sought to be established, if the deductions which the respondents made are held to be illegal, as I think they must be, and if the plea of personal bar, which is something quite different from set-off or cross-claim, is rejected, as I think it must be for the reasons stated by Lord Macmillan.

Such is my opinion on the actual words of the Truck Act, 1831. But if I also consider what I conceive to be the policy of the Act, a case such as the present seems entirely to fall within it.

LORD ALNESS.—Were it not for the importance of the questions at issue in this case, and for the fact that your Lordships, as has been pointed out, are reversing the decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session, I should be well content to express my formal concurrence in the opinions delivered by my noble and learned friends, LORD MACMILLAN and LORD WRIGHT, and in the reasons upon which those opinions proceed. In the circumstances, I beg leave to add a few words of my own to what has been already said.

In the first place, I am clearly of opinion that the respondents, in what they did, contravened the injunction contained in s. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831. In order to reach a sound conclusion on that matter, one must steadily bear in mind (i) what the respondents are by statute enjoined to do, and (ii) what they in point of fact did. (i) The respondents, as employers of the appellant, are enjoined, by Act of Parliament, to pay to him the whole amount of the wages earned by him in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise. The words of the statute, authority apart, would appear to be plain, and indeed intractable. (ii) The respondents, in point of fact, instead of paying to the appellant, in the current coin of the realm, the wages earned by him, deducted from these wages the rent payable to them by the appellant's father as occupier of a house belonging to them.

Primâ facie this would seem to be an illegal deduction; and indeed the respondents in argument appeared to recognise the cogency of this view. They sought, however, to take shelter under the ægis of Hewlett's case (1), and they contended that it avoided the result for which the appellant contended. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the opinions of the majority in the court below were based largely, if not solely, upon the authority of Hewlett. Now, while the resemblances between this case and the case of Hewlett are considerable, the differences are even more striking. Hewlett decided, as LORD MURRAY pointed out, that the entire wages of the employee in that case had actually been paid to him within the meaning of the statute. I am quite unable to affirm that in this case, where a portion of the appellant's wages remained in the hands of the respondents, that that was so. Retention of wages due by employers to a workman cannot equiparate payment to him, although payment to a third party, with his consent, may be payment in the sense of the statute. In this case the respondents were both payers and payees, and that fact, in my opinion, is fatal to their contention. In Hewlett the employers were not enriched by the arrangement which was made: in this case they definitely are. In Hewlett the employers made a payment on behalf of their employee: here they retained a certain deduction, not for the appellant's benefit, but for their own. Hewlett was a case of set-off: this is not a case of that character. The circumstances of the two cases appear to me to differ toto cælo, as indeed LORD HUNTER pointed out. I, therefore, reach the conclusion that the respondents acted in plain breach of their statutory duty, and that the case of Hewlett affords them no protection from that inference.

In the second place, I am of opinion that the appellant is not, as the respondents contended, personally barred from enforcing his claim. Personal bar in this connection is a Scottish doctrine, and the validity of the respondents' contention falls, I apprehend, to be decided by the law of Scotland. Now, ex hypothesi of the argument, the deduction made by the respondents from the appellant's wages is, by statute, declared to be "illegal, null and void." In these circumstances the respondents' argument that the appellant is barred by mora and acquiescence from vindicating his claim appears to me to be a startling, if not indeed an audacious contention. To my mind it is a novel doctrine in the law of Scotland that a plea of personal bar can avail against that which is declared by statute to be illegal, null and void. The proposition appears to me really to be a contradiction in terms. The doctrine of mora and acquiescence is, in my opinion, foreign to a case of this kind. Acquiescence, in my judgment, can present no bar to an action founded on the illegality and nullity of the thing acquiesced in. No decision was cited by the respondents in which the judgment of the court proceeded on the view for which they contended.

I will only add that I find myself in agreement with the dissenting opinion of the learned Lord Justice Clerk, and with the reasoning upon which it is based. I therefore concur in the motion which has been moved that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

LILLEY AND SKINNER, LTD. v. ESSEX COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Hewart, C.J., Lord Avory, and Lord Humphreys, JJ.), April 10, 11, 1935]

Rating—Valuation list—Amendment—Increase of assessments of shop properties within borough—No corresponding increase in assessments of dwelling-houses—Objection by owners of shop property.

The occupiers of a shop, the assessment of which had been increased together with the assessments of most of the shop properties in the borough, contended that their assessment ought to be reduced, on the ground that there had been no corresponding increase in the assessments of dwelling-house properties within the borough. The gross and rateable values of the shop arrived at as the result of the increase were admittedly not higher than the gross and rateable values as defined by the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

Held: the Act did not require that re-valuations of shops and dwelling-houses must be made at one and the same time, and, as the hereditament in question was admittedly not over-assessed, the court could not, merely for the sake of uniformity, substitute a lower figure which admittedly would be inaccurate.

Per curiam: To secure uniformity in valuation a ratepayer the valuation of whose hereditament is correct must take steps to correct the assessments of other ratepayers who have been assessed at too low a figure and not seek to get his own correct assessment re-valued downwards to a figure on a level with theirs.

Case Stated by Essex Quarter Sessions.

A proposal was made by the Essex County Valuation Committee to amend the current valuation list for the borough of Ilford by increasing (inter alia) the assessment of a hereditament, Nos. 101–105 High-road, Ilford, occupied by Lilley & Skinner, Ltd. The assessment committee accepted the proposal, and increased the gross value of the hereditament from £862 to £884, and the rateable value from £682 to £734. From that decision the company appealed to quarter sessions.

The building in question was occupied by the company as a shop. The current valuation list for the borough was the first quinquennial list made under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and was finally approved by the Southern Essex Assessment Committee in 1929. For the purposes of that list all shop properties in the borough (about 1,500 in all) were valued by a professional surveyor, but the dwelling-houses, of which there were many thousands, were valued by an employee of the borough council, who had no professional qualifications.

The standards of values applied both to shops as a class and dwelling-houses as a class were below the standards prescribed by the Act of 1925, by the definitions of gross and rateable value therein contained, and were less than they ought to have been if the Act had been correctly applied, but the court was not satisfied that the standard applied to dwelling-houses was substantially lower than that applied to shops.

On March 29, 1933, the valuation committee made proposals (about 1,100 in all) to amend the valuation list by increasing the assessments of most of the shop properties in the borough. One such proposal related to the company's shop, and, after amendment, that proposal called for a gross value of £884 and net value of £734. The company admitted that those amounts were not higher than the true gross and rateable values of the property.

The assessment committee allowed the proposal and subsequently allowed the majority of the proposals relating to other shops in the borough. No alterations were made in the assessable values of dwelling-houses in the borough as a class.

The company contended that it was illegal to re-value and increase the assessments of shop properties generally in the borough without re-valuing and increasing the assessments of the dwelling-houses, and that a valuation list which discriminated unfairly between one class of property and another was bad in law.

The valuation committee contended that the assessments were not unlawful, and that, even if they were, the appellants' proper remedy was to apply to quash either the valuation list or the rate, for neither of which were the respondents responsible. They also said that there was no obligation on them to correct all the errors in the valuation list at the same time.

Quarter sessions dismissed the appeal. From that decision the company appealed to the Divisional Court.

M. Rowe for the appellants.

Comyns Carr, K.C., and F. D. Levy for the respondents.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—In my opinion this appeal ought to be dismissed. The discussion of the matter has involved many words, but the real point is tolerably simple. The appellants belong to the class of occupiers of shops in the borough of Ilford. A proposal was made some time ago by the county valuation committee of the Essex County Council to amend the current valuation list for that borough, and to amend it in the sense of increasing the gross value of certain shop property from £862 to £884 and the rateable value from £682 to £734. The only point which was made was that, while what are called shop properties in the borough, to the number of some 1,500, were to have their assessments increased unless this appeal succeeded, the dwelling-houses on the other hand, of which there are said to be many thousands, were valued below the prescribed standard. The contention made by the appellants was, not that those properties which were valued below the proper standard should have their assessments increased, but that their own and others like it which were valued at the proper standard should have their assessments reduced, so that all might be equally wrong. It is to be observed that it was expressly admitted at the Bar by counsel for the appellants, that this hereditament was not over-assessed. That being so, it seems to me that the case is singularly like Ladies' Hosiery and Underwear, Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee (1). I refer in particular to the judgment of EVE, J., who, on that occasion, was sitting in the Court of Appeal. He said ([1932] 2 K.B. at p. 696):

> "The one concrete fact which emerges is the correctness of the assessment of the appellants' premises, and when that is once recognised as established, there is really nothing more to be said. It is quite impossible for the court, in these proceedings, to substitute for the correct figure another figure which, by their own evidence, they have proved to be inaccurate. It may be that want of uniformity, and consequent unfairness, can be established, and that it is due to under-assessment of comparable premises and not to other considerations affecting these particular premises; but, if so, this must be established by proper proceedings directed to the raising of the assessments of those other premises, and so framed as to afford the occupiers thereof an opportunity of showing that no such unfairness in fact exists. Upon the materials now before the court it is impossible to arrive at any conclusion beyond this, that the appellants have failed altogether to prove that their assessment is otherwise than correct."

From the course which the argument has taken it seems to me that the present case is a fortiori, for here it was expressly admitted at the outset that the assessment of this hereditament was correct. The argument made below, and made unsuccessfully, by the appellants was that it was unlawful to re-value and increase the assessments of shop properties generally in the borough without re-valuing and increasing the assessments of dwelling-houses in the borough. The contention is that if re-valuation is to be made it must be made uno flatu with regard to all the hereditaments in the area. The law does not compel any such impossibility. It has been strongly argued that, if the appellants are not to enjoy getting rid of a grievance, not by seeking to make everybody right, but by making everybody equally wrong, there is no remedy at all. I do not so read the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. Statutes are not always easy to understand, but it seems to me to be pretty clear that there is a remedy open to these appellants—a remedy which is perhaps cumbrous, but does not at all involve the difficulty of inviting the court to do that which is admittedly wrong.

I think this appeal must be dismissed and that the appellants must be left to find a better method, which is not hard to find.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and in view of the findings of fact in this case I doubt whether the long argument that we have listened to is other than purely academic. [His Lordship stated the findings as set out above, and continued:] Upon those findings of fact it appears to me that the observations made by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Ladies' Hosiery and Underwear, Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee (1) are directly in point. He there said ([1932] 2 K.B. at p. 686):

> "One would have thought that this evidence destroyed the ratepayer's objection, but he said: 'No, I will show you that seven other hereditaments in the borough are assessed at sums lower than the rents which their hypothetical tenants would pay, and I require that I also should be assessed at a sum lower than the hypothetical tenant would pay. I do this because the essence of rating is > fairness and uniformity, and I prefer my assessment to be inaccurate, but uniform, rather than it should be accurate, but out of harmony with my neighbours. It is true that I can, if my facts are right, secure uniformity by correcting the inaccuracy of my neighbours' assessments, on objection to those assessments, and can get those assessments made uniform with my correct assessment. But I do not want this; I want to indulge my passion for uniformity by securing uniform inaccuracy, though that uniformity makes my correct assessment incorrect, but the inaccuracy is to my pecuniary advantage.' "

During the argument the learned Lord Justice had pointed out that that looked all wrong, and he says: "I think it is a wrong view." Corresponding with that expression of opinion is the passage which my Lord has read in the judgment of EVE, J., which is to the same effect. It appears to me that much time has been occupied in discussing whether the appellants have any appropriate remedy other than the remedy which has been declared to be wrong of asking that their correct assessment should be made incorrect. In my opinion, s. 37 of the Act of 1925 provides all the necessary remedy in this case, and particularly I wish to say that I do not agree with counsel's contention that under s. 37 (2) a person who is making a proposal for the amendment of the list would be bound in the present case to specify the figures upon which he contends that each of the residential properties is under-assessed. In my opinion, it would be sufficient, to satisfy par. (b) of that sub-section, for him to state generally that the grounds on which his proposed amendment is supported are that the residential properties as a whole or as a class are under-assessed, and thereupon, as counsel for the valuation committee has pointed out, by sub-s. (3) the rating authority have to give the necessary notice to the occupiers of those hereditaments in order that they may have the opportunity of coming in and being heard upon the objection. So far as any difficulty about the rate is concerned, to which question also counsel for the appellants has devoted considerable time, it appears to me that sub-s. (10) of that same section provides all the necessary remedy with regard to the current rate or any subsequent rate in case there is any alteration made in the assessment of the residential properties.

For those reasons I agree that quarter sessions were right in dismissing the appeal, and that this appeal accordingly should be dismissed.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. I think the appellants have established a grievance by reason of the fact that the requirements of the statute produce the result that a rated occupier is entitled to require that all other occupiers of the same or comparable class should be assessed upon a similar basis. That has not been done in this case, and the remaining question is: What is the remedy open to the rated occupier for the purpose of amending that grievance? I agree with what has been said by the other members of the court as to the remedy which he undoubtedly has, if he chooses to pursue it, of objecting by way of making proposals to the improper rating of other persons, and I accept with the greatest possible pleasure every word which was said by SCRUTTON, L.J., in his judgment in the Ladies' Hosiery and Underwear case (1), where he pointed out the absurd result which would follow from permitting a person whose rateable value is admittedly correctly stated in the valuation list to ask the court to make that lower and, therefore, incorrect because some other persons' valuations are also admittedly incorrect as being themselves too low. I think that the grievance which the appellants have established is to be met, not by the course which they have taken, but by another course which was open to them. That is sufficient to dispose of this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction—Review of finding of fact—Case tried by judge without jury—Need to prove clearly that judge in error.

On an appeal from the decision of a judge sitting without a jury the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal is free and unrestricted. The court has the same right as the trial judge to come to decisions on issues of fact as well as of law. But the C court is still a court of appeal, and in exercising its functions it is subject to the inevitable qualifications of that position. Where the question is one of credibility, where either story told in the witness-box may be true, where the probabilities and possibilities are evenly balanced, and where the personal motives and interests of the parties cannot but affect their testimony, an appellate court should be reluctant to differ from the judge who has seen and heard the witnesses and has had the D opportunity of watching their demeanour, unless it is clearly shown that he has fallen into error.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 28. LORD SANKEY, L.C.—This is an appeal from an order of His Majesty's Court of Appeal (England) dated Nov. 22, 1933, ordering that the judgment of HORRIDGE, J., dated July 11, 1933, in favour of the appellants, be set aside, and that the judgment in the action be entered for the respondents with costs.

The action was brought by the appellants, who are husband and wife, for damages caused to them by reason of the personal injury done to the female appellant by negligence, as the appellants alleged, of the respondents' servants or agents.

The appellant, Helena Powell, entered the respondents' nursing home on Jan. 9, 1930, as a paying patient, and on Jan. 20, 1930, Dr. James Kirkland performed the operation of hysterectomy upon her in the home. This is an operation for the removal of the uterus.

The appellants' complaint is and was that on the following day, namely, Jan. 21, 1930, the respondents' servant, Sister Hyndham, punctured the female appellant's bladder in negligently using and attempting to pass a catheter into her. There is no dispute that the bladder was not punctured before the operation. There is no dispute that it has been punctured. The respondents at the trial set up the case that it must have been punctured by Dr. Kirkland in performing the operation. This case is completely contradicted by and at variance with the evidence of the female appellant, and the learned judge accepted her evidence and based his judgment upon it.

No question of law was raised at the trial or is involved in the appeal except in so far as it may be material to consider the functions of the Court of Appeal on appeal on a pure question of fact from a judge before whom at the trial conflicting evidence has been given by a number of witnesses whom he has not only heard but seen.

A number of witnesses were called before the learned judge, and the course of the trial resolves itself into three questions.

In order that the plaintiffs should succeed, it was necessary for them to establish the fact, to the satisfaction of the judge, that the puncture to her bladder sustained by the female plaintiff was due to the negligence of the nurses in attendance. If the proper deduction from the evidence was that the puncture had been made by the doctor who performed the operation or if it was impossible upon the evidence to say in which way it was caused, the defendants were entitled to succeed, for then the plaintiffs would not have discharged the onus placed upon them. Several questions therefore become of vital importance. For example:

(i) Was the puncture caused by the doctor who performed the operation? Upon this the learned judge had the direct evidence of the two doctors who were at the operation, both of whom said that the puncture was not caused on that occasion. There was also evidence, called by the defendants, of an expert character as to the possibility or probability of a puncture being made by the operating doctor without his knowing it.

(ii) Another question of vital importance was when the urine showed signs of escaping. Here again the matter was in controversy, first of all as to the time at which the escape was noticed, secondly as to the exact time it was likely to have happened after the operation, if the puncture to the bladder had been made then. Upon these questions there was the direct evidence of the doctor and the nurses and also reports by the nurses.

(iii) There was the vital question as to what took place when the nurses tried to insert a catheter and the doctor was sent for. Upon this there was the evidence of the female plaintiff herself as to what happened and what she felt during the insertion of the instrument. On the other hand, there was the evidence of the nurses as to what they did, as to the kind of catheter they used and as to the improbability or rather impossibility of a catheter of such a sort making a puncture. Over and above that, there was the delay in bringing the action and the letters written by the plaintiffs which seem to show that they did not at first attribute any negligence to the nursing home.

It is true that a court naturally attaches great importance to letters written by a witness which appear to contradict evidence which he subsequently gives, but the court must always take into consideration the witness's explanation of such letters and weigh it carefully. Further than that, an omission to state something in a letter may not be so weighty as a statement which contradicts something to which the witness subsequently deposes.

Upon these several matters the evidence was of a very contradictory character and no one could have been in as good a position as the learned judge, who both saw and heard the witnesses, to say where the truth lay. He expressly said that he accepted the evidence of the doctors, which, if true, proved that the puncture did not take place at the operation; that he accepted the evidence of Mrs. Powell which, if true, made it A almost conclusive that the puncture took place when the nurses tried to insert the catheter.

When the matter came before the Court of Appeal, the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS, founding himself upon The Sir Robert Peel (1) dwelt with considerable force upon another fact altogether. In The Sir Robert Peel JAMES, L.J., said (4 Asp. M.L.C. at p. 322): B

> "The court will not depart from the rule it has laid down that it will not overrule the decision of the court below on a question of fact in which the judge has had the advantage of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, unless they find some governing fact which in relation to others has created a wrong impression."

Originally in the present case there had been a claim for damages for a hernia which the female plaintiff alleged had been produced by one of the nurses allowing her to fall C during her illness and so causing the hernia. The learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS was evidently very much impressed by the fact that HORRIDGE, J., did not accept the female plaintiff's account of this, and he thought that the fact that the judge did not accept her evidence on this point was a governing fact, or at any rate one of the governing facts, to which great importance should be attached in considering the remaining part of her story. D

It is important carefully to consider what really happened with regard to this matter. The short-hand note clearly shows that the learned counsel for the plaintiff gave up this point because he thought it had not been proved that the fall caused the hernia, but he expressly said that he only did so without admitting that it made any difference to the rest of the female plaintiff's evidence. Upon this the learned judge agreed with him and indeed the counsel for the respondents regarded it of minor importance. The E following is a transcript of what happened when the matter was given up. The learned counsel for the defendants said:

> "A word again about the other branch of the case which had almost escaped me, the hernia."
> HORRIDGE, J.—"I am not satisfied on that branch of the case, Mr. Hilbery, that F > the hernia resulted from this."
>
> Malcolm Hilbery.—"I do not say anything more about it provided it is satisfactorily understood that I must deal with it if it is said that it has any bearing upon the reliance which should be placed on Mrs. Powell's evidence or not."
>
> HORRIDGE, J.—"I did not say that. I said I was not satisfied that if her evidence was true the hernia resulted from it." G
>
> Malcolm Hilbery.—"It is really so much a minor matter in this case that I do not desire to say any more about it. I was intending only to say to your Lordship upon it that I was going to abandon it in the state of the evidence because I do not think the chain of causation is satisfactorily carried out . . . provided it is understood that I am not casting any reflection upon or departing from the credibility of Mrs. Powell's evidence in any way." H
> HORRIDGE, J.—"Then you need not bother your head about that, Mr. Joy."

What, then, should be the attitude of the Court of Appeal towards the judgment arrived at in the court below under such circumstances as the present? It is perfectly true that an appeal is by way of re-hearing, but it must not be forgotten that the Court of Appeal does not re-hear the witnesses. It only reads the evidence and re-hears the counsel. Neither is it a re-seeing court. There are different meanings to be attached I to the word "re-hearing." For example, the re-hearing at quarter sessions is a perfect re-hearing because, although it may be the defendant who is appealing, the complainant starts again and has to make out his case and call his witnesses. The matter is rather different in the case of an appeal to the Court of Appeal. There the onus is upon the appellant to satisfy the court that his appeal should be allowed. There have been a very large number of cases in which the law on this subject has been canvassed and laid down. There is a difference between the manner in which the Court of Appeal deals with a judgment after a trial before a judge alone and a verdict after a trial before a judge and jury. On an appeal against a judgment of a judge sitting alone, the Court of Appeal will not set aside such judgment unless the appellant satisfies them that the judge was wrong and that his decision ought to have been the other way. Where there has been a conflict of evidence the Court of Appeal will have special regard to the fact that the judge saw the witnesses: see Clarke v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co. per LORD SHAW (2) (1919 S.C. (H.L.) at p. 36), where he says:

> " When a judge hears and sees witnesses and makes a conclusion or inference with regard to what is the weight on balance of their evidence, that judgment is entitled to great respect, and that quite irrespective of whether the judge makes any observation with regard to credibility or not. I can, of course, quite understand a Court of Appeal that says that it will not interfere in a case in which the judge has announced as part of his judgment that he believes one set of witnesses, having seen them and heard them, and does not believe another. But that is not the ordinary case of a cause in a court of justice. In courts of justice in the ordinary case things are much more evenly divided; witnesses without any conscious bias towards a conclusion may have in their demeanour, in their manner, in their hesitation, in the nuance of their expressions, in even the turns of the eyelid, left an impression upon the man who saw and heard them which can never be reproduced in the printed page. What in such circumstances, thus psychologically put, is the duty of an appellate court? In my opinion, the duty of an appellate court in those circumstances is for each judge of it to put to himself, as I now do in this case, the question, Am I—who sit here without those advantages, sometimes broad and sometimes subtle, which are the privilege of the judge who heard and tried the case—in a position, not having those privileges, to come to a clear conclusion that the judge who had them was plainly wrong? If I cannot be satisfied in my own mind that the judge with those privileges was plainly wrong, then it appears to me to be my duty to defer to his judgment."

On an appeal against a verdict, if the evidence was such that no jury properly directed could reasonably have found the verdict in question, the verdict so found will be set aside. A verdict, however, will not necessarily be set aside merely because it is, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, against the weight of evidence, but there is jurisdiction to grant a new trial in such a case: see Solomon v. Bitton (3), and Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (4), per LORD HALSBURY (11 App. Cas. at p. 155). There is certainly jurisdiction in the Court of Appeal to reconsider the facts in the way they do reconsider them and to come to an opposite conclusion to that arrived at in the court below. The judge of first instance is not the possessor of infallibility, and, like other tribunals, there may be occasions when he goes wrong on a question of fact, but first and last and all the time, he has the great advantage, which is denied to the Court of Appeal, of seeing the witnesses and watching their demeanour. It is hardly possible to conceive a case where a judge of first instance was in a better position than the Court of Appeal to judge where the truth lay than the present case. There were contradictions on questions of fact between professional witnesses of high experience and standing, there were contradictions of expert evidence between similar witnesses who were not called as to fact, but as to their opinion. In circumstances like the present the Court of Appeal would be slow to upset the judgment arrived at by the judge who both saw and heard the persons who gave evidence.

Having regard to the facts, it is, in my view, quite impossible to say that the learned judge was wrong in coming to the conclusion he arrived at in favour of the plaintiffs, and I am for allowing this appeal and for restoring the judgment of HORRIDGE, J.

The appellants should have their costs in the Court of Appeal and the costs of the appeal to this House, the costs in this House to be taxed in the manner usual when the appellant sues in forma pauperis.

LORD BLANESBURGH (read by LORD MACMILLAN).—I, too, have reached the conclusion that the judgment of HORRIDGE, J., in this most anxious case must be restored. I phrase in this way my concurrence in the motion just proposed, because I am thereby enabled to indicate, as is the fact, that my adhesion is not based upon any conviction of mine that the judgment to be restored was right, but is given solely on the ground that, sitting as I am in an appellate tribunal, and there deprived of the privilege of seeing, as the learned judge did, the witnesses on both sides, I have no sufficient justification for asserting with due regard to judicial prudence that the judgment was wrong.

It has, however, been with great difficulty that I have reached that conclusion: it is not without hesitation that I now express it. I have been gravely concerned by the long delay in the institution of proceedings and by the failure on the part of the appellants or of Dr. Kirkland, their principal witness at the trial after Mrs. Powell herself, throughout a period of over two years during which Dr. Kirkland at least was in constant association with the home to make any kind of complaint to Mr. Hogg, or to either sister of any improper treatment of Mrs. Powell while she was resident there in 1930.

I was, and I remain, gravely concerned by the consequential embarrassment to the defence. The production at the trial either of Mrs. Powell's temperature charts or of the catheters actually used by the sisters upon her became thereby impossible—productions which, although they possibly could not have strengthened the appellants' case, as then presented, might well have ended it. I was impressed by the fact that rupture of the bladder by an india-rubber catheter was admittedly impossible, and that no such rupture by a gum elastic catheter has ever been known; I was impressed by the payment during this period by the appellants of part of the remaining nursing home fees with an apology for non-payment of the balance and a promise to discharge it after the doctor's charges had been met, and all without a word of complaint; by the fact that when, on March 8, 1932, that balance was asked for by a debt collector, the only complaint even then suggested was with reference to the hernia—a complaint in effect abandoned at the trial; I was troubled, too, by the terms of Messrs. Bircham's letter of April 1, 1932, in which it is stated that it has now been "discovered beyond doubt that the bladder is perforated," suggesting, contrary to Dr. Kirkland's evidence, that the rupture, while it might previously have been suspected, had only then been definitely ascertained; above all, was I struck by what remains for me the entirely incomprehensible conduct of Dr. Kirkland during the whole period, and by the disturbing fact that not only did the learned judge accept his evidence apparently at its face value, but he made it the buttress, if not the pillar, of his judgment.

These were, and some of them remain, for me very disturbing facts, the more especially as no one of them is either discussed or even referred to by the learned judge in his judgment. So serious indeed did they collectively appear to me that at one time since the hearing I feared in the course of my study of the case that judicial prudence, without at least some further support from the appellants' counsel by way of reply, would not be equal to the strain involved. In the end, however, difficult as I have found the journey to be, it has led me to the conclusion I have stated, in agreement in its result, with that of all your Lordships.

With that agreement reached I feel that no useful purpose would be served by detaining the House with a recital of the judgment on the whole case which I had prepared.

One thing only must I say. I regard it as being necessarily involved in the restoration of HORRIDGE, J.'s judgment that the burden thereby laid upon the respondents results from some act of proved negligence on the part of the two sisters, or, of one of them in the presence of the other, on Jan. 21, 1930. But, in my view, at any rate, it does not necessarily involve any reflection upon what I may term the honour and humanity of Sister Hyndman and Sister Cooper, or of either of these ladies. I accept from the learned judge the sincerity in every particular of Mrs. Powell as a witness; but her reliability or accuracy in this and in some other matters is a different question altogether, and in its consideration her strong, if natural, prepossessions after many years of suffering must not be left out of account.

Now, nothing has impressed me more on this record than the tributes of continued confidence and respect paid to the sisters by every medical witness who knew them, and even by Mrs. Powell herself. In my eyes, and I feel it to be my duty to declare it, nothing proved in this action leaves the slightest stain on the honour or humanity of either of them.

LORD ATKIN.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinions of the Lord Chancellor and LORD WRIGHT, and as I agree both with their statement of the law and their review of the facts I should add nothing were we not differing from the Court of Appeal. I have not had the opportunity of seeing in advance the opinion of LORD BLANESBURGH which has just been read. If I had had the opportunity of reading it in advance I should probably have felt bound to say that I differ in a good many respects from the view which he has formed of the facts of this case.

The case involves only an issue of fact very closely defined. The plaintiff was injured in the nursing home, either by the surgeon at the operation between 11 and 12 noon on Jan. 20 or by the nurse about 7 p.m. on Jan. 21. She would feel the effects of the injury within a few hours of the operation if the surgeon was at fault: at once if the nurse was at fault. It is in the ordinary course unusual that the injury should be caused in either way either without the knowledge of the doctor in the first instance or in the process of catheterising by a competent nursing sister, such as the sister in this case was proved to be. But as the injury certainly did happen in one or other of the two ways common inherent improbability is of little weight. The case resolved itself into an issue between the credibility of the patient and the doctor on the one hand, and nurses on the other. The judge who saw the witnesses believed the former. I venture to think that such a finding in such a case precluded any successful appeal. I wish to express my concurrence in the view that on appeals from the decision of a judge sitting without a jury the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal is free and unrestricted. The court has to re-hear; in other words, has the same right to come to decisions on the issues of fact as well as law as the trial judge. But the court is still a court of appeal, and in exercising its functions is subject to the inevitable qualifications of that position. It must recognise the onus upon the appellant to satisfy it that the decision below is wrong: it must recognise the essential advantage of the trial judge in seeing the witnesses and watching their demeanour. In cases which turn on the conflicting testimony of witnesses and the belief to be reposed in them an appellate court can never recapture the initial advantage of the judge who saw and believed. And in no cases should this advantage be more readily recognised than in cases which involve character and reputation.

I agree with all your Lordships in thinking that in the present case the Court of Appeal were not justified in differing from the findings of the trial judge, based as they expressly were upon his opinions of the credibility of the plaintiff and the surgeon. In particular, I think that there was no sufficient ground for expressing the strong views about the untruthfulness of Dr. Kirkland, whom no member of the Court of Appeal had seen giving evidence, while he was believed by the judge who saw him. I have already said that the Court of Appeal are unrestricted in their jurisdiction in appeals, and it seems to me unfortunate that they should be entangled by any formula as to their powers. But if any formula were adopted I cannot imagine any more unsatisfactory or of so limited a scope as that adopted from JAMES, L.J., in The Sir Robert Peel (1). In fact, however, it seems plain that the governing fact relied on by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS is based upon a misunderstanding of the judgment of the trial judge, who expressed no opinion upon the credibility of the plaintiff as to the facts which it was suggested caused the hernia. I have not tried to form any opinion as to what judgment I should have given if I had seen the witnesses myself. I find no reason for rejecting the findings of the very experienced judge who had that advantage, and I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I have shared to the full the anxiety which your Lordships have felt in disposing of this appeal, involving as it does questions of grave moment to the parties. The evidence presents a direct conflict of oral testimony on a pure issue of fact. If the judgment given in the plaintiffs' favour in the court of first instance had been based on the verdict of a jury, your Lordships' task would have been relatively easy, for there was plainly ample evidence on which a reasonable jury could have found for the plaintiffs and the verdict must have stood.

But the case was tried by a judge sitting alone, and on appeal from the decision of a judge the Court of Appeal and this House have a duty to exercise their jurisdiction as tribunals of appeal on fact as well as on law, a jurisdiction which your Lordships have never hesitated to exercise when satisfied that the courts below have erred on a question of fact. Where, however, as in the present instance, the question is one of credibility, whether either story told in the witness-box may be true, where the probabilities and possibilities are evenly balanced, and where the personal motives and interests of the parties cannot but affect their testimony, this House has always been reluctant to differ from the judge who has seen and heard the witnesses, unless it can be clearly shown that he has fallen into error. The reasons for that reluctance have been expounded by your Lordships who have preceded me. They are founded on common sense and they are nowhere better stated than by Lord Loreburn, L.C., in Kinloch v. Young (5), from whose speech I take leave to quote the following passage (1911 S.C. (H.L.) at p. 4):

> "Now, your Lordships have very frequently drawn attention to the exceptional value of the opinion of the judge of first instance, where the decision rests upon oral evidence. It is absolutely necessary no doubt not to admit finality for any decision of a judge of first instance, and it is impossible to define or even to outline the circumstances in which his opinion on such matters ought to be overruled, but there is such infinite variety of circumstances for consideration which must or may arise, and it may be that there has been misapprehension, or that there has been miscarriage at the trial. But this House and other courts of appeal have always to remember that the judge of first instance has had the opportunity of watching the demeanour of witnesses—that he observes, as we cannot observe, the drift and conduct of the case; and also that he has impressed upon him by hearing every word the scope and nature of the evidence in a way that is denied to any court of appeal. Even the most minute study by a court of appeal fails to produce the same vivid appreciation of what the witnesses say or what they omit to say."

I have had an uneasy feeling, as I listened to the able arguments of counsel in this appeal that I was remote from the poignant realities of the case and that I was being asked, as it were, to dispose of the fate of the parties in their absence. It is only the written evidence which reaches this House; the other evidence which the judge of first instance tells us that he has relied upon cannot be reproduced or subjected to review here, and I have never felt more conscious of the disability imposed by the absence of this aid to judgment.

I should nevertheless be ready to differ from the decision of Horridge, J., if the criticisms to which it has been subjected in the Court of Appeal and at your Lordships' bar had carried conviction to my mind that he had gone wrong. But these criticisms have not convinced me, as they have not convinced your Lordships, and I am of opinion that no sufficient reason has been shown for departing from the decision of the experienced trial judge who enjoyed the advantages denied to your Lordships and who manifestly devoted the utmost care to the consideration of the case. I accordingly concur in the motion that his judgment be restored.

LORD WRIGHT.—This appeal is from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, reversing a judgment of Horridge, J., who had awarded the female appellant, Mrs. Powell (whom I shall hereafter refer to as the appellant) £2500 with costs and the male appellant Mr. Powell (whom I shall refer to as the husband) £977 with costs. The case was tried by the judge alone, a special jury who had been empanelled having been discharged at the joint request of both parties after the end of the first day.

The respondents are the proprietors of a nursing home and were sued, without any formal objection, as the Streatham Manor Nursing Home. The appellant became a patient of the home; on Jan. 20, 1930, the operation of hysterectomy was there performed upon her by Dr. Kirkland, an experienced medical practitioner of thirty-eight years standing who had performed this operation almost 200 times. Subsequently she suffered from a leakage of urine which in fact was due to her bladder having been punctured.

It is not contested that this puncture must have been caused in one or other of two ways, that is either in the course of the operation or on the next day when attempts were unsuccessfully made by the sisters of the home to catheterise her. On the material issues there was a direct and serious conflict of oral testimony; the judge, after hearing the case for nine days, decided in favour of the appellants; he expressly says: "I believe the plaintiff Mrs. Powell, and it is on her evidence I decide this case." The Court of Appeal were of opinion that he was wrong in so deciding and in believing the appellant, mainly it seems on their views of the probabilities of the case and, in a less degree, on some inconsistencies, which they observe, in her evidence and in that of Dr. Kirkland, who gave evidence on her behalf. They set aside the judgment of Horridge, J., and entered judgment for the respondents with costs.

The case is both difficult and unusual; it is important in respect of the particular interests of the parties and is also of general importance because of the discussion which has taken place before this House on the proper functions of the Court of Appeal on hearing an appeal from the decision of a judge sitting without a jury, where the case is purely one of fact, and the trial judge has based his judgment on the conclusion he has formed as to which of the witnesses, whom he has seen and heard, are trustworthy and which are not.

[His Lordship reviewed the facts and continued:] There are further matters of controversy in this difficult case, and further probabilities or contentions on the one side or the other, to some of which I shall advert later, but it is sufficient here to repeat that, if the story told by the female appellant as to her actual experiences is true, it would indicate damage to the bladder caused (though in a manner apparently unprecedented) by the use of the catheter: and that her evidence, if accepted, as it was by the judge, that she suffered from distension of the bladder earlier in the day negatives the possibility of her bladder having been punctured during the operation. On the other hand, if there was in fact a leakage or escape of urine, as the nurses say, starting on the evening before and continuing, and that leakage was per vaginam, the puncture of the bladder which caused the leakage must have been caused during the operation. As the judge fully appreciated, he could not escape from the responsibility of coming to a decision on the direct conflict of evidence.

Before I turn to consider the reasoning which led the Court of Appeal to reverse the conclusions of fact arrived at by the judge, it is necessary to examine what are the principles which have been established to regulate the duty of the Court of Appeal in cases such as the present. The essence of the matter is now contained in the initial words of Order LVIII, r. 1 (which has statutory effect) which are as follows: "All appeals to the Court of Appeal shall be by way of re-hearing." These words apply to an appeal from the decision of a judge sitting without a jury. The position is different when the trial has been with a jury. Where the trial has been before a judge alone the re-hearing is had on the evidence given before the judge, except in the rare cases where further evidence has been permitted to be called before the Court of Appeal; that may be done under r. 4, which enables this course to be taken on "special grounds only and not without special leave of the Court." In effect, there, the re-hearing is very different from the original hearing: it is a re-hearing on documents, including the judge's notes and sometimes, as in this case, also the shorthand notes, whereas the judge who originally heard the case, both saw and heard the witnesses, and during an examination and cross-examination, often prolonged and searching, had abundant opportunity of forming an opinion as to their relative trustworthiness or the reverse. A re-hearing of this character is essentially different from the re-hearing which takes place on an appeal to quarter sessions: on that latter appeal, the witnesses are called and give their evidence afresh, as if there had been no previous trial: there is also this further difference that at quarter sessions the appellant does not open the appeal, but the complainant, even though respondent on the appeal, begins: the hearing on the appeal proceeds on the same course as the original hearing; whereas on a re-hearing by way of appeal under Order LVIII, r. 1, the order of opening the case may be transposed: the appellant even if defendant below opens the appeal and develops his case, putting together such select passages from the judge's notes or documents or shorthand notes as appear helpful to him and adopting what arrangement he chooses: he naturally seeks to create at the outset a sentiment in favour of the appellant.

But the appeal under Order LVIII is still a re-hearing and as such differs from appeals from judgments of judges of county courts or upon cases stated by justices under certain statutes; as to these latter, reference may be made to what was said by LORD ATKINSON in Folkestone Corporation v. Brockman (6) ([1914] A.C. at p. 362). In these latter cases the Court of Appeal is not a judge of fact in any sense: its powers of review are limited to cases where judgment has been given without evidence, and, therefore, without jurisdiction or under error in law. The case of an application for a new trial or to set aside a verdict after trial with a jury, again involves different considerations and need not be considered here. In all these latter cases the Court of Appeal is not the judge of fact.

But under Order LVIII the Court of Appeal is the judge of fact. Here, however, arises the crucial circumstance that the court is the judge of fact with what may be a vital difference as compared with the trial judge, since the re-hearing which it conducts is under the different conditions which have been explained. What consequences properly follow from that have been stated in several cases. The latest and fullest statement of the relevant principles is now to be found in the opinion of LORD SUMNER (which was the opinion of the House) in Owners of Steamship Hontestroom v. Owners of Steamship Sagaporack, Owners of Steamship Hontestroom v. Owners of Steamship Durham Castle (7). That was an Admiralty case, and the authorities cited by LORD SUMNER were decisions in Admiralty appeals; indeed these questions could not have arisen before the Judicature Act in common law cases, in which the jury alone was the competent judge of fact. LORD SUMNER states the antinomy which arises when the court which is judge of fact has neither seen nor heard the witnesses and discusses how it is to be reconciled. He says ([1927] A.C. at p. 47):

> "Of course, there is jurisdiction to re-try the case on the shorthand note, including in such re-trial the appreciation of the relative values of the witnesses, for the appeal is made a re-hearing by rules which have the force of statute: Order LXVIII, r. 1. It is not, however, a mere matter of discretion to remember and take account of this fact: it is a matter of justice and of judicial obligation. None the less, not to have seen the witnesses puts appellate judges in a permanent position of disadvantage as against the trial judge, and, unless it can be shown that he has failed to use or has palpably misused his advantage, the higher court ought not to take the responsibility of reversing conclusions so arrived at, merely on the result of their own comparisons and criticisms of the witnesses and of their own view of the probabilities of the case."

He adds a little later:

> "If his [the trial judge's] estimate of the man [the witness] forms any substantial part of his reasons for his judgment the trial judge's conclusions of fact should, as I understand the decisions, be let alone."

LORD SUMNER quotes to the same effect earlier Admiralty authorities, both before and since the Judicature Act.

But in my opinion the same principles apply in ordinary common law cases: indeed in a personal injury case which came on appeal from Scotland to this House the rule was enunciated in analogous terms. That was Clarke v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co. (2). LORD BUCKMASTER said that Courts of Appeal should not seek anxiously to discover reasons adverse to the conclusions of the learned judge who has seen and heard the witnesses and determined the case on the comparison of their evidence. LORD WRENBURY said that the trial judge was in a position of advantage, which he as an appellate judge did not possess. LORD SHAW dwelt on the important effect of indications to be drawn from witnesses' manner and deportment.

Two principles are, I think, beyond controversy. First it is, I think, clear that in an appeal of this character—that is from the decision of a trial judge based on his opinion of the trustworthiness of witnesses whom he has seen—the Court of Appeal

> "in order to reverse must not merely entertain doubts whether the decision below is right, but be convinced that it is wrong."

The Julia, Bland v. Ross (8) (14 Moo. P.C.C. at p. 235), per Lord Kingsdown, cited with approval by Lord Sumner ([1927] A.C. at p. 47). And secondly the Court of Appeal has no right to ignore what facts the judge has found on his impression of the credibility of the witnesses and proceed to try the case on paper on its own view of the probabilities as if there had been no oral hearing. Lord Sumner protested against such a course being taken: he thus stated ([1927] A.C. at p. 50) what were to his mind the proper questions which the Appellate Court should propound to itself in considering the conclusions of fact of the trial judge:

> " (i) Does it appear from the President's judgment that he made full judicial use of the opportunity given him by hearing the viva voce evidence? (ii) Was there evidence before him, affecting the relative credibility of the witnesses, which would make the exercise of his critical faculties in judging the demeanour of the witnesses a useful and necessary operation? (iii) Is there any glaring improbability about the story accepted, sufficient in itself to constitute 'a governing fact which in relation to others has created a wrong impression' or any specific misunderstanding or disregard of a material fact or any 'extreme or overwhelming pressure,' that has had the same effect?"

Lord Sumner in his reference to "a governing fact" is quoting what was said by James, L.J., in The Sir Robert Peel (1). I have found it difficult to appreciate the precise application in that case of this observation. The Court of Appeal there affirmed the decision of the trial judge on a question of the admissibility of evidence, and I can see nothing in the argument or in the facts as reported which raised this question. Furthermore, the dictum of James, L.J., does not appear by itself to constitute any full or even useful enunciation of the principles which should guide the Court of Appeal, unless, indeed, qualified and supplemented as it is by Lord Sumner. I do not understand that Lord Sumner is laying down any precise rules of universal application. I think that it is difficult, if not impossible, to seek to lay down any precise rule to solve the problem which faces the Court of Appeal when it has to act as a judge of fact on the rehearing, but finds itself "in a permanent position of disadvantage as against the trial judge." In truth, it is not desirable, as I think, to do more than state, as I think Lord Sumner was stating, principles which will guide the appellate court in the majority of such cases. The problem in truth only arises in cases where the judge has found crucial facts on his impression of the witnesses; many, perhaps most cases, turn on inferences from facts which are not in doubt, or on documents; in all such cases the appellate court is in as good a position to decide as the trial judge. But where the evidence is conflicting and the issue is one of fact depending on evidence, any judge who has had experience of trying cases with witnesses cannot fail to realise the truth of what Lord Sumner says; as the evidence proceeds through examination, cross-examination and re-examination the judge is gradually imbibing almost instinctively, but in fact as a result of close attention and of long experience, an impression of the personality of the witness and of his trustworthiness and of the accuracy of his observation and memory or the reverse. He will not necessarily distrust a witness simply because he finds him inaccurate in some details; he can give such inaccuracy its proper place, particularly if he sees that the witness is tired, or antagonised, or confused, or perhaps impatient, and especially if the matter or the inaccuracy is of minor or collateral importance. But such inaccuracies may appear in a very different light when pointed to as isolated passages in the shorthand notes and abstracted from the human atmosphere of the trial and from the totality of the evidence. The judge will form his impression from the whole personality of the witness; he can allow for the nervous witness, standing up in a crowded court or worried by the strain of cross-examination. The judge may be deceived by an adroit and plausible knave or by apparent innocence, for no man is infallible; but in the main a careful and conscientious judge with his experience of courts is as likely to be correct in his impressions as any tribunal, unless, perhaps, as some would say, a jury of twelve members is preferable. Yet even where the judge decided on conflicting evidence, it must not be forgotten that there may be cases in which his findings may be falsified, as for instance by some objective fact; thus in a collision case by land or sea the precise nature of the damage sustained by the colliding objects or their relative or final positions A may be determinant and indisputable facts, and the same may be true of some conclusive document or documents which constitute positive evidence refuting the oral evidence of the witness; such cases have occurred in the experience of most judges and are covered by the third question propounded by LORD SUMNER.

When I seek to apply these principles to the present case I find myself unable to accept as sufficient the reasoning which has led the lords justices to reverse the decision B of the trial judge. I trust that in the brief summary which alone is possible here, I shall do no injustice to their elaborate and careful judgments. I have only extracted from these judgments enough to explain why I find it impossible to agree with their reasoning. I shall also have to advert briefly to some parts of the evidence which up to now I have felt able to ignore. As the judgments of the Court of Appeal agree in the main, I do not think it necessary to discuss each individually. C

Their general tenor is that the appellant's story is not credible, but they lay stress on certain more general aspects. Thus I may refer in the first place to their view of the improbability that the puncture should have been caused in the attempt to catheterise made by Sister Hyndman with the help of Sister Cooper; it is more probable in the view of the Court of Appeal that the injury was done by Dr. Kirkland while operating; and it is said that the appellant's evidence of her subjective feelings or her experiences D so soon after a major operation cannot be regarded as accurate, especially in view of the evidence as to her nervous condition before the operation and the fact that she was receiving injections of morphia from time to time. But all the evidence is that she was quite sensible at the material times, as Sister Hyndman herself says. I cannot find evidence of any kind to the contrary and I do not see how I can speculate. The judge has found that her story is true in fact: that finding must be upset. The Court of Appeal E cannot proceed as if no such finding exists. On the other side of the picture they do not seem to have given any heed to the undoubted fact that the attempt by the sisters to catheterise met with some obstruction calls for explanation. That in itself is an arresting fact; the very careful evidence of the eminent surgeon, Mr. Hedley, evidently accepted by the judge, disposes of the only explanation tendered of this unusual occurrence. F

In the next place, great stress is laid in the Court of Appeal on the fact, at first sight, and, perhaps, on any view, calling for explanation, that no claim was made against the respondents for more than two years after the appellant left the home: and further that even then the letter of claim first sent did not complain at all of the puncture of the bladder, but only mentioned the minor claim that the appellant had been negligently dropped by the night nurse and had, thereby, sustained a hernia. These facts are to be G treated, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, as constituting a "glaring improbability" such as LORD SUMNER envisages, and as being fatal to the judge's conclusion. I cannot accept this argument. The judge deals with the difficulty shortly, but as I think sufficiently, in these terms:

> "Considerable comment was made on the delay which occurred before any claim was made but it is amply explained by the circumstances of the terrible condition H in which the plaintiff Mrs. Powell was and by the doctor's desire not to encourage her in any way to make a claim against this home with which he was himself associated and of which Mr. Hogg, who was a great personal friend of his and with whom he had been away for two holidays, was the secretary. I have seen the witnesses and accept their evidence as to the delay."

I

When this delay is spoken of as a glaring improbability, it must be inquired what is the standard of probability to be taken. Is it that of the normal man in normal circumstances, if such an abstraction is conceivable? Any such standard would obviously be fallacious, since the true question can only be what was probable if you take, as you must, these particular individuals situated in the particular circumstances in which they were. I can see no reason to reject the judge's conclusion, even if it were competent for me to speculate on probabilities of this kind. I observe that the first letter of complaint was followed in a few days by a letter setting out the full complaint, and in a few days more by a letter from the appellants' solicitors. On the other hand, it may be noted that the reply from the respondents' solicitors to that letter stated that it had been impossible for the nurses to approach the appellant and insert a catheter at all as the appellant was so tender. This was in April, 1932. It was not till the following July that the respondents' solicitors wrote correcting that statement: the respondents were no doubt in a position of some difficulty owing to the lapse of time; sometimes in such cases reconstruction takes the place of recollection.

Another matter emphasised by the Court of Appeal is that the claim for the hernia is rejected by the judge, and that is described by the Court of Appeal as "a touchstone of the validity and credibility of the plaintiff's story." The matter is dealt with very shortly by the judge in his judgment, but your Lordships, like the Court of Appeal, have been provided, not only with the judge's very full and careful notes, but with the shorthand notes of the evidence and of counsel's speeches. It is clear from these that the judge believed the appellant's story both as to the fact that she had the hernia and that she was negligently dropped on the bed by the night nurse in the way she describes: these, indeed, are all the facts to which she speaks in her examination in chief. In cross-examination she states that the hernia resulted from the fall. This is a matter of inference which on the medical testimony the judge refuses to draw. But I fail to see how all this can afford a ground for treating the appellant's evidence as incredible.

To turn to the consideration of the general probabilities of the case by the Court of Appeal, they appear to be of opinion that it is much more likely that Dr. Kirkland would cause the puncture in the operation (which indeed on the evidence he might do without negligence, though he ought to notice it) than that the sisters should be guilty of what is described as "brutality" almost amounting to a criminal assault, or that being experienced nurses they should be guilty of such negligence and that their story should consequently be believed. If the inquiry is to be which story is the more probable, then I may confess, as LORD SUMNER did, that "I am a poor hand at answering that kind of question" ([1927] A. C. at p. 49). What is undoubtedly suggested is that Dr. Kirkland, knowing he had caused the injury, was inventing a story and prompting the appellant to tell it and was putting the blame on the sisters, when he found that he could no longer keep the appellants quiet or keep them from making a claim. It is said in the Court of Appeal that his evidence is "a mass of inconsistency and improbability." I can only observe that, apart from the fact of his professional standing, he is, after being cross-examined at great length, believed by the judge. To my mind it would be unjust after this, to seek to convict him on paper. As to the sisters, especially Sister Hyndman, their conduct, if the view of the judge is accepted, is capable of a much more charitable construction than could on the other theory be applied to Dr. Kirkland, if the view adverse to him were adopted. The appellant herself speaks throughout of Sister Hyndman as having been kind to her: the appellant's belief that she had been damaged is not inconsistent with absence of animosity. Sister Hyndman is spoken of as fully competent. In any case, the judge heard them fully before he decided. I do not advert to features of the evidence which on any view are curious, such as the sister's statement that until the claim was made in March, 1932, she had no idea that the constant leakage of urine experienced by the appellant was due to anything other than nervous incontinence, or the evidence of Dr. Kirkland that before he catheterised the appellant, he examined the parts and saw that the urine was leaking per vaginam and diagnosed that the bladder had been punctured by the attempts to catheterise, but did not mention it at the home till next morning and then not to Sister Hyndham, and did not for some time discuss it with the appellants. No doubt the case presents many difficulties, but that is no ground to justify reversing the decision of the trial judge.

It is not, in my opinion, necessary to examine more minutely the evidence. I think I have done so sufficiently to show why, in my judgment, nothing has been established either in the judgments of the Court of Appeal or in the able and strenuous arguments enforcing those judgments which counsel for the respondents have advanced before your Lordships of such a character as to constitute either any specific misunderstanding or disregard of a material fact or any extreme and overwhelming pressure, or any governing fact, or in any way to justify reversing the decision of the very learned and experienced judge who heard the case for nine days. I do not say that it was not a difficult case. I am not seeking to re-try the case de novo and as if there had been no trial before the judge. I do not know, nor is it material that I should know (if indeed I could) how I should have decided the case if I had tried it myself. It is enough to say that I am not convinced that the judge was wrong.

Appeal allowed.

Shipping—Towage—Damage to hirer's vessel—Liability of tug—Exemption "whilst towing"—"Tug in position to receive orders direct from hirer's vessel to pick up ropes or lines"—United Kingdom Standard Towage Conditions, cl. 1.

By cl. 1 of the United Kingdom Standard Towage Conditions: "For the purpose of these conditions, the phrase 'whilst towing' shall be deemed to cover the period commencing when the tug is in a position to receive orders direct from the hirer's vessel to pick up ropes or lines or when the tow rope has been passed to or by the tug, whichever is the sooner. . . ." By cl. 3: "the tug-owner shall not, whilst towing, bear or be liable for damage done by . . . the tug or done . . . to the hirer's vessel arising from any cause including negligence at any time of the tug-owners' servants or agents."

The defendants, owners of the steamship U., had, through their agents, entered into a contract with the plaintiffs whereby it was agreed that the plaintiffs should supply two tugs to tow the U., which was discharging at Bellamy's Wharf, River Thames, down river to Swanscombe Buoys. No exact time had been stipulated for the commencement of the towage, but it had been intimated to the plaintiffs that the towage would commence on the afternoon tide of March 4, 1934, after the U. had discharged, and that the tugs had better be in attendance at about 11 a.m. on that day. On March 4, the plaintiffs' tug K. went to Bellamy's Wharf, but she approached the U. at such high speed that, before she could take her way off, she collided with the U., doing her considerable damage. The plaintiffs alleged that the tugs had been engaged on the terms of the United Kingdom Standard Towage Conditions, and that those conditions afforded them a complete defence to the action brought against them by the U. in respect of the collision damage. The plaintiffs contended that the collision happened "whilst towing." The defendants denied that they had engaged the tugs prior to the collision, and contended that in any event the terms of the towage conditions were irrelevant, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief because at the time of the collision the towage conditions had not begun to apply since the U. had not finished discharging, her pilot had not yet come on board, her boatmen were not in attendance, and the U. was consequently not in a position to give orders to the tug.

Held: (i) that the word "position" in cl. 1 involved not only the physical situation of the tug, but the conception of the tug being in a condition to receive and act upon orders from the ship to pick up ropes or lines, and that that must have some reference, not only to the readiness of those on board the tug to receive those orders, but to the intention of those on board the ship to give them; (ii) that, although at the time of the collision the K. was within hailing distance of the U., as the evidence showed that nobody on board the U. was preparing to give orders with regard to ropes and lines and that the K., when she arrived, was mainly engaged in trying to avoid the collision, the tug was not at the critical moment in a position to receive such orders, and that, accordingly, the period covered by the words "whilst towing," as defined by cl. 1, had not commenced to run, and the plaintiffs were not protected.

Action for a declaration and consequent order.

The plaintiffs, William Watkins, Limited, of London, owners of the steam tug Kenia, claimed as against the defendants, A/S D/S Danebrog, of Copenhagen, owners of the steamship Uranienborg: (i) a declaration that they were not liable to the defendants for damage resulting from a collision between the two vessels on March 4, 1936, because the United Kingdom Standard Towage Conditions, upon the terms of which the tug was engaged, afforded a complete defence to the plaintiffs in another action brought against them by the defendants; and (ii) an order setting aside an admission of liability which the plaintiffs had filed in that other action under a mistake of fact.

Owen L. Bateson for the plaintiffs.
Cyril Miller for the defendants.

SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P.—This is an action by the owners of the steam tug Kenia, the substance of which, without setting out all the heads of claim, is a claim to be allowed to recall an admission of liability, the filing of which has the effect of a judgment, on the ground that the admission was made by mutual mistake of fact and that there is, once that mutual mistake is cleared away, a defence to the action. Owing to the commonsense and candour with which these proceedings have been conducted, all the irrelevant points have been got out of the way, and it is conceded that there was a mutual mistake of fact, the mutual mistake being that both parties, at the time when the admission of liability was called for and given, were under the misapprehension that there had not been a contract of towage.

The claim was for damage by collision to a ship, the Uranienborg, lying alongside a wharf, by a tug, the Kenia, which was going in the ordinary course of events to assist her, with another tug, in going down river. Of course, if there had been no contract of towage at the moment of collision no sort of exemption would apply, and it was under that misapprehension that the original admission was made. That is conceded, and I have allowed the pleadings to be amended so as to give full effect to that allegation and to the admission. On the assumption that the amendment has been made, the point of substance emerges. If there was a contract of towage, it is conceded that the conditions, which are known as the United Kingdom Standard Towage Conditions, apply, and the question then is whether this collision occurred in circumstances which were covered by those conditions. If so, I do not think it is disputed that the Kenia would be exempt from liability. If, on the other hand, the towage conditions do not apply, I have not heard any argument to the effect that liability would not attach to the Kenia.

The circumstances are these. The steamship Uranienborg was lying alongside Bellamy's Wharf, starboard side to the wharf, and was discharging. She was expected, not to put to sea, but to leave the wharf and proceed to enter that part of the river which is at Swanscombe Buoys on Monday, March 4. On the Saturday, negotiations were entered into by telephone between the owners of the tug Kenia and another tug, and the agents of the ship, for the towing arrangements, and the matter was left that they were to provide two tugs and that the time would probably be 11 o'clock, and that the time should be verified on Monday morning by a telephone conversation direct from the office of the tug owners to Bellamy's Wharf, so that the tugs should have time to get A to the ship in ample time to perform a towage operation when required.

It is not now disputed that there was a completed contract. I do not think that it is necessary to follow out all the details, but I do not think that there ever was an actually defined time at which the towage was to begin. On the other hand, I think it was made quite clear that the towage would start some time after the ship had finished discharging and on the afternoon tide of March 4, with, no doubt, an intimation that the tugs had B better be in attendance at about 11 a.m. I think that is what it comes to, but no point is made that it was not a completed contract; all that is said is that there was no exact time, and I think that is right. In fact, the ship did not finish discharging until about 11.30, and at the material time—that is the time when the collision occurred, which was two minutes, probably about five minutes, before 11 or thereabouts—the pilot had C not come on board.

I find that the companion tug, the name of which was the Tanga, arrived at Bellamy's Wharf earlier than the Kenia. The Tanga arrived there at about 10.30 a.m. and she came up to the ship, asked for orders, was told that they were waiting for the pilot and boatmen connected with the unmooring of the ship and getting her away. The master of the Tanga hung on to one of the buoys just over by the wharf, and he was already hanging on to that buoy when he saw the Kenia come up about a quarter of a mile off. D

The Kenia came up in accordance with orders given by his owners as the result of a telephone conversation which was initiated at about 10.5 a.m., and as the result of his asking for orders, but strictly in accordance with the arrangement which had been made on the Saturday on the telephone. After he had telephoned about his orders, the man in the office telephoned to Bellamy's Wharf to find out whether the Uranienborg was shifting on Monday afternoon's tide, and her agents said she was shifting at 11 o'clock E and that they had better hurry as there was not much time. That is what is said to have been said over the telephone. I have not had evidence about the other end of the conversation and I do not think that the exact wording matters much. At any rate, the Kenia was undoubtedly going up as one of the two tugs which were going to perform this service.

She came up at what is admitted to be about six knots, or something between seven F and eight knots over the ground, the tide being flood. There was outside the Uranienborg a line of buoys—a barge tier—and the Kenia had to make her way through those. I am quite satisfied that she came through much too fast, and as the result of her excessive speed, combined with the failure to give orders to reverse her engines in time (a failure which the master himself admits), she ran into the Uranienborg at approximately a four-point angle and did very severe damage. She broke her own anchor, knocked her G own hawsepipe so severely that it was cracked all round and had to be taken out and replaced; she set in the side of the Uranienborg at a point over one of the most substantial frames no less than 4½ in. and, without going into detail, did damage which showed that the blow was a very severe blow. I am satisfied that this was the direct result, without any interruption of any sort, of her turning out of the river through the barge tiers, as I say, at an entirely excessive speed and out of proper control. It is said H that, in these circumstances, she is entirely exempt from all liability because she is covered by the towage conditions.

Before I leave that question of her speed, I should like to say that, among the other reasons for believing that she was going much too fast, is her master's report, written on the very day, in which he says that he could not understand why he did not stop his way. He said in the box now that he was practically stopped, but in his report he said: "If I I had been doubtful I would have rung my engines the second time astern, but I had no cause to, I thought, because every other time she has always done it but this time she did not." It is unimportant what was the particular fault or negligence or breakdown in the machinery, or whatever it may have been which caused her to fail to pull up and to be out of control. I am satisfied that she was going too fast and that it was her speed which caused the severity of the damage.

It is said she is covered by these conditions, and the whole point is (and both sides agree) whether, within the meaning of the phrasing of cl. 1 of the United Kingdom

Standard Towage Conditions, she was in collision "whilst towing." The meaning of the phrase "whilst towing" is given in cl. 1 in the following words:

> "For the purpose of these conditions the phrase "whilst towing" shall be deemed to cover the period commencing when the tug is in a position to receive orders direct from the hirer's vessel to pick up ropes or lines or when the tow rope has been passed to or by the tug, whichever is the sooner, and ending when the final orders from the hirer's vessel to cast off ropes or lines have been carried out, or the tow rope has been finally slipped and the tug is safely clear of the vessel, whichever is the later. Towing is any operation in connection with holding, pushing, pulling, or moving of the ship."

I need not pay any attention to that last sentence for the purpose of the present case, because nobody disputes that the operation, if it had begun, was one connected with the moving of the ship at any rate. The point is whether this period had commenced.

It is admitted (I do not want to put it on any admission, but I am clearly of opinion) that "the tug" means a tug under contract. It may be that the contract only begins by the acceptance of the offer of one among many tugs which are hovering round a ship, but the tug is assumed to be, I think, a tug which is there in pursuance of a contract of towage. The contract may, of course, be made at the moment when the towage is about to start, or it may be made days or weeks beforehand. The crucial words are:

> "is in a position to receive orders direct from the hirer's vessel to pick up ropes or lines or when the tow rope has been passed to or by the tug, whichever is the sooner."

Take the last words first and there ought to be no difficulty in ascertaining when that moment occurred. The rope either has or has not been passed to or by the tug. Once the rope has been passed there is to be no further room for argument whether the rope is taut so that the actual process of moving the ship has begun and the towing has begun.

I think those words which are the alternative to the crucial words are important in construing the crucial words, because in effect what counsel for the plaintiffs argues is this:

> "Show that the tug was there because of a contract of towage; show that she is within reasonable hailing distance of the ship at a reasonable time in reference to the contract of towage, and the words are satisfied. Her physical position is within hail, and that is enough. She is there waiting the moment when somebody gives her the orders which she is prepared to receive. She will receive them direct because she is within hailing distance and there is no more to be said about it."

I do not think that that is a reasonable interpretation. I do not think that is what the words mean. Of course, if that is the only possible meaning of the words, then, even if they may appear to lead to an absurd conclusion, that cannot be helped; one has to give effect to them. But I do not think that that is what is meant here. Whether you look at the alternative which I have just referred to, or whether you look at the corresponding point of time at which the towage ends, I think one is driven to the conclusion that something narrower than that is meant. I doubt myself whether the word "position" is only used in the sense of local situation. I think it involves also the conception of the tug being herself in a condition to receive and act upon the orders. But, however that may be, the orders which she is to be in a position to receive are orders to pick up ropes or lines—not orders generally, but those specific orders—and I think that that must have some reference to the intention of those on board the ship to give those orders, and to the readiness of those on board the tug to receive such orders.

On the facts of this case I should be prepared to hold that, even if one were bound to hold that all that matters is the physical position of the tug, I do not think that the moment had arrived. I have already said that there was nobody on board the Uranienborg who, at the moment of the Kenia's arrival, was even thinking or preparing to give orders to take or receive, as between the ship and the tug, the ropes or lines. They had not got to that stage; they were not thinking of it. I have seen the officer whose duty it would be to superintend those operations. He had not got anybody standing by;

they had not finished discharging; he had already told the other tug that neither the pilot nor the boatmen had come; and the other tug, as I have already said, was lying off some 300 ft. away, at a buoy. Mr. Bateson says that she plainly, quite plainly, was in a position to receive orders to pick up ropes or lines—she was, in the sense that she was within 300 ft. and within hailing distance, but in no other sense. She knew that the time was not ripe and was acting accordingly, and there is not a tittle of evidence from the Kenia that anybody, from the master downwards, on board the Kenia was even thinking in terms of ropes and lines at the material time. Certainly, they had come there in order to be available for the towing whenever the towing began. At the moment that this collision occurred they were not thinking of—they had not begun to expect—an order to pick up ropes or lines at all. On the contrary, all that the master was thinking of at that moment was correcting his own errors in going through those barge tiers much too fast and trying to avoid this collision. I find it, whether as a matter of construction of the conditions or on the facts of this case, impossible to hold that at the critical moment this tug was in a position to receive orders with regard to ropes or lines.

But counsel for the plaintiffs says that on his argument that does not matter. That may be so at that moment, but I have got to look at the very latest to the moment when she turned out of the river (and possibly earlier because she was within hailing distance before); but at any rate at the moment when she turned out of the river between these buoys in the barge roads, and at that moment she was in a position to receive orders. Therefore, the towage had begun, and, therefore, the fact that at some later moment she is not thinking about ropes or lines at all, she is only thinking of correcting her own carelessness, is irrelevant. The towing has begun, and the moment has not come when the tow ropes have been finally slipped and the tug is safely clear—therefore, she is subject to all the exemptions.

I think that is simply making nonsense of these conditions. I think that the least that is involved in arriving at the moment when the period commences is that the tug herself, at any rate, should be able to show that she was in a position to receive and, having received, to comply with these orders in connection with ropes or lines at the material time. I am satisfied that that period had not come in the case of this tug Kenia, but I think also that this phrase has got to be read as if there were two parties involved in the matter and that until the reasonable moment has come at which orders may be expected to be given from the ship the tug cannot be said to be in a position to receive orders from the ship; but whichever way you look at it—even if you look at it, as I say from the point of view of the tug alone—I am satisfied that on the facts of this case she was not in a position to receive orders and that the towing had not begun. That being so, I dismiss the claim with costs. That leaves the original admission, having the effect of a judgment of the court, where it is.

Action dismissed.

Master and Servant—Duty of servant—During service—Soliciting customers to transfer custom to him at future date.

The defendant, who was in the service of the plaintiffs as a milk roundsman, solicited, on the day before he left their service, the plaintiffs' customers to become his customers in the business which he was about to start.

Held: that the defendant had committed a breach of his implied contract to serve the plaintiffs with good faith and fidelity by acting as he did before the termination of his employment, and was, therefore, liable in damages.

Per Maugham, L.J.: In the absence of a valid restrictive clause in the contract of service preventing him doing so, a servant may, while in the employment of the master, be as agreeable, attentive, and skilful as it is in his power to be to the master's customers with the ultimate view of obtaining the benefit of their friendly feelings when he calls on them if and when he sets up business for himself.

Appeal from an order of HUMPHREYS, J., at Winchester Assizes.

The plaintiffs, Wessex Dairies, Ltd., were the proprietors of a dairy, and the defendant had been in their employment as a roundsman. He had previously been in the service of A. J. Garland, the plaintiffs' predecessor in the business, under an agreement whereby, in consideration of a weekly wage, he agreed that he would well and faithfully serve Garland and his assigns or successors in the same business and would not during the continuance of such service, nor after quitting such service, in any way interfere with the trade of the customers served by A. J. Garland or his assigns or successors, and, if he failed to observe these covenants, he would pay 20s. for each day's breach as liquidated damages. In 1933 Garland's business was acquired by the plaintiffs, and the defendant continued in the plaintiff's business until June 2, 1934, when he terminated his service by giving to the plaintiffs one week's salary in lieu of notice.

The plaintiffs alleged that on the day before he left their service the defendant had asked some of the customers on the round on which he worked to transfer their custom to him in connection with the business which he was starting on his own account, and that a number of them had done so. The plaintiffs claimed that this was a breach of his contract with them, or, in the alternative, they said that it was a breach of his implied obligation to "well and faithfully serve" them, and they asked for damages. HUMPHREYS, J., held that the defendant, during his service with the plaintiffs, had acted in a way contrary to their interests and was not a faithful servant to them, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to damages, which he assessed at £20.

The defendant appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the plaintiffs as to the amount of damages.

Scott Henderson for the defendant.
W. E. P. Done for the plaintiffs.

GREER, L.J.—The plaintiffs were the proprietors of a dairy in whose service the defendant had been for some time as a roundsman, as he had been with their predecessor in the business. By an agreement between that predecessor and the defendant the latter undertook that, in consideration of his weekly wage, he would

> "well and faithfully serve" [him] "or his future . . . assigns or successors in the same business and will not during the continuance of such service nor after quitting such service in any way interfere with the trade or the customers served by and from the dairy aforesaid, or endeavour in any way whatever to supply any of the said customers either as servant or master for his own benefit or that of any other person or persons whatsoever."

If that was a valid contract, the defendant would not only have been prevented from trading on his own account with customers on the round while in the plaintiffs' employment, but he would have been prevented from doing so after he had left their service, apparently, for the term of his life. It was conceded that the effect of the decision in Attwood v. Lamont (1) is to make such a contract invalid in so far as it restrained the defendant, after he left the plaintiffs' employment, from canvassing the plaintiffs' customers. The case before the judge was conducted on that view, and I do not propose to consider whether the decision in Attwood v. Lamont (1) goes as far as that. I proceed on the assumption that the clause which I have read, in so far as it restricts the defendant after he left the plaintiffs' service, is invalid, but I treat the obligation that during the employment he will well and faithfully serve the plaintiffs as binding on him. Even, however, if the latter obligation is not severable and the whole of the clause is bad, the defendant would, nevertheless, be under the ordinary implied obligations existing between master and servant, namely, that during the continuance of his employment he will act in his employers' interests and not use the time for which he is paid by the employers in furthering his own interests.

Counsel for the defendant has asked us to say that that is not so, and he cited in support of his contention Nichol v. Martyn (2), which is to be found in that collection of imperfect and misleading reports bearing the name of ESPINASSE, and of which the sidenote reads thus:

> "A servant, while in his master's service, may solicit business from his customers for himself, when his service is at an end, and he sets up on his own account."

If that is to be taken as laying down a general principle applicable to all contracts of service it is in my opinion bad law and cannot be accepted at the present day. It is obvious that during the continuance of the contract of service and during his master's time the servant has to look after, not his own interests, but those of his master. The report of Nichol v. Martyn (2) is very short, but, if the words of LORD KENYON, C.J., are correctly reported they lay it down that the servant may, while in the master's service, canvass or solicit business from the master's customers for himself to take effect after he has left the service. In that case the defendant was a traveller in the service of the plaintiffs, but it does not appear from the report whether he was in whole time service, and it may be that, if we knew the precise facts, the actual decision might be justified without accepting the general principle stated by LORD KENYON, C.J., as applicable to all master and servant contracts.

The point involved came up for consideration in Robb v. Green (3), where HAWKINS, J., in the course of a very elaborate and illuminating judgment, said this with regard to Nichol v. Martyn (2):

> "It seems presumptuous to criticise or doubt so high an authority, but I cannot help asking myself whether at the present day LORD KENYON, after considering the matter, would have considered it no breach of the duty of a servant deliberately to utilise his hours of service by being false to his master's interests and endeavouring to induce his master's customers to transfer their custom to him on a near > approaching day. It was certainly against his master's interests that he should do so. It may be under particular circumstances that the injury done to his master would hardly be greater than if he had waited till he had left the service before he made his canvass. But that is not the question. The obligation to protect his master's interests lasts until the last hour of his service. The dividing line between owing his master a duty and owing him none is that imperceptible period of time between the termination of his service and the moment he acquires freedom of action after his service has terminated."

HAWKINS, J., then dealt with the facts in the case before him, which were that, during the service, the servant copied a list of the master's customers. That was clearly a flagrant breach of trust. The passage I have read correctly states the duty owed by a servant to his master as the law regards it at the present day.

In the present case the defendant acted contrary to his duty. During the last week of his service with the plaintiffs, while pursuing his duty to his master by calling on customers and delivering milk to them, he tried to induce them to become his customers after his employment with the plaintiffs had terminated, and for the direct result of that wrongful act he is liable to pay damages. As to the damages, I cannot see my way to interfere with the amount fixed by the learned judge. The appeal and the cross-appeal must therefore be dismissed.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—The claim in this case, which raises a question of some little interest in relation to the duty of a servant to his master during the period of his employment, is based upon an alleged breach of an implied term in the contract by which the defendant was to serve the plaintiffs as a milk roundsman. The point of law involved is one on which judges have not always expressed the same opinion. The question is whether a servant in such an employment as that in which the defendant was engaged, is entitled, while in that employment, to solicit orders from his employers' customers as from a future time, namely, the time when the servant ceased to be in the employment of the plaintiffs. HUMPHREYS, J., found that the defendant was guilty of a breach of contract and awarded the plaintiffs £20 as damages. In this court the defendant's counsel has quite rightly relied on some passages in Nichol v. Martyn (2) as justifying the defendant's conduct—passages which to some extent seem to have been approved by HAWKINS, J., in Robb v. Green (3). This court has now to decide whether the language of LORD KENYON, C.J., as reported, can be accepted at the present day as accurately stating the law, and whether the words used by HAWKINS, J., which seem to agree with it are correct. Nichol v. Martyn (2) was a decision of nisi prius.

The plaintiffs were wholesale ironmongers, by whom the defendant was employed as their traveller to get orders. During his employment with the plaintiffs the defendant solicited their customers to give their orders to him after he had left their employment. In his judgment LORD KENYON, C.J., said:

> "A servant, while engaged in the service of his master, has no right to do any act which may injure his trade, or undermine his business; but every one has a right, if he can, to better his situation in the world; and if he does it by means not contrary to law, though the master may be eventually injured, it is damnum absque injuria."

Then comes this passage:

> "There is nothing morally bad, or very improper, in a servant, who has it in contemplation at a future period to set up for himself, to endeavour to conciliate the regard of his master's customers, and to recommend himself to them, so as to procure some business from them as well as others. In the present case, the defendant did not solicit the present orders of the customers; on the contrary, he took for the plaintiffs all those he could obtain; his request of business for himself was prospective, and for a time when the relation of master and servant between him and the plaintiffs would be at an end."

LORD KENYON, accordingly, non-suited the plaintiffs. The case, it may be noted, was argued by very eminent counsel, who, no doubt, put forward every point adequately, but, having regard to the fact that the skill and accuracy of ESPINASSE as a reporter have been often adversely criticised, I think there is considerable reason to suppose that the report is inaccurate. Indeed, at one time counsel were recommended by judges not to cite him, inasmuch as he afforded no sure guidance, and I cannot think that the report in this particular can be accurate. I doubt whether we can accept the view that Lord Kenyon used the words I have cited, beginning: "There is nothing morally bad." They do not sound like a judgment of his. If what the servant was doing was morally bad, it was improper, and, if improper, it was morally bad. I doubt also whether we can accept the view attributed to the Chief Justice that a person while still in the employment of wholesale ironmongers is entitled to solicit customers for himself as from the time when he ceases to be employed by them.

If that stood alone, one would probably say that the report was defective, but in Robb v. Green (3), however, Hawkins, J., said this:

> "In what I have said I do not intend to convey that while the contract of service exists a person intending to enter into business for himself may not do anything by way of preparation, provided only that he does not, when serving his master, fraudulently undermine him by breaking the confidence reposed in him. For instance, he may legitimately canvass, issue his circulars, have his place of business in readiness, hire his servants, &c. Each case must depend on its own circumstances."

I do not know what the judge meant by "legitimately canvassing," but if he meant that the servant, while going his rounds or while he was employed in some way on behalf of the master, is entitled to use the opportunity to canvass his master's customers for himself as from the day when he ceases to be in the master's service, I doubt whether that view is correct, and I observe that when that case went to the Court of Appeal nothing to that effect is to be found in the judgments. There is, however, another passage in Robb v. Green (3) when Hawkins, J., in referring to the judgment of Lord Kenyon, C.J., in Nichol v. Martyn (2), said this:

> "It seems presumptuous to criticise or doubt so high an authority, but I cannot help asking myself whether at the present day Lord Kenyon, after considering the matter, would have considered it no breach of the duty of a servant deliberately to utilise his hours of service by being false to his master's interests and endeavouring to induce his master's customers to transfer their custom to him on a near approaching day."

That appears to show that Hawkins, J., did not take the view, which the other passage I read seems to indicate, that a servant can properly canvass his master's customers for himself as from a near approaching day.

The question to be determined essentially depends on the term to be implied in the ordinary case of a contract of employment in the absence of express agreement. In the present case an express agreement has been mentioned which states the duty of fidelity, but I would like to decide the case on a wider ground. Hawkins, J., said in Robb v. Green (3) that in a contract of service, and in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, there is an implied obligation that the servant will honestly and faithfully serve his master; that he will not abuse his confidence in matters appertaining to his service; and that he will, "by all reasonable means in his power, protect his master's interests in respect to matters confided to him in the course of his service." This is somewhat vague. I do not quite know what is meant by the words "matters confided to him." For myself I do not hesitate to say that I prefer the more general implication stated thus by A. L. Smith, L.J. ([1895] 2 Q.B. at p. 320):

> "I think that it is a necessary implication which must be engrafted on such a contract that the servant undertakes to serve his master with good faith and fidelity. That is what was said in Lamb v. Evans (4), and I entirely agree with it."

The Lord Justice then asked himself whether the defendant in Robb v. Green (3) acted with good faith and fidelity. The same question has to be answered in the present case. In considering it certain considerations should not be left out of sight. First, after the employment terminates, the servant may, in the absence of special stipulation, canvass the customers of the late employer, and further he may send a circular to every customer.

On the other hand, it has been held that while the servant is in the employment of the master he is not justified in making a list of the master's customers, and he can be restrained, as he was in Robb v. Green (3), from making such a list, or, if he has made one, he will be ordered to give it up. But it is to be noted that in Robb v. Green (3), the defendant was not restrained from sending out circulars to customers whose names he could remember. Another thing to be borne in mind is that, although the servant is not entitled to make use of information which he has obtained in confidence in his master's service, he is entitled to make use of the knowledge and skill which he acquired while in that service, including knowledge and skill directly obtained from the master in teaching him his business. It follows, in my opinion, that the servant may, while in the employment of the master, be as agreeable, attentive, and skilful as it is in his power to be to the master's customers with the ultimate view of obtaining the benefit of their friendly feelings when he calls on them if and when he sets up business for himself. That is, of course, where there is no valid restrictive clause preventing him doing so.

In the present case the question is whether the defendant acted with good faith and fidelity when, on the Saturday afternoon in question and perhaps on the previous days of the week, in going his round he informed the customers that he would cease on Saturday to be in the employment of the plaintiffs, that he was going to set up business for himself, and that he would be in a position to supply them with milk, obviously soliciting their custom as from Saturday evening. In my opinion, that was a deliberate, as it was a successful, canvassing at a time when the defendant was under an obligation to serve the plaintiffs with fidelity. I am of opinion, therefore, that he committed a breach of his implied contract by acting as he did before the termination of his employment. Not to leave the matter in doubt the passage in LORD KENYON's judgment relied on by counsel for the appellant cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as good law. The amount of damages cannot, I think, be put at any high figure, because I think the learned judge saw the witnesses and considered the matter very properly. In these circumstances I cannot see my way to differ from the conclusion at which he arrived. The appeal and cross-appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

TALBOT, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I desire to add nothing except that I agree that Nichol v. Martyn (2) as reported cannot be relied on as a correct statement of the law.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Luxmoore, J.), April 11, 12, 15, 1935]

Legitimacy—Presumption of legitimacy—Rebuttal—Spouses living apart under separation deed—Evidence of non-access.

Every child born of a married woman during the subsistence of the marriage is primâ facie legitimate and the fact that at the material dates the spouses were living separate and apart under a separation deed does not render the presumption inapplicable. But where, on June 6, 1921, a deed of separation was signed by a husband and wife and they ceased to live together, and two children were subsequently born to the wife, one in March, 1922 and one in May, 1929, and in each case she registered the birth as the child of a man other than the husband with whom she had been living.

Held: that, there being no evidence to prove that there had been access by the husband since the date of the deed, the children must be deemed illegitimate and not capable of sharing in a bequest to children of the marriage.

Originating Summons.

These proceedings were commenced by the Public Trustee for the purpose of determining (inter alia) the question whether two of the defendants, namely, Dene Horton and Clive Arthur Aubrey (both infants), were entitled contingently on their respectively attaining twenty-one to share with the two first-named defendants, namely, Heather Gordon Cuthbert and Ian Reid Cuthbert (also both infants), in certain trust funds bequeathed by the will of Sarah Ann Bromage, deceased, to the plaintiff in trust after the death of Margaret Nora Cuthbert, and also after the death of Archibald Cuthbert for all children of the said Margaret Nora Cuthbert and all the children of the said Archibald Cuthbert who, being sons, should attain twenty-one or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry.

Margaret Nora Cuthbert was married on Oct. 29, 1910, to Archibald Cuthbert. Four children of the marriage were born before June 6, 1921, namely, the defendants Heather Gordon Cuthbert and Ian Reid Cuthbert, and two others who died in early infancy. On June 6, 1921, a deed of separation was executed by the husband and wife by which it was agreed that the wife should live separate and apart from her husband and free from his marital control and authority, and that she should be at liberty to reside at such place as she might think proper. No proceedings for divorce had been instituted at this date, nor were any proceedings of that nature subsequently launched. The deed of separation did not contain any clause limiting the provision thereby made for the wife to such period as she remained chaste.

Two children were born to the wife after the date of the separation deed. The first was born on March 2, 1922. This child was, as appeared from the birth certificate, registered as Dene Horton. His father's name was there stated to be Ernest Albert Gladman Horton, while the mother's name was given as Margaret Nora Cuthbert, formerly Bromage. The informants in respect of the birth were stated to be E. A. G. Horton, father, and M. N. Cuthbert, mother. This child was the defendant Dene Horton. The other child was born on May 25, 1929. The birth certificate stated the child's name as Clive Arthur, that the father's name was Henry Arthur Aubrey, and the mother's name was Margaret Nora Cuthbert, formerly Bromage. The informants were stated to be H. A. Aubrey, father, and M. N. Cuthbert, mother. This child was the defendant Clive Arthur Aubrey.

Margaret Nora Cuthbert died on Oct. 26, 1933. By the will of her mother, the said Sarah Ann Bromage, who died on May 3, 1919, certain provisions were made, as above stated, for the children of the said Margaret Nora Cuthbert and also for the children of the said Archibald Cuthbert. Evidence adduced in the case and further facts are stated in the judgment of the learned judge.

LUXMOORE, J., stated the facts and continued: It is well settled that every child born of a married woman during the subsistence of the marriage is primâ facie legitimate. This presumption, however, is not one juris et de jure, and, therefore, can be rebutted by evidence of circumstances proving the contrary: see the first answer of the judges in the Banbury Peerage Case (2). The presumption does not arise where the child is born after a decree of divorce, because in such case the marriage is no longer subsisting when the birth takes place. Nor does it arise where the parties are living apart under a decree for judicial separation: see Hetherington v. Hetherington (6) or under an order of a court of summary jurisdiction: see Andrews v. Andrews and Chalmers (9). The ground for the exception where there is a decree for judicial separation appears to be statutory, for it was provided by s. 16 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, now replaced by s. 185 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Consolidation Act, 1925, that a sentence of judicial separation should have the effect of a divorce a mensa et thoro under the existing law. A similar basis also appears to exist in the case of a separation under an order of a court of summary jurisdiction: see the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5.

It is said that the execution of a separation deed where the parties are living apart under its provisions has the same effect as a decree for judicial separation or an order of a court of summary jurisdiction, and that in such a case the presumption has no application. In support of this contention reliance is placed on the decision of BATESON, J., in Mart v. Mart (3). With all respect to that learned judge, and notwithstanding my personal inclination to accept and follow that decision, it seems to me to be at variance with that of the House of Lords in Morris v. Davies (4), where the husband and wife were in fact living apart under a separation deed executed by them, and also with the decision in the Aylesford Peerage Case (1), where also the husband and wife had executed a separation deed and were at the material dates living apart under its provisions.

In my judgment, I am bound by those decisions to decide the present case on the footing that the fact that the parties were at the material dates living separate and apart under a separation deed does not render the presumption inapplicable. This being so, it is necessary to consider in what circumstances the presumption may be rebutted. A careful consideration of the authorities leads to the conclusion that if the parties have opportunities of access it is necessary, in order to rebut the presumption, to prove that such access did not take place between the husband and wife as is necessary in order for the husband to be the father of the child in question. I use the word "access" in the sense in which it is defined in the fifth answer in the Banbury Peerage Case (2) in the following passage:

> "The non-existence of sexual intercourse is generally expressed by the words 'non-access of the husband to the wife'; and we understand those expressions as applied to the present question, as meaning the same thing, because in one sense of the word 'access,' the husband may be said to have access to his wife as being in the same place or the same house, and yet, under such circumstances as, instead of proving, tend to disprove, that any sexual intercourse took place between them."

In their fifth answer in the Banbury Peerage Case (2) the judges stated that the presumption of legitimacy could > "only be legally resisted by evidence of such facts or circumstances as are sufficient to prove, to the satisfaction of those who are to decide the question, that no sexual intercourse did take place between the husband and wife, at any time when, by such intercourse, the husband could, by the laws of nature, be the father of such child. Where the legitimacy of a child, in such a case, is disputed, on the ground that the husband was not the father of such child, the question to be left to the jury is, whether the husband was the father of such child, and the evidence to prove that he was not the father must be of such facts and circumstances as are sufficient to prove, to the satisfaction of a jury, that no sexual intercourse took place between the husband and wife at any time, when, by such intercourse, the husband could, by the laws of nature, be the father of such child."

The evidence must, as the Lord Chancellor said in Morris v. Davies (4),

> "be such as to exclude all doubt, that is, of course, all reasonable doubt in the minds of the court or jury, to whom that question is submitted."

The question cannot be decided upon a mere balance of probabilities. To quote LORD LYNDHURST'S words:

> "that presumption of law is not lightly to be repelled. It is not to be broken in upon, or shaken by a mere balance of probability; the evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory and conclusive."

In considering these statements it is, I think, necessary to bear in mind that the fact to be proved is in a sense a negative, and, consequently, in some of its aspects is incapable of positive proof.

Counsel on behalf of the defendant Clive Arthur Aubrey, urged that in a case where there was evidence of meetings between the husband and wife, and using the word "access" in its wider sense and not in the sense in which, in the Banbury Peerage Case (2), the judges stated they were using it in their answers, there was a presumption of sexual intercourse which could only be rebutted by direct evidence that no such intercourse in fact took place, and for this argument he relied on certain statements to be found in the judgments in R. v. Mansfield (Inhabitants) (10). The story unfolded in the report of that case appears at first sight strongly to suggest a finding in the opposite sense to that arrived at by the court, but I think the actual finding is explained by the fact that the only witness called at the trial was the wife, most of whose evidence was not admissible, and the case was, therefore, treated as being one in which no contrary evidence was available. The argument of counsel for the defendant is, in effect, the same as was advanced in favour of the appellant in Morris v. Davies (4). The Lord Chancellor dealt with it in these words:

> "I consider the Banbury Peerage Case (2) as establishing a principle, not only from the opinions of the judges, but from the points actually decided, distinctly negativing the presumption argued for at the Bar, namely, that where the evidence proves that the husband and wife had opportunities of access, from being shown to have been in the same house or place, no evidence from the conduct of the parties, that is, no circumstantial evidence, can be received to repel the presumption of sexual intercourse, and therefore of the legitimacy of the child, because,"—and this is the ground on which the argument was rejected—"first, in that case, there was no evidence of any separation or quarrel between Lord and Lady Banbury, and the presumption of their living toegether as man and wife, and of a sexual intercourse, therefore arose, but yet was capable of being repelled by circumstantial evidence."

It is plain that in the Banbury Case (2) the presumption of sexual intercourse arising from the fact that the husband and wife were living together was rebutted by the conduct of the parties and other circumstantial evidence.

What are the material facts in the present case? It is clear from the correspondence exhibited that the husband and wife were not living together at the beginning of 1921. They appear to have parted in June of the preceding year. In October of that year the wife was suing the husband in the King's Bench Division of this court for money lent and the return of certain chattels. Negotiations were in hand for the execution of a deed of separation. On Feb. 3, 1921, the wife's solicitors wrote to those of the husband a letter in which is this statement: "Our Client" [the wife] "sees no reason for exchanging addresses, as she has no desire to communicate further with your client [the husband]," while in April of the same year the wife is writing to her solicitor telling him not to mention that "we are out of town as he"—the husband—"might try to find us." There is nothing in the correspondence to suggest that the wife and husband ever met during this period before the deed of separation was executed.

Mr. Horton's evidence is that he first met the wife in April, 1921; that they began to live together as man and wife some four or five weeks after that date, and that from May until September they lived together at week-ends. There is a statement to the effect that the wife told Mr. Horton at some time during the period between May and September, 1921, that she had been to London with regard to the sale of her house at Hornsey, and that she had seen her husband with regard to certain furniture he had belonging to her. The wife and Mr. Horton moved in September, 1921, to 16, Denbigh-street, where they lived as man and wife for some months. They left that address and moved to Brixton, where the defendant Dene Horton was born. They returned to 16, Denbigh-street after that event. They continued to live together for some years, and finally separated in 1927. I have already referred to the facts relating to the registration of the birth of the defendant Dene Horton. From early infancy he has been brought up under the care of Mr. Horton's parents. So far as the evidence goes, there is no suggestion that the husband knew of his existence. Certainly he was never asked to provide for him and never acknowledged him as his child. A consideration of the evidence leaves no shadow of doubt in my mind that the husband was not the father of Dene Horton, and that there was no sexual intercourse between the husband and wife at the material time when he was conceived. I have no hesitation in holding that Dene Horton is not a legitimate child of Margaret Nora Cuthbert.

It remains to consider the evidence with regard to the defendant Clive Arthur Aubrey. Some time before August, 1928, Mr. Arthur Henry Aubrey, being then nineteen years of age, went to lodge with the wife. At this time the latter was about forty years of age. Very soon after his arrival intimacy took place between him and the wife, and this continued during a period which ended in November, 1928, when there was a quarrel. Mr. Aubrey left the house and returned to his parents. On March 25, 1929, the defendant Clive Arthur Aubrey was born. The nurse in attendance on Mrs. Cuthbert telephoned to Mr. Aubrey and told him that Mrs. Cuthbert wanted to see him. He went to London, and was told by Mrs. Cuthbert that it was his duty to register the child as his. He, accordingly, went with her to the registrar, and the result appears on the birth certificate of the defendant Clive Arthur Aubrey. There is no evidence to suggest that the husband knew of the birth of this child. He certainly has never been acknowledged by the husband as his child. Since Mrs. Cuthbert's death the child has been residing under the care of Mr. Aubrey's parents. If the evidence stopped there, there could, I think, be no reasonable doubt but that the child was illegitimate. It is said, however, that the weight of this evidence is displaced because Mr. Aubrey has stated that while he was living with Mrs. Cuthbert her husband used to visit her, not only for the purpose of seeing her children, Heather and Ian, but also on other occasions, and that on these occasions he (Aubrey) used to go out, but he does not state at what time he was in the habit of returning or whether he ever found the husband still there. Having regard to his pecuniary interest and the vague nature of the suggestion, I do not think much weight can be attributed to this statement or to the statement that Aubrey was told by Mrs. Cuthbert that she and her husband were considering making a home together again. Obviously, if intercourse had taken place between the husband and wife, there was cogent reason for registering the husband as the father of the child.

In my judgment, there is no reasonable doubt in this case also, and I hold that the defendant Clive Arthur Aubrey is not the legitimate child of the wife. I, therefore, answer the questions raised by the summons in the negative.

Intestacy—Grant of administration—Grant to nominee of applicant—Desire of applicant to institute proceedings against intestate's estate—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49), s. 162 (1), as amended by Administration of Justice Act, 1928 (18 & 19 Geo. 5, c. 26), s. 9*—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act*, 1934 (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 41), s. 1 (1).

On these motions a grant of letters of administration was made in each case to a nominee of the applicant under s. 162 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928, to enable the applicant to sue for damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, against the administrators as defendants under third-party motor insurance policies held by the deceased. In both cases those primarily entitled to take representation had declined to do so.

Notes. As to discretionary grants, see 16 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 224 et seq., and for cases, see 23 DIGEST 164 et seq. For the relevant statutes, see 9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 639 et seq.

Application by G. W. Miskin for a grant of letters of administration to the estate of Alistair Begg Simpson, a minor, and an undergraduate of Cambridge University, who, when motor-cycling, was killed in a motor collision on Oct. 28, 1934. It was stated that the applicant and another member of his family, who were travelling by motor car, were injured in the accident. The deceased's only asset was his motor car insurance policy, and his parents, who were the persons entitled to administration, refused to take a grant. The insurance company repudiated liability. The applicant and the owner of the car (which was damaged), wished to sue for damages against the estate of the deceased, and it was necessary that an administrator should be appointed who would be made defendant in the action. The applicant prayed that a certain accountant be appointed administrator for that purpose.

H. B. D. Grazebrook, for the applicant.—The Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 1 (1), provides that on the death of any person since July 25, 1934, all causes of action subsisting against or vested in him (subject to certain immaterial exceptions) shall survive against or for the benefit of his estate, as the case may be. Section 1 (3) (b), provides that no proceedings shall be maintainable in respect of a cause of action in tort which, by virtue of s. 1, has survived against the estate of a deceased person unless the cause of action arises not earlier than six months before the death, and proceedings are taken in respect thereof not later than six months after his personal representative takes out representation. Here no claim can be made in respect of the insurance policy until there is a legal representative. Unless and until the applicant obtains judgment he cannot claim representation as a creditor, but the court may grant letters of administration to his nominee, under the special powers provided by s. 162 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as amended by s. 9 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1928. There would then be a representative of the estate who could be sued.

LANGTON, J., granted the order as prayed.

In the case of J. G. Gunning, deceased, it was stated that Mr. John Gillespie Gunning died on Nov. 7, 1934, as the result of a motor cycle accident, intestate, and with no estate except a third-party indemnity motor insurance policy. His widow and father declined to take out letters of administration.

Mr. F. A. Pidwell, a motor cyclist who had been injured in the accident, wished to sue for damages, and applied for the appointment of a nominee as administrator who might be made defendant in an action the cause of which subsisted against the estate.

Contract—Frustration—Event causing impossibility of performance act of party setting up frustration—Possibility of event known to parties at date of contract—No express condition relating thereto.

Per CURIAM: Where the possibility of an event which is relied on as constituting the frustration of an adventure is known to both parties when the contract is made, C but the contract contains no express condition relating to that event and is absolute in terms so far as concerns it, the contract is not resolved on the happening of the event.

By s. 69a of the Canadian Fisheries Act it was a punishable offence to leave any port in Canada with intent to fish with a vessel that used an otter trawl, except under licence from the Minister. The appellants were charterers of the St. C., a D steam trawler belonging to the respondents, which was fitted with, and could only operate as a trawler with, an otter trawl. It was expressly agreed that the trawler should be employed in the fishing industry only. The charter-party was dated Oct. 23, 1928, and was to continue from year to year. It was renewed on Oct. 25, 1932, for one year. On March 11, 1933, the appellants applied to the Minister of Fisheries for licences for the five trawlers they were operating. The Minister in E his reply stated that only three licences would be granted, and he requested the appellants to state for which of the five trawlers they desired to have licences. The appellants gave the names of three trawlers other than the St. C. and licences were issued for those three trawlers. The appellants thereupon claimed that the charter-party had thereby been frustrated and that they were no longer bound by it. In an action brought by the respondents for hire due under the charter, the appel- F lants pleaded that the contract had become impossible of performance, and that they were wholly discharged from it.

Held: the principle of frustration of an adventure assumes that the frustration arises without blame or fault on either side; what was claimed in the present case to be a frustration by reason of the withholding of the licence was a matter for which the appellants were responsible, it having happened in consequence of their G election regarding which trawlers should be licensed; and, therefore, they remained liable under the contract.

Appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia reversing a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

C. B. Smith, K.C. and Frank Gahan, for the appellants.
Willink, K.C. and Mocatta, for the respondents.

April 12. LORD WRIGHT.—The appellants were charterers of a steam trawler, the St. Cuthbert, which was the property of the respondents. The charter-party, dated Oct. 25, 1928, had originally been entered into between the respondents and the National Fish Co., Ltd., but was later by agreement taken over by the appellants. It was for twelve calendar months, but was to continue from year to year unless terminated by three months' notice from either party, the notice to take effect at the end of one of the years. It was expressly agreed that the trawler should be employed in the fishing industry only; the amount of monthly hire was to be fixed on a basis to include a percentage of the purchase price, and also operating expenses. There was an option given to the charterers to purchase the trawler.

By letters dated July 6 and 8, 1932, exchanged between the appellants and respondents, it was agreed that the charter-party as then existing should be renewed for one year from Oct. 25, 1932, but at a rate of monthly hire which was 25 per cent lower than that previously paid: the amount so agreed came to $590.97 per month. It was also then agreed that, in the event of the appellants giving notice on or before July 25 in any year that they did not intend to renew, they should further give notice whether or not they intended to exercise the option to purchase. In fact, the appellants gave notice on Jan. 27, 1933, that they did not intend to renew the charter or to purchase the vessel.

When the parties entered into the new agreement in July, 1932, they were well aware of certain legislation consisting of an amendment of the Fisheries Act (c. 73, R. S. Can. 1927) by the addition of sect. 69A, which in substance made it a punishable offence to leave or depart from any port in Canada with intent to fish with a vessel that used an otter or other similar trawl for catching fish, except under licence from the Minister. It was left to the Minister to determine the number of such vessels eligible to be licensed, and regulations were to be made defining the conditions in respect of licences. The date of this amending sect. 69A was June 14, 1929. Regulations were published on Aug. 14, 1931, former regulations having been declared invalid in an action in which the appellants had challenged their validity.

The St. Cuthbert was a vessel which was fitted with, and could only operate as a trawler with, an otter trawl. The appellants, in addition to the St. Cuthbert, also operated four other trawlers, all fitted with otter trawling gear.

On March 11, 1933, the appellants applied to the Minister of Fisheries for licences for the trawlers they were operating, and in so doing complied with all the requirements of the regulations, but on April 5, 1933, the Acting Minister replied that it had been decided (as had shortly before been announced in the House of Commons) that licences were only to be granted to three of the five trawlers operated by the appellants. He accordingly requested the appellants to advise the Department for which three of the five trawlers they desired to have licences. The appellants thereupon gave the names of three trawlers other than the St. Cuthbert, and for these three trawlers' licences were issued, but no licence was granted for the St. Cuthbert. In consequence, as from April 30, 1933, it was no longer lawful for the appellants to employ the St. Cuthbert as a trawler in their business. On May 1, 1933, the appellants gave notice that the St. Cuthbert was available for redelivery to the respondents; they claimed that they were no longer bound by the charter.

On June 19, 1933, the respondents commenced their action claiming $590.97 as being hire due under the charter for the month ending May 25, 1933; it is agreed that if that claim is justified, hire at the same rate is also recoverable for June, July, August, September and October, 1933.

The main defence was that through no fault, act or omission on the part of the appellants, the charter-party contract became impossible of performance on and after April 30, 1933, and thereupon the appellants were wholly relieved and discharged from the contract, including all obligations to pay the monthly hire which was stipulated.

The defence succeeded before the trial judge, Doull, J. His opinion was that there had been a change in the law, including the regulations, which completely changed the basis on which the parties were contracting. He thought it > "not unreasonable to imply a condition to the effect that if the law prohibits the operation of this boat as a trawler the obligation to pay hire will cease."

He also thought the appellants were not bound to lay up another boat instead of the St. Cuthbert. It seems that the learned judge proceeded on the footing that the change of law was subsequent to the making of the contract, whereas it was in fact anterior to the agreement of 1932 under which the trawler was being employed at the time the licence was refused.

This judgment was unanimously reversed by the judges in the Supreme Court En Banco. The judges of that court rightly pointed out that the discharge of a contract by reason of the frustration of the contemplated adventure follows automatically when the relevant event happens and does not depend on the volition or election of either party. They held that there was in this case no discharge of the contract for one or both of two reasons. In the first place, they thought that the appellants, when they renewed the charter in 1932, were well informed of the legislation, and when they renewed the charter at a reduced rate and inserted no protecting clause in this regard, must be deemed to have taken the risk that a licence would not be granted. They also thought that, if there was frustration of the adventure, it resulted from the deliberate act of the appellants in selecting the three trawlers for which they desired licences to be issued.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the latter ground is sufficient to determine this appeal. Great reliance was placed in the able argument of counsel for the appellants on Bank Line, Ltd. v. Arthur Capel & Co. (2), and, in particular, on the judgment of Lord Sumner in that case. That case was in principle very different from this, because the vessel which was chartered in that case was actually taken from the control of the shipowners for a period such as to defeat the contemplated adventure; it was in consequence impossible during that time for the shipowners to place the vessel at the charterers' disposal at all. In the present case the St. Cuthbert was not requisitioned: it remained in the respondents' control, who were able and willing to place it at the appellants' disposal; what happened was that the appellants could not employ the St Cuthbert for trawling with an otter trawl. No doubt it was expressed in the charter-party that the St. Cuthbert should be employed under the charter in the fishing industry only, but the respondents did not warrant the continued availability of the vessel for that employment nor was payment of hire made dependent on that condition. The St Cuthbert was available for the appellants to make such use of her as they desired and were able to make. This case is more analogous to such a case as Krell v. Henry (1), where the contract was for the hire of a window for a particular day: it was not expressed but it was mutually understood that the hirers wanted the window in order to view the Coronation procession; when the procession was postponed by reason of the unexpected illness of King Edward, it was held that the contract was avoided by that event: the person who was letting the window was ready and willing to place it at the hirer's disposal on the agreed date; the hirer, however, could not use it for the purpose which he desired. It was held that the contract was dissolved, because the basis of the contract was that the procession should take place as contemplated. The correctness of that decision has been questioned, for instance, by Lord Finlay, L.C., in Larrinaga & Co., Ltd. v. Société Franco-Americaine des Phosphates de Médulla, Paris (3). Lord Finlay observes (29 Com. Cas. at p. 7):

> "It may be that the parties contracted in the expectation that a particular event would happen, each taking his chance, but that the actual happening of the event was not made the basis of the contract."

The authority is certainly not one to be extended: it is particularly difficult to apply where, as in the present case, the possibility of the event relied on as constituting a frustration of the adventure (here the failure to obtain a licence) was known to both parties when the contract was made, but the contract entered into was absolute in terms so far as concerned that known possibility. It may be asked whether in such cases there is any reason to throw the loss on those who have undertaken to place the thing or service for which the contract provides at the other parties' disposal and are able and willing to do so. In Hirji Mulji and others v. Cheong Yue Steamship Co., Ltd. (4), LORD SUMNER ([1926] A.C. at p. 510), speaks of frustration as > "a device by which the rules as to absolute contracts are reconciled with a special exception which justice demands."

In a case such as the present it may be questioned whether the court should imply a condition resolutive of the contract (which is what is involved in frustration) when the parties might have inserted an express condition to that effect but did not do so, though the possibility that things might happen as they did, was present in their minds when they made the contract.

This was one of the grounds on which the judges of the Supreme Court were prepared to decide this case. Their Lordships do not indicate any dissent from the reasoning of the Supreme Court on this point, but they did not consider it necessary to hear a full argument, or to express any final opinion about it, because in their judgment the case could be properly decided on the simple conclusion that it was the act and election of the appellants which prevented the St. Cuthbert from being licensed for fishing with an otter trawl. It is clear that the appellants were free to select any three of the five trawlers they were operating and could, had they willed, have selected the St. Cuthbert as one, in which even a licence would have been granted to her. It is immaterial to speculate why they preferred to put forward for licences the three trawlers which they actually selected. Nor is it material, as between the appellants and the respondents that the appellants were operating other trawlers to three of which they gave the preference. What matters is that they could have got a licence for the St. Cuthbert if they had so minded. If the case be figured as one in which the St. Cuthbert was removed from the category of privileged trawlers, it was by the appellants' hand that she was so removed, because it was their hand that guided the hand of the Minister in placing the licences where he did and thereby excluding the St. Cuthbert. The essence of "frustration" is that it should not be due to the act or election of the party. There does not appear to be any authority which has been decided directly on this point. There is, however, a reference to the question in the speech of LORD SUMNER in the Bank Line, Ltd. v. Arthur Capel & Co. (2) ([1919] A.C. at p. 452):

> "One matter I mention only to get rid of it. When the shipowners were first applied to by the Admiralty for a ship they named three, of which the Quito was one, and intimated that she was the one they preferred to give up. I think it is now well settled that the principle of frustration of an adventure assumes that the frustration arises without blame or fault on either side. Reliance cannot be placed on a self-induced frustration; indeed, such conduct might give the other party the option to treat the contract as repudiated. Nothing, however, was made of this in the courts below, and I will not now pursue it."

A reference to the record in the House of Lords confirms LORD SUMNER'S view that the court below had not considered the point, nor had they evidence or material for its consideration. Indeed in the war time the Admiralty, when minded to requisition a vessel, were not likely to give effect to the preference of an owner, but rather to the suitability of the vessel for their needs or her immediate readiness and availability. However, the point does directly arise in the facts now before the Board, and their Lordships are of opinion that the loss of the St Cuthbert's licence can correctly be described, quoad the appellants, as "a self-induced frustration." LORD SUMNER in Hirji Mulji v. Cheong Yue Steamship Co., Ltd. (4) ([1926] A.C. at p. 507) quotes from LORD BLACKBURN in Dahl & Co. v. Nelson, Donkin & Co. (5) (6 App. Cas. at p. 53) who refers to a "frustration" as being a matter "caused by something for which neither party was responsible": and again ([1926] A.C. at p. 508) he quotes BRETT, J.'s words which postulate as one of the conditions of frustration that "it should be without any default of either party." It would be easy, but is not necessary, to multiply quotations to the same effect. If either of these tests is applied to this case, it cannot in their Lordships' judgment be predicted that what is here claimed to be a frustration, that is, by reason of the withholding of the licence, was a matter for which the appellants were not responsible or which happened without any default on their part. In truth, it happened in consequence of their election. If it be assumed that the performance of the contract was dependent on a licence being granted, it was that election which prevented performance, and on that assumption it was the appellants' own default which frustrated the adventure. The appellants cannot rely on their own default to excuse them from liability under the contract.

On this ground, without determining any other question, their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. They will humbly so advise His Majesty.

Appeal dismissed.

Damages—Assessment by judge—Test for review by Court of Appeal.

In the case of an appeal against an award of damages by a judge sitting without a jury the Court of Appeal has power to consider the matter, the appeal being by way of re-hearing, but the mere fact that the amount awarded is one which the Court of Appeal might feel disinclined to give does not justify that court in amending the judge's award. Before the court will review the judge's assessment they must be satisfied that it is based on an entirely erroneous estimate of the damage.

Appeal by defendant from a judgment of GREAVES-LORD, J., sitting without a jury, at Liverpool Assizes.

The plaintiff, C. H. Owen, was a physician and surgeon with a considerable general practice at Liverpool. The defendant F. Sykes, was the owner of a motor coach. On Feb. 10, 1935, the plaintiff, when in a covered way between Bridge-street, Warrington, and the yard and garages of the Lion Hotel, Warrington, was crushed against the wall of the covered way by the defendant's motor coach, which had entered the way from Bridge-street. The plaintiff brought an action for damages for personal injuries, alleging negligence on the part of the defendant or his servant. The defendant pleaded that the injuries were due solely to the negligence of the plaintiff, or, in the alternative, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. On the issue of damage, the plaintiff, whose age was thirty-nine years, proved that from the injury there resulted a permanent limitation of expansion of the left lung with a consequent impairment of his breathing powers, and that, therefore, he would be subject to an increased susceptibility to pulmonary ailments. The special damages claimed amounted only to £268. Evidence was given that the plaintiff, who had been an athlete, now on slight effort was subject to fatigue, exhaustion and faintness, and that to continue his practice on its former scale he would have to employ an assistant at a salary of £300 or £400 a year.

GREAVES-LORD, J., held that the plaintiff's injuries were caused solely by the negligence of the driver of the motor coach, and there was no contributory negligence. On the issue as to damages he said:

> "But now comes the most difficult part of the whole case, to arrive at the proper sum for damages. It is a terrible injury in this case. One has to bear in mind that an assistant for the doctor's practice would probably cost £300 or £400 a year, but as against that the probabilities are that, if the plaintiff gets a good assistant it would increase the practice, and that would to a great extent help him towards paying the £300 or £400 a year, even allowing for the fact that the plaintiff himself will do less than he has done. That has to be borne in mind. At the same time, the two items are substantial—first, the cost of an assistant, and, secondly, the amount which has to be given in the case not merely for pain and suffering but for the terrible and permanent injury which has been inflicted, because this is not an injury which just causes pain and suffering for a time; it affects the amenities of the man's life for the rest of its duration. An athlete, a strong man, is reduced to a man who will have to live very largely a sheltered life, and have no opportunity of taking part in those sports which have appealed to him, and which probably have made him capable of resisting the effects of this accident as he has done. The special damages claimed are, as counsel has said, negligible—£268. The judgment here must be for something very much in excess of that. I have had to think considerably of what would be a fair sum, and I have come to the conclusion that I should not award a less sum here than £10,000."

The defendant appealed on the issue both of liability and the damages.

GREER, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of GREAVES-LORD, J., awarding a sum of £10,000 damages in a personal injuries case in which the plaintiff was a doctor and the defendant was the proprietor of a motor char-a-banc or coach.

The accident happened in a covered way adjoining the Lion Hotel in Warrington. The learned judge, having seen the witnesses, accepted the evidence of the plaintiff as to the way in which the accident happened. According to that evidence the plaintiff, after having placed his motor car in the yard, was coming with his companion into the covered way in order that he might enter the entrance of the dining room of the hotel where he desired to seek refreshment for himself and his companion. According to his evidence, when, coming round what has been called the buttress in the yard, he approached the covered way he saw the defendant's vehicle beginning to come from Bridge-street into the covered way, and he thereupon started to enter the covered way under the impression, which he got from the way in which the vehicle approached him, B that there would be from 2 ft. to 3 ft. between the side of the covered way in which he was and the vehicle that was advancing towards him, and that, if the position had remained as it was, there was no risk in his going forward as he did. He went a few paces—he put it at five paces, but I think he has over-estimated the distance which he had got into the covered way—when the approaching vehicle began to turn. A

One thing is clear. It is found by the learned judge upon the evidence of the defendant himself that he did not see the plaintiff, notwithstanding the fact that his vehicle had its side lights and its headlights on. That is only reconcilable with the fact of an accident having happened if he was not keeping a good look-out. It is true that he had to keep a good look-out on both sides, because there was, very nearly ahead of him, a lady standing near a bow window in the yard, and he had to be certain that he would not collide with her. I cannot help thinking that the learned judge was right in D finding that this accident was due solely to the negligence of the defendant in not keeping a good look-out, and that the allegation of contributory negligence was properly rejected by the learned judge, because the plaintiff when he entered the covered way had no reason to suppose that the driver of the approaching vehicle would not keep a good look-out, and that, if there was any risk, he would turn a little more towards the offside of the covered way, or he would stop his vehicle until the plaintiff had got past. E For these reasons I think that we ought not to interfere with the learned judge's finding as regards liability. C

But we are faced with a somewhat more difficult question, namely, the question whether we ought to interfere with the learned judge's judgment as to the amount of damages. The amount of damages awarded in this case is a very large one—£10,000—and though it is true that an appeal is a re-hearing of the case, and if we are satisfied that F the assessment of damages was wrong, we ought to re-open the question of damages and ourselves decide what the proper damages should be, it has been laid down in Flint v. Lovell (1) that this court does not readily interfere with the assessment of damages made by a learned judge at the trial. That assessment is necessarily an estimate, and an estimate is necessarily a matter of degree, and it seems to me that, unless we come to the conclusion that the learned judge took an erroneous view of the evidence as to the G damage suffered by the plaintiff, or made some mistake in giving weight to evidence that ought not to have affected his mind or in leaving out of calculation some consideration that ought to have affected his mind, we ought not to interfere. I cannot help thinking that the damages awarded in this case were on a generous scale. If I had had to estimate them as the trial judge I probably would have arrived at some considerably smaller figure, because one has got to think not merely about this case but about other H cases which will have to be decided, and not to allow an over-generous estimate to be regarded as an example of the kind of damages that ought to be given in cases of this sort.

I again call attention to the passages I quoted in my judgment in Rose v. Ford (2), from those of PARKE, B., in Armsworth v. South-Eastern Rail. Co. (3) (11 Jur. at p. 760), and of BRETT, J., in Rowley v. London and North-Western Rail. Co. (4) (L.R. 8 Exch. I at p. 231), showing that if a trial judge approaches the question from the point of view of giving complete damages so as to put the plaintiff in exactly the same position as he would have been if he had never been damaged at all, and to give him what might be considered the price of the injuries which he has sustained in the form of damages, that would be wrong.

I desire to add that if anything we say in this case were to encourage the idea that unduly large damages can be safely given either by juries or by judges in cases of personal injuries, the Court of Appeal has a free hand in dealing with the matter, especially in a case which is tried by a judge alone. But I have come to the conclusion, after hearing full argument on the question, that though we might ourselves have given a smaller sum, we cannot say that the learned judge made an entirely erroneous estimate of the damage to which the plaintiff is entitled.

The result is that this appeal will be dismissed with costs.

SLESSER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and wish only to add a few observations on the second matter which was argued before us, namely, that the damages awarded in this case are such that this court should revise them by reducing them.

This is a case where the appeal is brought from the judge assessing damages in his judgment, sitting without a jury. The position is different in some respects from that where the appeal is from a judgment following the verdict of a jury. First, as was decided in Watt v. Watt (5), this court has no power without the consent of the parties to alter the damages awarded by a jury when it is of opinion that those damages in law are indefensible, but can only order a new trial in which those damages may be reconsidered. In the case of trials by a judge alone this court has power, as the hearing is by way of re-hearing, to consider the matter, and, owing to recent legislation and Orders and Rules of the Supreme Court, it is now very usual for judges sitting alone to be required to assess damages in cases of negligence and in other matters. Another difference which arises is that the test which has been applied in so many cases in the case of a jury is not, on the face of it, applicable in quite the same manner when the case is tried by a judge alone. Johnston v. Great Western Rail. Co. (6), and other cases decide that where the damages are so improper that the court comes to the conclusion that the jury must have taken into consideration matters which they ought not to have considered, or applied the wrong measure of damage, the Court of Appeal will interfere. That test, of course, is applicable to the case of a judge trying a case alone. This finds expression in the judgment of GREER, L.J., in Flint v. Lovell (1), when he said ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 360):

> " In order to justify reversing the trial judge on the question of the amount of damages it will generally be necessary that this court should be convinced either that the judge acted upon some wrong principle of law. . . ."

Whether there be a jury or whether there be no jury if the tribunal acts upon a wrong principle of law this court may allow the appeal. But apart from this, in the case of a jury the question may arise whether the jury have returned such a high amount of damages as no twelve reasonable men could return. It is in circumstances of that kind also that the case may be sent to another jury for re-assessment. I do not think that this test of what twelve reasonable men could assess can be appropriate to the case of a judge sitting alone, and I would accept as a criterion what GREER, L.J., stated in Flint v. Lovell (1) as his second ground for this court re-assessing the damages on an appeal from a judge sitting alone ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 360),

> " or that the amount awarded was so extremely high or so very small as to make it, in the judgment of this court, an entirely erroneous estimate of the damage to which the plaintiff is entitled."

I read those words to mean that, if the amount given is an amount which this court itself might feel disinclined to consider as an amount which they themselves would assess, that circumstance alone would not necessarily justify this court in making any amendment of the judge's award, and this court normally would have to be satisfied that there was, again to quote the words of GREER, L.J., " an entirely erroneous estimate of the damage." That is a question of degree, and I wish to guard against the supposition, if there be such a supposition, that because this court is hearing such an appeal by way of re-hearing, therefore it is ready to re-assess damages on the basis of what this court itself might have given as damages. It is incumbent, I think, on the parties wishing to disturb the damages awarded to satisfy this court that the judge had acted upon an erroneous estimate—meaning thereby something in which the error has so tinged the proceedings that it was a proper case of this court to assess the damages. Otherwise it seems to me a matter of discretion for the learned judge—a matter of degree.

Those remarks seem to me to apply to this case, because these damages, as I understand it, are more than I, for one, would have been willing to award, but they are not so much more than I am prepared to say that there has been an erroneous estimate justifying a re-assessment. I think, therefore, that this appeal fails on damages, not because I do not think that this medical man has been treated with overmuch generosity, but because I do not think that the estimate is so erroneous as to justify variation.

SCOTT, L.J.—I agree with the judgments that have been delivered and with the reasoning on which they are based. I only want to make one observation. In this case there are three elements of damage. The first, which I set aside, is the trivial amount of special damage for expenses incurred. The second is the necessity for employing an assistant, as to which the learned judge had to come to a conclusion as a question of fact and did come to the conclusion that an assistant would be necessary indefinitely throughout the plaintiff's remaining professional life. That involved an estimate in money of the cost of obtaining an assistant, and of the amount of compensating good that it would bring to the practice, and generally the question affecting the net cost, so to speak, to the doctor of having to have an assistant, including in that the drawback of the assistant not being the doctor personally and, therefore, the possibility of some patients discontinuing to be clients of the doctor. The other element is the element of pain and suffering, past, present and future, and of permanent disability and of its extent. Both these elements are essentially questions of degree, and in my view the question of the amount to be allowed in respect of the assistant is essentially a question of degree. With regard to all these matters the judge at the trial seems to me necessarily to be in a better position to form an estimate that any Court of Appeal can be.

I only desire to add that on damages, as on other matters where the decision depends on a question of fact and the exercise of a judge's discretion on matters of degree, this court ought to be very careful not to interfere unnecessarily with his decision at the trial.

Appeal dismissed.

WICKHAMBROOK PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL v. CROXFORD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer, L.J., and Eve, J.), March 22, May 3, 1935]

Ecclesiastical Law—Impropriate rectory—Repair of chancel—Liability of impropriator—No limitation to amount of receipts from tithe—Liability to admonition on failure to repair—Right to contribution from other owners of tithe—Chancel Repairs Act, 1932 (22 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 2 (3).

A rector of a parish, whether spiritual or lay, is liable to maintain in repair the chancel of the church; that liability is personal and several, not joint, and it is not limited to the amount of the rector's receipts from the tithe. Failure to discharge the obligation is a matter which, but for the provisions of the Chancel Repairs Act, 1932, would have rendered the impropriator, within s. 2 (3) of that Act, liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court in a cause of office promoted against him in that court. In deciding the last question the court must consider only the question of liability arising from the ownership of tithe in whole or in part and not whether it would have been right and proper in all the circumstances to issue an admonition, but the owner of part of the tithe against whom liability is established can recover contribution from the owners of the remainder of the tithe.

Appeal by the plaintiff council from an order of His Honour Judge HILDESLEY in the Bury St. Edmunds County Court of Suffolk.

The plaintiff council instituted this proceeding under the Chancel Repairs Act, 1932, claiming against the defendants, Yvonne Croxford (spinster) and Constance Edith Maria Croxford, wife of Frank Leonard Croxford, and mother of Yvonne Croxford as lay impropriators and as such liable for the repair either wholly or in part of the chancel of the parish church of Wickhambrook, the sum of £123 12s. 6d., the estimated cost of putting the chancel in repair. Notice to repair as required by sect. 2 (1) of the Act of 1932 was duly served on the defendants, and it was admitted at the hearing that the sum of £123 12s. 6d. represented the reasonable cost of necessary repairs.

By a tithe commutation agreement made in 1840 there was effected a merger of a large proportion of the tithes issuing out of lands in the parish of Wickhambrook. The remaining portion was commuted for a tithe-rent-charge amounting in the aggregate to £120 per annum. This was apportioned between the vicar and the impropriate rector, whose apportioned share amounted to £52 10s. The impropriate tithe rent-charge is now owned by several persons, of whom the defendant and (or) her daughter own rent-charge to the extent of £39 11s. 9d. Prior to Nov. 7, 1933, this tithe was under mortgage to one Edgar Armstrong Everington. By letter dated Sept. 28, 1933, Mr. Everington's solicitors informed one Justin Brooke, who was liable for tithe amounting to £6 14s. 6d., part of the amount of £39 11s. 9d., that Mr. Everington had disposed of the tithe to the Church Property Trust, Limited, and requested him to pay all tithes due or thereafter to become due to that trust or to their solicitor, Mr. Buttle. On Sept. 29, Mr. Buttle wrote to Mr. Brooke informing him that his clients, the trust, had acquired the tithe and enclosing a letter of authority from Mr. Everington's solicitors and an account of the amount due and requesting payment. To this Mr. Brooke replied on Sept. 30 noting that the trust had purchased the tithe and adding: " I welcome this, as the church is badly in need of repair . . . and I shall be glad to hear from you that the work is to be put in hand at once." Correspondence followed between Mr. Brooke and Mr. Buttle, and ultimately, on Feb. 17, 1934, the plaintiffs' solicitors sent to the Church Property Trust, Limited a notice to repair the chancel. To this Mr. Buttle replied stating that the trust " are not the owners of the rectorial tithe at Wickhambrook," but that " the tithe has been acquired for Miss Yvonne Croxford, for whom her mother, Mrs. Croxford, is trustee." Mr. Everington had, in fact, conveyed the tithe amounting to £39 11s. 9d. to Mrs. Croxford on Nov. 7, 1933, and, by deed poll executed on Jan. 10, 1934, expressed to be supplemental to the conveyance of Nov. 7, 1933, Mrs. Croxford executed a declaration of trust in favour of her daughter Yvonne. On March 28, 1934, notice to repair was given to each of the defendants.

May 3. The following judgments were read.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—The chancel of the parish church of Wickhambrook in the county of Suffolk is out of repair, and it has been estimated that a sum of £123 12s. 6d. represents the reasonable cost of executing the necessary repairs.

These proceedings are taken by the parochial church council of Wickhambrook under the Chancel Repairs Act, 1932, to enforce liability for the repair of the chancel upon the defendants Yvonne Croxford and Constance Edith Marie Croxford, her mother and trustee, who are lay impropriators of a part of the tithe rent-charge issuing out of lands in the parish of Wickhambrook, which amounts in the aggregate to £120. The share of this sum, which belongs to Mrs. Croxford as trustee for her daughter, is £39 11s. 9d. per annum, and the remainder of the tithe belongs to other persons who are not parties to these proceedings.

By the Chancel Repairs Act, 1932, s. 1, the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts to enforce the repair of chancels is abolished and proceedings in future to enforce this liability are provided by s. 2 of the Act. These provisions are that where a chancel is in need of repair " the responsible authority," which is later defined in the Act to mean the parochial church council of the parish in which the chancel is situate, if, as is the case in the present proceedings, there is one, may serve upon any person who appears to them to be liable to repair the chancel, a notice in a prescribed form stating in general terms the grounds on which that person is alleged to be liable, the extent of the disrepair, and calling upon him to put the chancel in proper repair. If the chancel has not been put into repair in the course of a month from the service of the notice to repair, the responsible authority may bring proceedings in the county court of the district in which the chancel is situate against the person on whom the notice was served to recover the sum required to put the chancel into proper repair; and by s. 3 (4) (b), where judgment is given for the payment of a sum of money in respect of repairs not so far executed, the court may give directions in accordance with rules made therefor for the purpose of ensuring that the money is spent in executing the repairs. The sum for which judgment is to be given is, by s. 2 (3), to be such sum as appears to the court to represent the cost of putting the chancel into proper repair; and the person against whom judgment for this sum is to be given is a defendant who > "would but for the provisions of this Act have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court in a cause of office promoted against him in that court on the date when the notice to repair was served."

It is obvious that the legislature in this section adopted the precedent of obscurity set many years back by a statesman who, when confronted with a question as to what are the duties of an archdeacon, contented himself by explaining that he was an officer required to perform the archidiaconal functions.

The facts of the present case prove that the defendants are in possession of a right to a quota of the great tithe, not more than £39 11s. 9d. in value per annum, that Mrs. Croxford became possessed of that right in November, 1933, and executed a declaration of trust in favour of her daughter on Jan. 10, 1934, and that the total sum received or to be received from this quota of the tithe during a considerable time would be insufficient to defray the liability which is charged by the notice at £123 12s. 6d.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendants on the ground that > "it must be proved against an impropriator who is made a party that he has received tithes or other profits belonging to the rectory sufficient to cover the cost of repair."

He expressed his own opinion

> "that a monition would not have issued for the reason that the defendants have not received sufficient to defray the cost of the necessary repairs."

Further, he added,

> "I venture to assume that an ecclesiastical court, sitting as a court of conscience as well as a court of law, would have declined, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, to issue a monition against these defendants upon its being made to appear, not only that they had not received sufficient to defray the expenses of repair, but that it was alleged, and not denied by another party whom the promoters in a cause of office had refrained from citing, that these parties had received sums which they ought to have devoted to the same purpose."

The parochial church council appeal to this court. It is obvious that many difficult questions fall to be determined. They may be divided as follows: (i) Is there a liability upon a possessor of a part of the great tithe to repair the chancel? (ii) Is that liability personal, or only to the extent of the receipts from the tithe actually received by him? (iii) In either case would the defendants have been liable to be admonished to repair this chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court if a cause of office had been promoted against them? (iv) Is the mere question of liability arising from the ownership of tithe in whole, or in part only, to be considered, or is the county court and this court to consider whether it would have been right and proper in all the circumstances of the case to issue an admonition? (v) Can an owner of a part of the tithe against whom a liability is established recover contribution from the other owners of the remainder of the tithe?

At the outset it is necessary to construe the word "liable" as used in s. 2 (3). It is, I think, used in that subsection in a sense different from that in which it is used in s. 2 (1). In the latter subsection the words "any person who appears to them to be liable to repair the chancel" connote a liability that imports a duty resting upon that person for which he is answerable in law. In the later subsection it intends a peril of being admonished to which he is exposed and subject to or likely to suffer from.

The learned judge based his judgment upon a passage which he cited from Burn's Ecclesiastical Law (9th ed., 1842), vol. 1, p. 352, and which I need not repeat. Sir Robert Phillimore was the editor of that edition and "corrected" and added to the original work, but no authorities are cited for the propositions advanced. The same paragraph, again without any authority being attached to it, is found in Sir Robert Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law (2nd ed., 1895), vol. 2, p. 1417, though slightly amended so as to bring it into accord with the state of the law in later years. Dr. Burn's paragraph had referred to the advisability of the churchwardens summoning a vestry. Then the vestry, having made a rate for the repair of the church, were to make an order for the churchwardens to prosecute the impropriators of the tithe at the parish expense.

Suits and proceedings to enforce church rates for ecclesiastical purposes were abolished in 1868 (Compulsory Church Rate Abolition Act, 1868), hence the paragraph was altered in this particular of procedure by the editor of his father's work in 1895, Sir Walter Phillimore—afterwards a judge of the High Court and of the Court of Appeal, and created Lord Phillimore in 1918.

But the substance of the statement for the present purpose remains the same. The learned county court judge was right in attaching weight to this statement and the propositions involved in it, laid down, as it was, by a succession of such eminent authorities upon ecclesiastical law. But the propositions are not easily interpreted and reconciled with what would seem to be just and equitable. It is clear that the statement decides that a suit brought against the impropriators is to enforce: (a) a duty and not the mere recovery of a sum of money; (b) a duty which lies upon each and all the impropriators; (c) that no abatement of the suit could be asked for by those sued on the ground that other impropriators were also liable.

But the liability is affirmed to be enforceable only if "the parties prosecuted have received tithes or other profits belonging to the rectory sufficient to repair it." It is not necessary to make every impropriator a party. It would seem, therefore, that the parties sued might escape because of the insufficiency of their receipts, although the total receipts of those sued and not sued might be sufficient to attract liability. If a liability is enforced, the burden of it is to be divided among those who have been held liable, and nothing is said as to any contribution being made by others liable who were not sued. It seems necessary, therefore, to go behind the authority of these text-books and examine the question afresh in the earlier authorities.

Upon the first question propounded above, it seems clear that a rector of a parish, whether spiritual or lay, is liable to maintain the chancel in repair: (see 2 Institutes 489; Comyns' Digest Eglise G. 2; Whinfield v. Watkins (1); and Morley v. Leacroft (2). In Pense v. Prouse (3), Lord Holt said that "by the canon law the parson ought to repair the whole; but by the custom of England, a parson shall repair the chancel, and the parishioners the nave of the church." He also decided the same in Ball v. Cross (4); and see the judgment of Sir A. Cockburn to the same effect in Griffin v. Dighton (5) (5 B. & S. at pp. 105 and 106). But the liability to repair the chancel may remain with the parishioners, altering the usual liability of the rector thereto, in parishes where a special custom to that effect has been established (1833, 4 Haggard, 156). If more modern authority for this proposition that a rector is liable in law to repair the chancel is required, it is to be found in the judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Smallbones v. Edney (6) (L.R. 3 P.C. at p. 450). He says:

> "Now a tithe owner is exempted from an ordinary church-rate for the repair of the body of a church because he is under a particular liability to repair the chancel. He is not less liable, but more liable, than the owners of other property in the parish to repair the church, being under a personal liability to repair a particular part of it."

I pass then to the second question: Is that liability personal and general, or only to the

A extent of the receipts from the tithe actually received by the tithe owner? The above authorities clearly show that the liability is personal and several, not joint; but is it limited to the extent of the tithe owner's receipts from the tithe? In Neville v. Kirby (1) LORD PENZANCE delivered a judgment which involved the question whether a liability could be attached to a lay rector in respect of an outlay already made in the repair of a chancel which the lay rector had a duty to repair. He thus states this liability:

> "If the chancel of a parish church is in need of repair, the ecclesiastical court entertains a suit complaining of its defective condition, and on proper proof as to the persons liable to repair, it issues a monition to such persons, commanding the thing to be done, which it follows up, if need be, by the usual ecclesiastical censures. But this is the limit of the court's interference, and there is no precedent or warrant for C the exercise of the coercive powers of the court to enforce against a layman a payment of a money claim."

It is noticeable that he does not introduce any limit to the liability based on the actual receipt of profits from the rectory; and this in spite of the question being definitely raised as to the jurisdiction over a person in respect of a money claim.

Turning to the chief authority on English canon law—the PROVINCIALE OF WILLIAM D LINDWOOD, who wrote in the reign of Henry VI in the earlier part of the fifteenth century, for he died in 1446 (edition printed at Oxford, 1679), I find in Book III, title 27, a precept of Archbishop Winchelsea, who was Archbishop of Canterbury from 1293 till 1313, a translation of which runs as follows:

> "In order that the parishioners of the several churches of our province of Canterbury may henceforth be more certain about the defects that fall upon them, lest any E doubt arise in times to come between the rectors and them, we will henceforth command that they be bound to find all the things below mentioned, namely legend, antiphonary, gradual, psalter, tropery, ordinal, missal, manual, chalice, principal vestment with chasuble, dalmatic, tunicle and with a cope in the choir with all its accessories, a frontal for the high altar with three towels, three surplices, one rochet, a processional cross, a cross for the dead, thurible, a lantern and little bell for carry- F ing before the body of Christ in the visitation of the sick, a pyx for the body of Christ, a suitable lenten veil, banners for the rogations, bells with ropes, a bier for the dead, a vessel for holy water, a pax, a candlestick for the Easter candle, a font with a lock, images in the church, the principal image in the chancel, the wall of the churchyard, the repair of the nave of the church inside and outside as well in images (or statues) as in glass windows, the repair of the books and of the vestments G whenever it shall happen that they need repairs. But everything else as well in the repair of the chancel as in other things not here expressed, according to divers approved customs, have to be repaired by the rectors and vicars of the places or those to whom (the liability) belongs, in all respects at their expense."

Then Davies' Case (8) decided in 1620, affirms this liability. The whole report is as follows:

> "A person who has the impropriation of the rectory ought to repair the chancel and in addition, if he has any land in the parish, he ought to contribute to the repair of the (nave of the) church as in this case the farmer and tenants of Mr. Seycomb Davies have the impropriation and also a farm in the same parish. This was decided by the court without question."

I In AYCLIFFE'S PARERGON (1726) pp. 458–9, the question of the remedy for failing to carry out the repair of the chancel is discussed. The duty so to do is founded in LINDWOOD, and the remedy in the case of clergymen is sequestration of the amount necessary to cover the outlay upon the repairs, and if a larger sum is taken "the party aggrieved may be relieved by the benefit of an appeal." The position of a lay impropriator is not defined, but again it is noticeable that the liability is not restricted to or measured by the receipts.

GIBSON in his CODEX JURIS ECCLESIASTICI ANGLICANI (2nd ed., 1761) quotes this same passage from LINDWOOD, and sets out the passage of Archbishop Winchelsea already referred to with the words "in omnibus reparari sumptibus eorundem." His words are: "as rectors or spiritual parsons, so also impropriators are bound of common right to repair the chancels under the limitations expressed in the foregoing article." None of those limitations imposes the limit of receipts from the tithe. The doctrine is said to be clear and uncontested, the only difficulty being in what manner they shall be compelled to do it, whether by spiritual censures only, in like manner as the parishioners are compelled to contribute to the repairs of the church, since impropriations are now become lay-fees, or whether by sequestrations. This point, he says, was twice under consideration in the time of Charles II—in the first, the court inclined that there could be no sequestration. He must be referring to Walwyn v. Auberry (9) argued in Trinity Term of 1677. There are two reports of the argument upon the case in 1 MODERN, 261, and in 2 MODERN, 259. It was an action of trespass for taking away certain loads of wheat and other agricultural produce, to which the defendant pleaded a justification that the goods were taken in sequestration of the tithes falling due to the plaintiff who was rector, and as such bound in law to repair the chancel of the parish church then out of repair. The facts relied upon were that, the chancel needing repairs and the plaintiff being liable to execute them, the bishop of Hereford had issued a monition to the plaintiff requiring him to fulfil his duty, and, as he failed to do so, the bishop had granted a sequestration of the tithes of the rectory, and that the defendants as churchwardens had carried out the sequestration and had taken the goods as alleged, which taking and trespass was thus justified. To this plea the plaintiff demurred. The question argued was whether a sequestration could be ordered as against a lay impropriator. The case was ultimately decided upon a defect in the pleading, which, inter alia, had omitted to aver that the defendants did not take into their hands more than was sufficient for the reparation of the chancel. A note is appended to this report of the case that from two other reports of the same case in 2 MODERN, 257, and in VENTRIS, 35, it appeared that the majority of the court inclined to the view that, as impropriations are now lay fees, they cannot be sequestered for the reparation of the chancel. Serjeant Barrell, who argued the demurrer on behalf of the plaintiff, admitted "that the rector of a rectory impropriate may perhaps be bound of common right to repair the chancel." He makes no reservation that the liability extended only to the amount received into the rector's hands from the tithe.

ATKYNS, J., suggests the limitation that the liability of the rector was in respect of the profits which he received and that sequestration could be applied to them. This view was the result of the character which in his opinion still attached to tithe, for it was still subject to the same penalties—including sequestration—as before the Statute of Dissolutions. The learned judge thought that the tithe was first to be expended in the performance of divine service and that only such surplus as remained after the discharge of "the first rights" passed to the rector. With this view of tithe he held that sequestration as an ecclesiastical form of execution still obtained, and the lay rector's duty as to the chancel was limited to what he had received by way of surplus from carrying out ecclesiastical requirements. There is no trace that the other members of the court acquiesced in this view.

VENTRIS, p. 35, gives a report of the same case although the date is stated to be 22 Charles II and not 29 Charles II as in the MODERN REPORTS. He states the defects in the pleadings on which the decision was given, but adds the court inclined that there could be no sequestration

> "for being made lay fee, the impropriation was out of their jurisdiction, and it was now only against the person as against a layman for not repairing the Church."

Again, there is no trace of any condition limiting the liability of the lay rector, and the inclination of the court's opinion cuts away the basis on which ATKYNS, J.'s view rests.

There is a note in 3 KEBLE'S REPORTS, p. 829, of the same case where the date is once more restored to 29 Charles II which records the doubtful view of the court as to sequestration but records that the spiritual court

> "clearly may excommunicate the impropriator for not repairing the chancel of the Church."

A There is still another report of Walwyn v. Auberry (9) in FREEMAN'S REPORTS, p. 230, and again the decision is given of the date 1677. It states that > "the only question was whether or no in case the impropriator did neglect to repair the chancel, the ordinary might sequester."

It was agreed that sequestration was a proper remedy against spiritual persons, but not B against lay rectors. It was admitted that the ecclesiastical court had cognisance of the matter and that they might proceed by way of personal censures to excommunication against the impropriator. But then it is stated that NORTH, C.J., inclined that the ordinary could not sequester now it was become a lay-fee; "but the other three judges inclined contra." No decision is reported and the case ultimately turned upon the pleading point.

C I have examined and referred to all these reports, for insistence was naturally laid upon the opinion of ATKYNS, J., recorded in 2 MODERN REPORTS at p. 258. There is no decision upon the point, and the contradiction as to the view of the majority of the judges as reported in 2 MODERN and in FREEMAN'S REPORTS make the case an unsatisfactory one upon which to found a limitation of the liability laid down so expressly in LINDWOOD.

D WATSON'S CLERGYMAN'S LAW (ed. 1747), p. 395, takes note of the divergence of the reports upon the question which procedure was proper to enforce the liability of the rector to repair, but he offers no solution; he deals (p. 394) with "chancels repaired by rectors, impropriators, or appropriators" without any limitation of that liability, and passes on to consider the ordinary's power over the seating in chancel and church.

E Upon the authorities, I have come to the conclusion that the liability of a lay impropriator is personal and is not limited to the amount of his receipts from the tithe. In view of his right of contribution from other owners of a part of the tithe which I deal with later, this view is not so harsh as it might appear at first sight to be, and it secures that the duty of repair shall be effectively carried out.

Upon the third question propounded, it is, in my opinion, clear from the above F authorities that the defendants would have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court if a cause of office had been promoted against them. The report in FREEMAN is explicit that the whole court were agreed on this point. GIBSON'S CODEX treats the sanction by spiritual censures as undoubted, and his law is derived from LINDWOOD; see also DEGGE'S PARSON'S COUNSELLOR (ed., 1820), p. 209. LORD PENZANCE'S statement in Neville v. Kirby (7) above set out, as to the G remedies against an impropriator for failure to fulfil his duty, appears to be well founded upon the authorities.

Upon the fourth question counsel for the defendants reminded the court that the jurisdiction that it is called upon to exercise is criminal, or quasi-criminal, and penal. But, as LORD SELBORNE said in Mackonochie v. Lord Penzance (10) (6 App. Cas. at p. 443), even in proceedings which are called, and in some sense are criminal and penal, H the ecclesiastical law has for its object, not the punishment of the individual offenders, but the correction of manners and the discipline of the church.

In Morley v. Leacroft (2), in which the liability of a lay rector to repair the chancel of a parish church was made clear by admission, an admonition was issued in pursuance of a duty which the chancellor felt was clear, and he indicated that he had power to enforce it if it were disobeyed.

I The real argument which was urged on behalf of the respondent was an appeal asking: Is it fair to impose the liability when at present so little has reached the hands of the tithe owner? More will come; and it may be hoped that the sum estimated to be required, if laid out, will render the chancel sound for a number of years. This appeal ad misericordiam does not appear to be founded on precedent. Section 2 (3) of the Act of 1932 refers to the defendant who would have been liable (i.e., in peril), to be admonished on the date when the notice to repair was served upon him. Those words appear to indicate the time when the liability is to be discovered, which may be before the question of the appropriateness or harshness of an admonition could have been determined by an inquiry into the figures relevant to the case, and the portion of tithe received, or receivable, by the defendant.

Finally, it appears to me that the defendants would be entitled to enforce contribution from the other tithe owners, for they must settle amongst themselves the proportion that each is to pay. That is the statement of DR. BURN and SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE. Order XI of the County Courts Rules provides the method whereby contribution can be enforced by third party procedure, and the respondent can make use of this for reimbursement of moneys paid by her beyond her proper share. Meantime all hardship against the respondent can be avoided by an order being made for payment of the sum due by instalments under s. 26 of the County Courts (Amendment) Act, 1934.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and an order made as asked for in the notice of appeal.

ROMER, L.J.—The question to be determined upon this appeal is whether the defendant, Mrs. Croxford would, but for the Chancel Repairs Act, 1932, have been liable on March 28, 1934, to be admonished by the appropriate ecclesiastical court in a cause of office promoted against her in that court, to repair the chancel of Wickhambrook parish church. The facts existing on that date material to a decision of this question are as follows. The chancel was out of repair, and could only be put into proper repair by an expenditure of £123 12s. 6d. Mrs. Croxford was the legal owner in fee of impropriate tithe rent-charges charged upon land in that parish amounting in all to £39 11s. 9d. a year. Such rent-charges had only been conveyed to her on Nov. 7, 1933, and she had received in respect of them no more than £39 7s. 4d.

Upon this state of facts it is contended on her behalf that, inasmuch as the sum received by her was less than the amount necessary to put the chancel into repair, the ecclesiastical court would have had no power to admonish her to do the repairs or any of them. Alternatively, it is contended that, even if the court would have had such power, it would not have exercised it in the circumstances. It is contended, on the other hand, upon the part of the parochial church council that Mrs. Croxford could have been admonished, inasmuch as she was upon March 28, 1934, the owner of the tithe rent-charges, and that it is immaterial whether she had or had not at that date received any payment in respect of them. As to her alternative contention, they say that it is equally immaterial to consider whether the court would or would not have admonished her in the circumstances, and that the only question to be determined is whether the court had the power to do so.

Upon this latter point I think that the parochial church council are right. The Act does not impose as a condition precedent to the court giving judgment for the responsible authority that it should find that the defendant would, but for the provisions of the Act, have been in fact admonished; the question is whether the defendant would, but for those provisions, have been liable to be admonished. The word "liable" shows, in my opinion, that the question to be considered by the court is whether the defendant could, consistently with the law, have been admonished, and not whether the defendant would in fact have been admonished in the particular case. The only question, therefore, to be determined upon this appeal is whether the defendant could, but for the Act, have been admonished "to repair the chancel." If so, then the court was obliged by the Act to give judgment for the plaintiffs for the full sum of £123 12s. 6d. That this may in certain cases lead to considerable hardship is not a matter which we are entitled to take into consideration, because the words of the Act itself are unambiguous. All that we have to ascertain is the law relating to the repair of a chancel before the Act came into operation.

As to this law one thing clearly emerges from the numerous authorities to which our attention has been very properly called. It is this. The person or other the owner of the rectory, whether ecclesiastical appropriator or lay impropriator, was liable to keep the chancel of the parish church in repair. The real difficulty consists in finding out whether the duty to repair was one arising out of the possession of the rectory, irrespective of the profits received by its possessor, or whether it was merely a duty to apply the profits as and when received in effecting the repairs. Upon this question there does not appear to be any direct authority. Nor is this at all surprising, for down to comparatively recent times the question could not often have arisen. In earlier times the rectory can very seldom have been divided up among numerous holders, all or many of whom might be in possession of a share, the profits derived from which would be wholly insufficient of themselves to keep the chancel in repair. But as a result of the numerous Inclosure Acts passed during the latter end of the eighteenth century and the general commutation of tithes for tithe rent-charges, and the subsequent redemption of many such rent-charges for money or their extinguishment by merger in the lands out of which they issued, the property of the rectory, or what now represents it, is often in modern times found in the hands of a numerous and not easily ascertainable class. What the ecclesiastical courts would have done in such circumstances must, in the absence of direct authority, be largely a matter of inference to be drawn partly from what is said in the various authorities and partly from what is left unsaid. These authorities have been reviewed by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in his judgment, which I have had the privilege of reading, and need not be referred to in detail here. They are unanimous in this, that except in some few cases where there has grown up a custom to the contrary, the parson or rector is responsible for keeping the chancel in repair. This is to be found stated over and over again without any qualification being added, and it seems reasonable to infer from this fact that no qualification was recognised.

There is, however, a passage in the judgment of ATKYNS, J., in Walwyn v. Auberry (9), from which it may be inferred that in the view of that learned judge the liability of a lay impropriator of a rectory to repair is not unqualified. In that case, of which the best report is to be found in 2 MODERN REPORTS, p. 254, a lay impropriator of a rector had been admonished by the ecclesiastical authority for not having kept the chancel in repair, and the question arose whether such admonition could be enforced by a sequestration of the profits of the rectory. The question was not in fact decided, inasmuch as the case went off upon a matter of pleading. ATKYNS, J., however, was of opinion, differing apparently in this respect from the view entertained by the majority of the court, that the profits of a lay impropriator could properly be sequestrated by the ecclesiastical court for the purpose of enforcing its admonition. His view was that the lay rector was entitled to retain only so much of the profits of the rectory as was not required for the repairs. If this were so, then it would seem to follow that such a rector could only properly be admonished for not having applied the profits come to his hand in effecting the repairs. So that if he had only received profits that were insufficient for the purpose he would not be admonished. But the majority of the court did not presumably take the same view of the lay rector's right to the profits that commended itself to ATKYNS, J. The question whether an admonition to repair could be enforced by sequestration of the profits or merely by excommunication would not necessarily have thrown any light upon the nature of the liability to repair, even if it had been decided. The case would, however, be valuable if the view taken by ATKYNS, J., of the nature of a lay impropriator's interest in the rectory could be accepted. Unfortunately, as I have pointed out, he appears on this question to have been in a minority. In these circumstances the case cannot be regarded as an authority for imposing a qualification upon the liability of a rector to repair that is not mentioned by any one of the other authorities, and that in four of them, at any rate, would almost certainly have been alleged if it had existed.

These four authorities are the Bishop of Ely v. Gibbons (11), Morley v. Leacroft (2), Neville v. Kirby (7), and Hauxton Parochial Church Council v. Stevens (12). In all these cases impropriators of a rectory or part of it were admonished for non-repair of the chancel, and in no one of them was it even averred that the person admonished had received profits from the rectory sufficient to enable him to effect the repairs. It is true that in all of them it was highly probable that sufficient profits for the purpose had in fact been received. But if such a receipt was a condition precedent to the existence of the liability it is almost incredible that the fulfilment of the condition should not have been averred.

There is one further matter to which I ought to refer before passing from the reported cases. It was stated by COCKBURN, C.J., in Griffin v. Dighton (5) (5 B. & S. at p. 104), on the authority of a passage in LINDWOOD, that where there are both rector and vicar A in the same church, they shall, there being no custom to the contrary, contribute to the repair of the chancel in proportion to their benefice. Some reliance was placed on behalf of the respondents upon this statement. It does not, however, help them, for it throws no light upon the question of whether the rector's liability is conditional upon his having received profits of the rectory. Indeed, so far as it goes, it seems to be against them. For the liability of the rector to contribute to any expenses incurred by the vicar in B effecting the repairs is again stated in general terms and without reference to the amount of profits actually received by him.

The defendants' case, however, receives considerable support from the passages in BURN'S ECCLESIASTICAL LAW and substantially repeated in SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE'S book, to which the MASTER OF THE ROLLS refers. They appear to lay down the following propositions: (i) That where a rectory is held by several impropriators any one or more C of them may be proceeded against for non-repair of the chancel without making the others parties to the suit, if the parties proceeded against can be proved to have received between them profits belonging to the rectory sufficient to effect the repairs. (ii) That the parties so proceeded against must settle between themselves the proportions in which these expenses of repair are to be found. But no authority for the propositions is cited, and they seem in some respects very unsatisfactory and illogical. That one D only out of several impropriators may be proceeded against for non-repair of the chancel seems reasonably clear. Neither in the case of the Bishop of Ely v. Gibbons (11), nor in that of Hauxton Parochial Church Council v. Stevens (12) was the impropriator in question the owner of the whole rectory, yet no objection was taken on this score. But this throws no light upon the question whether the liability of a rector to repair the chancel is a merely personal one, or whether it is dependent upon the receipt of profits sufficient E for the purpose. For in the former case each owner of a share in the rectory must owe an unqualified duty to repair. In the latter case he must owe a duty to repair if he has received sufficient profits to cover the expense of repairing. In either case he could be admonished for the neglect of his duty without citing the owners of the other shares. But it is difficult to see why two or more impropriators can only be proceeded against for non-repair when it can be shown that they together have received sufficient profits to F effect the repairs. For if the duty of each one to keep the chancel in repair be unqualified, any such proof would be unnecessary. If, on the other hand, his duty be contingent upon his having received sufficient profits for the purpose, how can one impropriator, who has received either no profits at all or profits insufficient for the purpose, be made liable to admonition merely by joining with him another impropriator who has received enough profits to enable him to discharge his duty? For it can hardly be sug- G gested that one of several impropriators is under any obligation to compel the others to perform their own. The fact that two or more impropriators may be admonished for non-repair of the chancel without showing that each one has received profits for the purpose necessarily tends, therefore, in my opinion, to the conclusion that the duty of each one is an unqualified one. So too, though in a lesser degree, does the fact that one of several impropriators who has repaired the chancel can obtain contribution H towards the expenses from all the others. I say "all the others," as I cannot accept the proposition that contribution can only be obtained from those impropriators who have been joined in the proceedings, if DR. BURN intended to lay down any such proposition, which I venture to doubt. If the liability to repair be unqualified, then all the impropriators will have to contribute, and, on the analogy of the rector and the vicar, will do so proportionately to their shares in the rectory. If, on the other hand, the liability I to repair be a qualified one, as is suggested, the impropriators will only contribute proportionately to the profits they individually received, and the amount of these may be very difficult to ascertain. But, apart from the difficulty of ascertaining the amount of the individual contributions, an apportionment of the expenses according to the profits received would or might be grossly inequitable. For the owner of perhaps the largest share in the rectory would escape having to contribute anything at all if he had only recently acquired his share and had not at the time received any profits from that share.

In my opinion, for these reasons and for those given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, this appeal should be allowed.

EVE, J.—I have had an opportunity of reading both the judgments just delivered, and in acquiescing therein I hope I shall not be regarded as guilty of undue temerity in a case involving the consideration of matters in which I have had but little experience when I say that the result of those judgments does not appear to me to be reasonable or just, and would seem to be one to which the attention of the legislature might be properly directed.

Appeal allowed.

McPHERSON v. McPHERSON

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Blanesburgh, Lord Macmillan and Lord Wright), July, 18, 19, 22, 23, December 16, 1935]

Open Court—Need for trial to be in—Undefended divorce suit—Hearing in judges' library—Voidability of decree.

Except in the case of some proceedings—e.g., applications made under the rules in chambers and cases concerning infants—publicity is the authentic hall-mark of judicial, as distinct from administrative, procedure, and in no case is the observance of this principle more important than in an undefended divorce suit, for there is no class of case in which the desire of parties to avoid publicity is more widespread and in which it can be so clearly demonstrated to a judge that privacy would be both harmless and merciful. The actual presence of the public is never necessary; on some occasions there may be no members of the public available to attend, but the court must be open to any who may present themselves for admission. The remoteness of the possibility of any public attendance must never, by judicial action, be reduced to the certainty that there will be none.

The trial of an undefended divorce suit took place in the judges' law library at Edmonton, Canada, during the luncheon interval. The judge was not robed, neither was counsel. Before taking his seat the judge stated that he was sitting in open court. The judges' law library was approached through a double swing-door in the wall of the public corridor. One wing of the door was always fixed; the other, though swinging close, was usually unfastened; on the fixed wing was a brass plate with the word "Private" in black letters on it. The unfastened swing-door opened on an inner corridor in which was a door of the judges' law library. The opening wing of the swing-door was unfastened during the trial and the inner door of the library was kept open throughout. After taking the evidence the judge pronounced a decree nisi which was in due course made absolute. On a claim by the respondent to the divorce proceedings to have the decrees nisi and absolute against her set aside on the ground that the trial of the action in the library was not a trial in open court.

Held: the procedure adopted could not be justified, but the result of the irregularity was to make the decree absolute voidable, and not void, and the time for avoiding it was long past.

Appeal by Mrs. Cora Lillian McPherson from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta (Appellate Division) on a preliminary issue in an action brought by her appellant to have the decrees nisi and absolute obtained by her husband against her rescinded and set aside, and for an order for restitution of conjugal rights. D

The appellant and the respondent, Oran Leo McPherson, were married on April 17, 1908, in the United States. Their subsequent matrimonial domicil was in Alberta. On March 17, 1931, the respondent instituted divorce proceedings against his wife, accusing her of adultery with one Leroy Mattern. No defence was put in, and the trial took place on April 22, 1931, before TWEEDIE, J., in the Court House at Edmonton. The judge pronounced a decree nisi, which was made absolute on July 28, 1931. In July, 1932, the respondent married Mrs. Mattern, the former wife of Leroy Mattern, she having obtained a divorce from her husband on account of his misconduct with the appellant. On Oct. 11, 1932, the appellant brought against the respondent this action to have the decrees nisi and absolute obtained by him set aside on various allegations put forward by the appellant. By an amendment to the statement of claim made in November, it was alleged that the trial of the divorce action had been a secret one, and that the decrees in question were null and void, and this new issue was directed to be tried as a preliminary issue before the earlier issues. At the hearing of the preliminary issue, EWING, J., held on the facts that the trial had been in open court, and his decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Alberta. The appellant appealed to the Judicial Committee. E F G

Dec. 16. LORD BLANESBURGH.—Questions of wide general importance—of interest in some of their aspects to the whole Dominion and even beyond—are raised by this appeal from the Supreme Court of the province of Alberta. The questions discussed in the judgments appealed from are concerned with the degree of publicity called for at the trial of divorce suits—in particular, undefended divorce suits in the province; their Lordships, however, will have to deal, in addition, with the effect upon a decree nisi made at such a trial and upon a decree absolute following thereon when it is shown—as in this case is alleged, that the proceedings at the trial were devoid of sufficient publicity—were, in short, not held in "open court." H I

The facts which raise these questions are not in the present case in dispute, and may be stated as follows:

The appellant and the respondent were married on April 17, 1908, in the United States. Their subsequent matrimonial domicil, however, was in Alberta. They lived at Edmonton, where they must have been prominent citizens—the respondent in 1931, being, or shortly afterwards succeeding to the office of, Minister of Public Works for the province.

On March 17, 1931, he instituted in the Supreme Court of Alberta divorce proceedings against his wife. He accused her of misconduct with one Leroy Mattern. She made no answer to the charge. She put in no defence. She filed no demand of notice. Accordingly, the action was appointed for trial without further intimation to her. It was tried on April 22, 1931, by TWEEDIE, J., sitting in the judges' law library of the Court House at Edmonton. The learned judge, on that day and in that place, after taking the evidence of the respondent and of two witnesses called on his behalf pronounced a decree nisi and gave to the respondent the custody of the four children of the marriage—all of them sons, the youngest then a boy of seven. It is not unlikely, if one may judge from passages in the record, that the retention by the respondent of the custody of that youngest son, lies at the root of much of the later troubles between the parents.

In due course, however, there having been no intervention by the appellant or anyone else, the decree nisi was, by decree of June 28, 1931, made absolute, and the marriage between the appellant and respondent was, at least apparently, finally dissolved, with this statutory result, that, after the time for appeal had expired, it became lawful for both parties to marry again as if their prior marriage had been dissolved by death—all in terms of s. 57 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857—a section which has always been part of the law of Alberta. Of that privilege the respondent in due course availed himself. In July, 1932—long after the time for any appeal from the decree absolute had expired, he married Mrs. Mattern, the former wife of Leroy Mattern already mentioned. She had obtained a divorce from her husband on account of his misconduct with the appellant. Three months after the respondent's marriage to Mrs. Mattern—in October, 1932—the appellant commenced against him the action out of which this appeal proceeds.

As originally framed, the action was not directed to the questions with which their Lordships are now alone concerned. Its claim was to have rescinded and set aside the decrees nisi and absolute obtained by the respondent in the divorce action on the allegations, in effect, that these decrees had resulted from the respondent's perjury in stating in evidence at the trial that there had been no collusion between himself and the appellant whereby the necessary evidence of her adultery had been obtained, and that there had been no condonation of that adultery.

In the statement of claim as first delivered, it is recorded, almost casually, that the trial at which these alleged false statements were made took place in the law library of the court house at Edmonton. But none of the relief asked is grounded on that statement. Moreover, it is important to observe that the relief so far claimed was based upon the footing that the impugned decrees were voidable only and that the intervention of the court for their rescission was necessary. It was not until Nov. 13 following that the questions now in contest were raised by amendment: then for the first time it was alleged that the trial of the divorce action in the library was not a trial in open court—and as a result that the decrees in question were actually null and void—an allegation and a claim of peculiar seriousness not only to the respondent, in view of his second marriage, but to the wife of that marriage, who, be it noted, is no party to this appeal.

By order dated Nov. 28, 1932, this new issue was directed to be tried before the earlier issues in the cause.

And it has been so tried, with the result that by an order of the Supreme Court (EWING, J.) of Dec. 20, 1932, affirmed, on appeal, by an order of the Appellate Division of Feb. 21, 1933, it has, in effect, now been found that the divorce trial did take place in open court and the appellant's action so far as it questions the sufficiency of that trial has been dismissed.

The present is an appeal from these orders of dismissal. The appellant has by special leave been permitted to present and prosecute her appeal in forma pauperis. By it she challenges the finding in question. The trial, she contends, did not take place in open court, and once the finding that it did is displaced, it results, so she asserts, that the decrees following thereon being null and void should now be so declared.

It may be stated here that the original issues in the appellant's action have now also

A been tried and in the court of first instance have resulted in a judgment adverse to her. But that judgment is the subject of a pending appeal to the Appellate Division, and their Lordships accordingly do not further refer to it. They confine their attention exclusively to the questions raised by the issue separately tried, and it will, they think, be convenient first to deal with the actual finding of the courts below. Was the trial really held in open court, or was it not? An important question, as will presently be B seen.

The judges' library at Edmonton in which the trial took place is not one of the regular courts of the Court House there, and it is a circumstance on which reliance has been placed by the appellant that at the time of the trial in that room, and indeed throughout the afternoon of that day, one or more of these courts was available. Up to a point, however, this fact is of little or no importance. There is at Edmonton no C announcement with reference to a trial in a regular court that would be withheld in the case of a trial in the judges' library. There is there no daily cause list. No printed or written notice of the business in progress is apparently exhibited. Information on that subject is, it seems, obtained from the orderlies in attendance, and they, apparently, would know as much about a case appointed to be heard or being heard in the judges' library as about one appointed to be heard or proceeding elsewhere. Had the learned D judge on the occasion in question directed this divorce case to be taken in one of the empty courts, no greater degree of publicity would apparently, so far, have attended the proceedings.

In the matter of facilities for public access to the court rooms, on the one hand, and to the judges' library, on the other, there is, however, a very great difference to be noted: to the court rooms direct public access is provided from a public corridor which encircles the entire second floor of the court house. But there is no such direct access to the E judges' library. It is approached through a double swing door in the wall of the same corridor immediately opposite the top of the stairway. One wing of the door is always fixed—the other, although swinging close, is usually unfastened. On the fixed wing is a brass plate with the word "Private" in black letters upon it. As to the unfastened swing door—the door to which alone when it is open the word "Private" has any sensible application—it opens on to an inner corridor in which, opposite, is a door of the judges' F library.

It was in evidence that the word "Private" on the outer door did not in fact deter or hinder entry to the inner corridor by practitioners and other familiars of the building and the door unfastened is not usually officially guarded. It was accepted, too, that the opening wing of the swing door was unfastened during the trial, and it was proved, as will later appear, that the inner door of the library was kept open throughout. But G there remains the serious question, to which their Lordships must return, whether these swing doors with "Private" marked upon one of them were not as effective a bar to the access to the library by an ordinary member of the public finding himself in the public corridor as would be a door actually locked.

On the day of the trial TWEEDIE, J., was not a judge in attendance at the court house. For the convenience of one of the witnesses who was coming from a distance, he had H arranged to take the case himself on that day. It was only a few minutes before the hour appointed that he definitely selected the judges' library as the place for the hearing, and he so informed the clerk of the court.

The proceedings took place during the luncheon interval, probably as the most convenient hour for all concerned. They were in one respect less formal than those of an ordinary trial in open court. The learned judge was not robed, neither was counsel. I In other respects the proceedings seem to have been quite regular. TWEEDIE, J., entered the library from a door accessible only to judges. He was attended by an official shorthand writer and by the assistant clerk of the court, Mr. Mason. Before taking his seat at the head of the table in the library he stated that he was sitting in open court, a statement suggested, no doubt, by s. 5 of the Judicature Ordinance of the North-west Territories, later to be mentioned. He directed Mr. Mason to open and to keep open the door already mentioned leading from the library to the inner corridor. He evidently overlooked the swing door outside, with its appearance of being closed and

A its warning against public intrusion, for he gave no direction with regard to that door. Probably, the door being rarely closed, it was the legend upon it that he forgot. Had he recalled that word "Private" and appreciated its significance, then, judging by his action with reference to the inner door, he must either, it would seem, have had it plainly opened or he must have sat elsewhere.

In point of fact no member of the public entered the library while the trial proceeded. B Only the learned judge and counsel, the respondent with his two witnesses, called in one after the other, and the court officials already mentioned were there.

Having now closed their account of the proceedings, their Lordships pause, to join with everyone concerned, in affirming their own belief in the complete bona fides of the learned judge in everything he did on this occasion. He stated to EWING, J., the trial judge of this separate issue, that it was his desire to restrict publicity, but not in any C way out of regard for the feelings or in deference to the position of the respondent personally. The suggestion that the procedure adopted on this occasion is traceable to the fact that the respondent was a Minister of the Crown is one easily made and readily accepted by credulous minds. It is right, therefore, that being unfounded, it should be definitely repelled. Their Lordships unreservedly accept the statement of the learned judge on this subject. For the rest, they believe that it was unhealthy D notoriety rather than normal publicity that he really desired to restrict. It could hardly have been anything else. The respondent, after all, was plaintiff and not defendant in this undefended suit. He needed no protection, and in view of his position it is a satisfaction to place it upon record that learned counsel for the appellant disclaimed making any kind of reflection on the respondent in relation to any incident attending the trial. In that matter, at any rate, he is the victim of misfortune. Their Lordships, E reading his evidence—the evidence, they assume, of a layman—are very ready to conclude that to him there appeared to be nothing in the proceedings of that day in any way out of the normal.

Now, the learned judges in Alberta, applying to the case the principles enunciated in Scott (otherwise Morgan) v. Scott (1) as those by which they were bound have, as already stated, reached the conclusion—McGILLIVRAY, J., with some hesitation—that the trial F in the library, as just described, was a hearing in open court, and their Lordships are impressed by the weighty considerations that can be ranged in support of that view. The facts of this case, for example, have little correspondence with those in Scott (otherwise Morgan) v. Scott (1)—the authority constantly referred to in argument as the foundation for the appellant's claim. That suit was heard in camera by direct order of the registrar, his justification being that he was thereby merely following well established G and authentic practice. As a result the public were deliberately as well as effectively excluded from the court. Here, on the other hand, there was no actual exclusion of the public, although there was no actual public attendance. No such exclusion was intended nor, possibly, even desired. The learned judge would probably have been gratified by the presence of a small audience. But, even although it emerges in the last analysis that their actual exclusion resulted only from that word "Private" on the H outer door, the learned judge on this occasion, albeit unconsciously, was, their Lordships think, denying his court to the public in breach of their right to be present, a right thus expressed by LORD HALSBURY in Scott (otherwise Morgan) v. Scott (1) ([1913] A.C. at p. 440): "Every court of justice is open to every subject of the King."

To this rule, there are, it need hardly be stated, certain strictly defined exceptions. Applications properly made in chambers and infant cases may be particularised. But I publicity is the authentic hall-mark of judicial, as distinct from administrative, procedure, and it can be safely hazarded that the trial of a divorce suit, a suit not entertained by the old Ecclesiastical Courts at all, is not within any exception.

The actual presence of the public is never, of course, necessary. Where courts are held in remote parts of the province, as they frequently must be, there may be no members of the public available to attend. But, even so, the court must be open to any who may present themselves for admission. The remoteness of the possibility of any public attendance must never by judicial action be reduced to the certainty that there will be none.

And their Lordships, in reaching the conclusion that the public must be treated as having been excluded from the library on this occasion, have not been uninfluenced by the fact that the cause then being tried was an undefended divorce case. To no class of civil action is Lord Halsbury's statement more appropriate. In no class of case is the privilege more likely to be denied unless every tendency in a contrary direction, whenever manifested, is definitely checked.

So long as divorce, in contrast with marriage, is not permitted to be a matter of agreement between parties, the public at large—their Lordships are not now referring to the prurient minded among them who revel in the unsavoury details of many such cases—but the public at large are directly interested in them, affecting as they do, not only the status of the two individuals immediately concerned, but, not remotely when taken in the mass, the entire social structure and the preservation of a wholesome family life throughout the community.

Their Lordships are not surprised to find disclosed in the record traces of a practice existing in Edmonton, one not in their experience confined to Alberta, which seems to regard too lightly the duty of hearing these suits in public and with all appropriate ceremony. The trial of undefended suits in the judges' library with its warning off notice, although, perhaps, infrequent has been by no means unknown. Mrs. Mattern's suit, for instance, was heard there. Such suits seem to have been heard, on occasion, in a judge's private room, and, very probably, because no public attendance was anticipated, it appears that in the present case the discarding of the robe of ceremony was regarded both by judge and counsel as a matter of course.

There is perhaps no available way to correct these tendencies more effectively than to require that the trial of these cases shall always take place, and in the fullest sense, in open court. This requirement must be insisted upon because there is no class of case in which the desire of parties to avoid publicity is more widespread. There is no class of case in which, in particular circumstances, it can be so clearly demonstrated even to a judge that privacy in that instance would be both harmless and merciful.

Again publicity goes far to prevent the trial of these actions, where one is superficially so much like another, from becoming stereotyped and standardised so that the ability to dispose of them with a minimum expenditure of judicial time is even now apparently regarded in some quarters as the convincing test of judicial efficiency.

Moreover, the potential presence of the public almost necessarily invests the proceedings with some degree of formality. And formality is, perhaps, the only available substitute for the solemnity by which, ideally at all events, such proceedings, especially where the welfare of children is involved, should be characterised. That potential presence is at least some guarantee that there shall be a certain decorum of procedure. If at other public sittings of the court it is the rule for both judge and counsel to be robed it is pessimi exempli that for the trial of an undefended divorce case the gown of ceremony should be discarded.

These are some of the considerations which have led their Lordships to take a more serious view of the absence of the public from the trial of this divorce action than has obtained in the courts below. Influenced by them their Lordships have felt impelled to regard the inroad upon the rule of publicity made in this instance—unconscious though it was—as one not to be justified and now that it has been disclosed as one that must be condemned so that it shall not again be permitted.

It will be seen that in reaching this conclusion their Lordships, like the learned judges in Alberta, have dealt with the case as if the principles applicable were those enunciated in Scott (otherwise Morgan) v. Scott (1). In taking that course they have not forgotten the elaborate and careful argument by which counsel for the respondent sought to establish that, in view mainly of the section of the ordinance already referred to and the Divorce Rules of the Supreme Court, the rule of publicity in divorce suits was less rigid in Alberta than it is in England, maintaining, indeed, that in Alberta, for the trial of undefended divorce suits, no publicity was required. Their Lordships do not discuss this suggestion. They think that the answer to it made by counsel for the appellant in reply was complete and they leave it there, referring only to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Board v. Board and the A.-G. for Alberta (2) as the source of the law of Alberta on this subject.

But what is the result of the irregularity in procedure now disclosed? This question had not to be dealt with in the courts below. It must now be disposed of by the board. The appellant claims that the irregularity operates to render the supervening decrees null and void: she advances the position that inevitably and with no power of rectification in any provincial authority, judicial or otherwise, the change of status effected on the face of it by the decree absolute does not result: that to this decree absolute s. 57 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, has no application and that any subsequent marriage of either party to it, not being entitled to the protection of that section and contracted in the lifetime of the other, is bigamous and its offspring illegitimate: that this inescapable result ensues, whatever be the breach of the rule in its attendant circumstances—whether, at one end of the scale, it be a calculated and interested secrecy, or whether, at the other end of the scale—and as here—the result of mere forgetfulness: and, finally, but separately, that a declaration to the effect stated can properly here be made in the absence, as respondent, of Mr. McPherson's second wife.

It is agreed, however, that there is no case to be found in the books justifying these propositions, and their Lordships are of opinion, that neither on principle nor by authority can they be supported, that the decrees here in question were voidable only, and not void, and that the time for avoiding them has long gone by.

Their Lordships would observe, in passing, that they are not in this case dealing with a decree nisi pronounced after a travesty of judicial proceedings—a mere stage trial. The quality of a decree pronounced after such an idle ceremonial may be left to be dealt with when it is produced. Here their Lordships are dealing with a decree pronounced after a serious trial free from every other defect in procedure, and one entered and remaining on the court files as regular in every respect. To say that such a decree is void would seem to be out of the question. If the law were so to treat it, the remedy would be far worse than the disease it was designed to cure. To say that it is voidable states a result which their Lordships think entirely meets the case.

That that is the true result emerges from an authority which, although not direct, is, in their judgment, completely analogous—Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (3), in which it was held that an order made by a Lord Chancellor who was personally interested in the result was, while voidable, not void. In that case the judges were consulted and their opinion was given by PARKE, B. It was to the effect that the Lord Chancellor, by reason of his interest, was disqualified from judging in the cause, but that his decree was not in consequence absolutely void. It was voidable only, and, challenged on appeal, it was set aside by the House of Lords.

Learned counsel for the appellant did not find it possible to distinguish Dimes's Case (3) from the present case except upon the ground that the objection there taken to the decree was one which, as it merely affected property, could have been waived by the appellant, and was, therefore, voidable only, but that the decrees here involved questions of status in which the public was interested: that there could be no waiver of the public right and that, accordingly, the decrees here were void. But this presupposes that no intervention in due time on the part of the public is, in such cases as the present possible, and that supposition is, their Lordships think, mistaken. In the present case it was open to the Attorney-General of the province or the King's Proctor on his behalf, had he in the public interest thought fit to move by way of appeal or before time for appeal had expired, to move the trial judge himself to discharge the impugned orders on the ground that the trial from which both resulted had not been held in open court.

In other words, the public through the Attorney-General had the fullest right of intervention. But any such intervention had to be made before time for appeal had expired or before the rights of third parties had intervened. Just as a contract to take shares in a company induced by fraud, being voidable only, may be set aside before winding-up commenced, but not later, after the rights of the company's creditors have intervened—so here the order absolute cannot be touched after the time for appeal therefrom has passed, and a new status has been acquired, or in this case after the respondent having re-married is entitled, as is also his wife, to the protection afforded by s. 57 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. It follows in their Lordships' judgment that the appeal fails: the order absolute, although originally voidable, having become unassailable by the time the appellant's claim was made.

In these circumstances it is unnecessary for their Lordships to consider whether any declaration that the decree was void could in any case have been made in a proceeding to which the present Mrs. McPherson was no party. Nor is it necessary for them further to examine Scott (otherwise Morgan) v. Scott (1) for the purpose of showing that the order there made was not regarded by any of the noble Lords concerned nor by the Attorney-General nor by either of the parties to the appeal as affecting in any way the order absolute which had in fact been made and at the instance of the appellant too while her appeal to the House of Lords was pending. The decree absolute in Scott (otherwise Morgan) v. Scott (1), as their Lordships have ascertained, still stands on the files of the court intact; and so stands along with many another previous decree in a nullity suit made after a hearing in camera. In fact, the decree was in no way affected by the judgment of the House, notwithstanding that, in its opinion, the order directing the proceedings at the trial to be held in camera was so completely beyond the powers of the court that, although obtained at the instance of the appellant herself, it might be disobeyed by her with impunity.

On the whole case their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. And they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

TATTERSALL v. DRYSDALE

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Goddard, J.), May 14, 1935]

Insurance—Motor assurance—Third-party risks—Clause in policy indemnifying person driving with assured's permission—Right of such person to sue on policy—Duration of extension clause—Life Assurance Act, 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48), ss. 1, 2—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 36 (4).

A policy of insurance which indemnified the owner of a motor car against third-party risks was extended to indemnify any person driving with the assured's permission.

Held: that by reason of the provisions of s. 36 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, such a person could sue on the policy although he had no insurable interest, as required by the Life Assurance Act, 1874, s. 1, and although his name was not inserted in the policy, as required by s. 2 of that Act.

A policy of insurance underwritten by the defendant by which the plaintiff insured himself against third-party risks in respect of a specified motor car was extended to cover him while he was temporarily using another car. During the continuance of the policy the plaintiff sold the car, the subject of the insurance.

Held: the policy insured the plaintiff in respect of the ownership and user of the specified car, and when he divested himself of his interest in that car the extension clause ceased to have effect.

D Action claiming a declaration that the defendant, a Lloyd's underwriter, was liable to indemnify the plaintiff against claims made against him in respect of a motor accident, under a Lloyd's Eclipse policy subscribed by the defendant and others.

The question involved was whether, by virtue of s. 36 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, a person driving with the assured's permission, and, therefore, covered by the policy, E could sue on the policy, although not a party to it. That subsection provides as follows:

> " Notwithstanding anything in any enactment, a person issuing a policy of insurance under this section shall be liable to indemnify the persons or classes of persons specified in the policy in respect of any liability which the policy purports to cover in the case of those persons or classes of persons."

F The facts found by the learned judge were that in 1931, the plaintiff insured himself against third-party risks in respect of his motor car with the London and Edinburgh Insurance Company, Ltd. He changed his car from time to time, and by an endorsement on the policy dated April 11, 1934, it covered the car he owned in August, 1934. At that date he decided to buy a new car from Gray Brothers and Kemp, Ltd., and a Mr. Gilling, a director of that company, agreed to lend him a Riley car until the new car G was delivered. The Riley car was insured by Gilling under a Lloyd's Eclipse policy, subscribed by the defendant, which contained the following clause:

> " The insurance shall extend to indemnify any person who is driving on the assured's order or with his permission in respect of any legal liability as aforesaid."

The plaintiff's policy with the London and Edinburgh Company contained a clause H covering him against liability for third-party claims while he was using another car temporarily.

While driving the Riley car the plaintiff became involved in an accident and had to pay £2,150 damages, and the issue was on which of the two insurance companies the liability fell of bearing that loss. The court had, therefore, to decide (i) whether the London and Edinburgh Company's policy was in force at the date of the accident, and I (ii) whether the plaintiff was entitled to sue on the Lloyd's policy.

GODDARD, J.—This case raises a question of general interest and considerable importance in the law of motor-car insurance. It has to be determined, I think for the first time, what effect, if any, s. 36 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, has upon a clause which, in one form or another, has for many years appeared in motor-car policies whereby the underwriters declare that the insurance affords indemnity to persons not themselves parties to the policy, or otherwise insured, who may be driving the insured car with the permission of the assured. It affects not only civil rights but criminal liabilities, for if a person uninsured in his own name is driving a friend's car he is committing an offence which may involve him in serious penalties unless he is covered by the policy granted to the owner of the car.

The facts as I find them are as follows. Dr. Tattersall, the plaintiff, on Nov. 10, 1931, insured himself against third-party risks in respect of a Morris Oxford car under a policy subscribed by the London and Edinburgh Insurance Co., Ltd. He changed his car from time to time, the changes being duly endorsed on the policy, and by an endorsement dated Nov. 8, 1932, the insurance was enlarged so as to give full cover and not merely cover against liability to third parties. The last car which he owned before the events giving rise to this action, was a 16 horse-power Standard, covered by an endorsement dated April 11, 1934. Being minded to get yet another car, in August, 1934, he made an agreement with Gray Brothers and Kemp, Ltd., motor-car dealers, of Hull, of which company a Mr. Gilling was a director. He did not desire immediate delivery of a new car, and, indeed, he had not finally decided what car he would have. Messrs. Gray were to allow him £180 in respect of his Standard, which he was to transfer to them towards the price of the new car, and they wanted the Standard car at once, as they would have a better chance of selling it during the summer months. The bargain was reduced into writing by a letter of Aug. 13, which is in these terms:

> "Dear Sir—We beg to thank you for your valued order given to the undersigned to-day, and beg to confirm that we shall make you an allowance of £180 on your Standard Swallow saloon against any new car you care to select to the approximate value of £200, and, in the event of you spending more than this amount, we will make you an additional allowance of 7½ per cent on the amount in excess of the amount stated. We are arranging to send the Standard Swallow down to London to-morrow (Wednesday) morning and to bring back the Riley saloon, which we have pleasure in lending to you, free of charge, until such time as you get delivery of your new car."

The plaintiff handed over his car to the company on that day, and they disposed of it to a Mrs. Hay on Aug. 15. The Riley saloon which the company arranged to lend him was in fact the property of their director, Mr. Gilling, and was insured by him under a Lloyd's Eclipse policy, of which the defendant is one of the underwriters. Down to the time when the bargain was made there had been no mention of the insurance of the Riley car. This was delivered to the plaintiff on Aug. 17 or 18, it matters not which. When the plaintiff took possession of it he looked at his policy, or his certificate, and came to the conclusion, as did Mr. Stephenson the company's salesman, that for the purpose of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 he was insured while driving this car under his own policy. Mr. Gilling thought that it was his insurers that would have to bear any loss if there was an accident, and, accordingly, was anxious that the plaintiff should arrange for the Riley to be insured in his own name. The plaintiff was quite willing, and communicated with the agent of the London and Edinburgh Company. Unfortunately, before enough information had been given to enable the Riley car to be substituted for the Standard on the policy, the plaintiff was involved in a serious accident and had to pay £2,150 damages. This action is brought in effect to determine on which body of insurers that loss is to fall, and I am told, and it is right I should say so, that it has been arranged that the loss will in no case fall on the doctor. The Lloyd's policy provides that the insurance is extended to indemnify a person driving the insured car with the assured's permission provided that such person is not entitled to indemnity under any other policy. It is, therefore, necessary to examine the extension clause in the plaintiff's policy to determine whether that policy was in force at the time of the accident.

The plaintiff says that he is given a cause of action for indemnity against Mr. Gilling's underwriters by virtue of the subsection to which I have referred. He further says his policy had ceased to be in force at the time of the accident. He also alleges that, if the section gives him a right of action against the defendant, he is entitled to contribution to the extent of one-half, even if his own policy was in force at the time of the accident, under the doctrine laid down in Weddell v. Road Transport Insurance Co. (1). Though I had some doubt whether this alternative was properly raised in the pleadings, I allowed Mr. Samuels to argue it, though in the view I have formed it is unnecessary to express any opinion thereon.

The defendant's contentions are that the subsection gives the plaintiff no cause of action against him, that in any case the plaintiff was not driving the car with Gilling's permission, and that his own policy was still in force at the time of the accident. He says that, whatever be the true effect of the subsection, if these two latter contentions be correct the plaintiff cannot bring himself within it. I, therefore, consider them first.

As to the question of permission, I am clearly of opinion that he was driving with Gilling's permission. It was said that Gilling never intended that the plaintiff should drive the car until he had himself insured it and that this the defendant understood. The truth is that no bargain about insurance was ever made. Gilling, on handing over his car after the bargain had been made, wished the plaintiff to insure it, and he was willing to do so, but he was allowed to drive it as he wished, and Gray Brothers and Kemp Ltd., in whose hands Gilling had left the matter and at whose garage the plaintiff kept the car, knew he had not got it on to his policy. I have no hesitation in holding that there is nothing in that point.

I now turn to the question whether the plaintiff's policy was in force at the time of the accident. It is argued that it was not, because he had sold the car referred to in the policy and the company had not yet accepted the Riley which he was then using. The answer to the question mainly depends, on whether this case is governed by Rogerson v. Scottish Automobile and General Insurance Co. (2). The words of the extension clause in this policy are different from those used in Rogerson's Case (2), and Mr. Croom-Johnson argues that the latter case really turned only on the construction placed on the phrase " instead of the insured car," which do not appear in the clause under consideration. But, in my judgment, that view is too narrow. I think that both in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords the decisive factor was that the subject-matter of the insurance was the specified car, and that, as the assured had parted with it, he no longer was interested in the policy. The true view, in my judgment, is that the policy insures the assured in respect of the ownership and user of a particular car, the premium being calculated, as was found in Rogerson's Case (2), partly on value and partly on horse-power. It gives the assured by the extension clause a privilege or further protection while using another car temporarily, but it is the scheduled car which is always the subject of the insurance. Though the words differ in the two policies, the effect and intention seem to me to be the same, and express provision is made for what is to happen when the assured parts with the car. To construe this policy otherwise would be to hold in effect that two distinct insurances were granted, one in respect of the scheduled car, and another wholly irrespective of the ownership of any car. It may be that a person who does not own a car can get a policy which would insure him against third party risks whenever he happens to be driving a car belonging to someone else, but the clause I am considering is expressly stated to be an extension clause, that is, extending the benefits of this policy, and, accordingly, if the assured ceases to be interested in the subject-matter of the insurance the extension falls with the rest of the policy.

The position, therefore, in my judgment, being that the plaintiff was driving the Riley with the permission of Mr. Gilling at the time of the accident, and that he was not entitled to indemnity under any other policy, I have now to consider whether he can claim indemnity against the defendant by virtue of s. 36 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. Considering that no less an authority than SCRUTTON, L.J., has said that he had read this subsection several times without understanding it; see Jones v. Birch Bros. (3), I naturally approach its construction with considerable diffidence. But with regard to the opening words of the section: " Notwithstanding anything in any enactment," I have the advantage of the decision of the Court of Appeal in McCormick v. National Motor and Accident Insurance Union, Ltd. (4). As I understand that case, these words exclude any consequences that might otherwise result from the operation of the Life Assurance Act, 1774. In Williams v. Baltic Insurance Association of London (5), it had been held in a court of first instance that this Act did not apply to a policy of motor insurance, and it seems, therefore, that this provision is inserted to preserve that decision to that extent, and to guard against the possibility of a higher court taking a different view.

The Eclipse policy which I am considering provides that

> "The insurance shall extend to indemnify any person who is driving on the assured's order or with his permission in respect of any legal liability as aforesaid"

—that is, to third parties. It has been decided by the Judicial Committee in Vandepitte v. Preferred Accident Insurance Corporation (6), that this clause confers no rights on such a person either at common law or in equity unless there was an intention on the part of the assured to create a trust for such person, or unless the assured was acting with the privity and consent of such person so as to be contracting on his behalf.

The question is, therefore, whether the statute has conferred a right of action on such a person and thereby altered the law. Does the section merely mean that, in spite of the provisions of the Life Assurance Act, 1774, the insurers shall indemnify the assured against any liability which the policy purports to cover, or does it mean that freed from any difficulties caused by the Life Assurance Act, 1774, as to insurable interest and as to the absence of any name in the policy other than that of the assured, the insurers shall indemnify every one whom they have said they will indemnify, in respect of the liability they have indicated?

In my judgment, both the policy of the Act and the words used point to the latter conclusion being the right one. The Act was aimed at the protection of the public by providing that there should be a body of insurers behind every driver of a car. As I said earlier in this judgment, this clause had been common, and I think universal, in all private motor car policies for many years. Parliament may be supposed to have known that this was so, and it seems to me no unreasonable supposition that they should enact that, if insurers say that they undertake the insurance of persons driving with the assured's permission, statutory effect should be given to their undertaking. The fact that the section mentions "classes of persons" seems to me to support this view. It is, I should think, difficult to envisage a motor car policy in which a class of persons contract with the underwriters; the latter contract with A., or with A., B., and C., or with A. B., Ltd. But if they say they will also cover the friends or servants of the assured in respect of certain liabilities, it seems to me that they are specifying a class of persons and that the policy purports to cover the liabilities of that class.

This view is, I think, supported by the judgment of GREER, L.J., in McCormick's Case (4). That case was concerned with an attempt by the injured person to sue the underwriters, and so is not a direct authority on the present case, but the LORD JUSTICE says:

> "I think it is quite clear that the section was intended to meet the difficulty that was patent; firstly, that no one who was not a party to a contract could bring an action on the contract, and, secondly, by reason of the statutory and well-known law that a person who has no interest in the subject-matter of an insurance cannot claim the benefit of that insurance."

I read that passage as meaning that, in his opinion, the section was not only intended to effect, but has effected, a change in the law and given a cause of action which hitherto did not exist to a person indicated in the policy but not a party to it, and I respectfully agree with that view.

If the words of the section will bear this construction, then, although another reading of the words may be possible, there seems to be an excellent and, indeed, compelling, reason for preferring it to any other. It must be that insurance companies and underwriters believe that the statute has placed them under a legal liability to indemnify persons who are driving with the assured's consent if they have so undertaken in the policy, for, otherwise, the undertaking is binding only in honour. No doubt many insurances are written which are only honour policies—p.p.i. policies at once occur as instances—and reinsurance treaties are constantly made which are invalid in law for want of a policy, though respectable underwriters never question them. But since the Road Traffic Act, 1930, insurers have to provide their assured with certificates of insurance in a form prescribed by the Minister of Transport. The prescribed form requires the certificate to indicate the persons or classes of persons entitled to drive the insured car. The certificates shown to me in this case, and, indeed, all certificates that I have ever seen since the Act came into force relating to a private car, state that among the persons or classes of persons entitled to drive is a person driving the car with the policy-holder's permission. These certificates are for the purpose, among other things, of affording proof to the police, and it may be to magistrates, that the driver is insured. If the insurers are bound in honour only, these certificates are in this respect entirely illusory, and it is not to be supposed that English insurance companies and underwriters would issue formal documents required by statute containing a statement that they had insured persons unless they believed that they had issued a valid insurance. Of course, if the section will not bear this interpretation, the belief or intention of the insurers will not make it do so, but, if it will, it seems to me right to prefer the construction acted upon by the large body of business men affected by it to any other.

Accordingly, I give judgment for the plaintiff, declaring that the defendant is liable to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of a judgment obtained against him by Frances Smith for £2,150, and costs, and for the costs he has incurred in dealing with and defending that claim to the extent of his proportion of his liability under an Eclipse policy of motor insurance subscribed by him in favour of Walter Gilling and dated April 1, 1932. The plaintiff will have the costs of this action.

Judgment for plaintiff.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Wright, M.R., Romer, L.J., and Eve, J.), October 14, 15, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 272; 105 L.J.K.B. 213; 154 L.T. 1; 52 T.L.R. 55; 79 Sol. Jo. 796]

Limitation of Action—Action on simple contract—Claim to enforce statutory liability to make payment—Not action on specialty—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), s. 3—Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), s. 3.

The fact that a liability to make a payment is imposed by an Act does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that an action brought to enforce such a liability is an action on a specialty, i.e., an action on the statute. Whether or not it is an action on the statute depends on the wording of the statute.

Between 1925 and 1927 the plaintiff was employed by the defendant as an agricultural worker at a wage below that prescribed under the Agricultural Wages Act, 1924. In 1935 he brought an action claiming from the defendant the difference between the wage he had received and that which he ought to have received.

Held: assuming that the plaintiff's claim was in debt, the whole basis of the Act of 1924 was the existence of a contract of employment; such a contract must contain many terms beside those providing for the amount of wages payable, and the only effect of the statute on the contract was to insert in it the proper rate of wages; and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim was on the contract of service as amended by the statute and not on the statute, and his action, being founded on a simple contract and not on a specialty, was out of time.

Per Romer, L.J.: The plaintiff was not bringing an action on the statute of 1924; he was merely suing in respect of a cause of action given him by the statute.

Notes. The Limitation Act, 1603, and the Civil Procedure Act, 1933, were repealed by the Limitation Act, 1939, and for the provisions now applicable, see s. 2 of that Act. The Agricultural Wages Act, 1924, was repealed by the Agricultural Wages Act, 1948, q.v.

Appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE AUSTIN JAMES in the Hastings and St. Leonards County Court.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of the county court judge:

In 1925 the defendant agreed to employ the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed to serve the defendant as a farm worker in Sussex at a wage of £1 2s. a week. These wages were less than the minimum wage (£1 10s. or £1 11s.) prescribed for farm workers in Sussex by the Agricultural Wages Board under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, during this period, and it is admitted that the defendant should have paid to the plaintiff sums amounting to £39 8s. 6d. in addition to the wages which he in fact paid him. This sum of £39 8s. 6d. is claimed in this action. I find that the plaintiff knew throughout his employment by the defendant that he was being paid a lower wage than the minimum wage prescribed, and that he knew the amount of such minimum wage. The defendant contends that the claim is statute-barred, as a period of more than six years elapsed between May 9, 1927, when the plaintiff was last employed by the defendant, and June 1, 1935, when this action was commenced. The plaintiff admits that the action was brought more than six years after the plaintiff's employment ended, but contends that it is not statute-barred because it is an action for debt upon a statute, namely, the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, and that the period of limitation for such an action under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, is twenty years. I hold that this action is not an action for debt upon the statute, as the plaintiff has no right of action for debt upon the statute. By s. 7 (3), (4), and (7), provision is made for the recovery of sums due under the statute from an employer to a worker, but no right of action against his employer appears to have been given to a worker by any section of the statute. By s. 7 (7), provision is made for the institution by an officer appointed by the Minister of civil proceedings on behalf of or in the name of a worker, but this action was not instituted by such an officer. The plaintiff relies on s. 7 (9), which preserves

A to a worker any right that he may have to recover the amount due to him by civil proceedings, but the plaintiff does not contend that he has any right to recover the sum claimed apart from the statute, and I hold that the statute has not given him any right to recover it. The plaintiff's claim fails on the ground that he has no right of action against the defendant to recover the amount claimed, and that, if he has any right of action, it is not an action for debt upon the statute, and is statute-barred.

B The county court judge entered judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Elliott M. Gorst for the plaintiff.

L. G. H. Horton-Smith for the defendant.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—This case raises a question of some interest, and a question on C which both learned counsel who have addressed this court so fully and so comprehensively have agreed there is no precise authority. The question is whether the claim here being brought is one which carries with it a statutory period of limitation of six years or a period of limitation of twenty years—in other words, whether the claim is one which comes within s. 3 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, the material words of which are: "Actions of covenant or debt upon any bond or other specialty," in which case D the period of limitation is twenty years, or, on the other hand, whether the case falls within the words of the Statute of Limitations, 1623, s. 3: "Actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty," in which case the period of limitation is six years.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a farm labourer for a period between June, 1925, and Easter, 1927. He is claiming in respect of what he alleges were under- E payments made to him in respect of wages during those periods. It is, therefore, clear that, unless he can bring his case within the Act of 1833, his claim must be statute-barred, because, if it falls within the statutory period under the statute of James, he is clearly out of time. He was employed as a workman at a weekly wage of 22s.—that was the express arrangement between him and the defendant. In June, 1925, the statutory rate of wages for farm labourers under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) F Act, 1924, to which I shall refer a little later, was 30s. The plaintiff and the defendant apparently agreed on 22s. because the plaintiff was receiving 8s. disability rate at the time. In October, 1925, the statutory wages were increased by 1s. to 31s. and so it continued until the plaintiff left the employment about Easter, 1927. He brought his action on June 1, 1935, and in that action he alleged that the proper rate of wages which he ought to have received during the period in which he was employed was at the G rate of 30s. a week, and, a little later, at the rate of 31s. a week, in October, 1925. He claimed the difference between what he was paid and what he says he ought to have been paid, and that difference amounted to a total of £39 8s. 6d. It was not disputed that, subject to the Statute of Limitations, that claim was good. The question, therefore, arises: Is the plaintiff entitled to say that he comes within the definition of the Act of 1833, and that his claim is based on a debt upon a bond or other specialty?

H The forms of action have now been abolished, and, therefore, the claim of the plaintiff is not specifically laid in debt, and I do not think it necessary to decide here whether, according to the old forms, this claim was one technically in debt, or whether it was a claim in assumpsit, or whether it might properly have been laid under either form of action. I have assumed, without deciding it, that the claim is in debt, and I do so because it is apparent on the face of the Act of 1833 that that Act only applies to actions I which can be framed in debt. That, therefore, leaves the essential question to be decided: If the case is to come within the Act of 1833, is it an action upon any bond or other specialty?

The case made by the appellant is that this claim is a claim upon the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, and on that ground is a claim within the Act of 1833. I must deal quite shortly with the relative provisions of this Act. The first of the provisions material to this case are to be found in s. 1 of the Act of 1924. That gives a power, subject to the provisions of the Act, for agricultural wages committees to fix minimum rates of wages for workers employed in agriculture for time work, and, if desirable or expedient, for piecework; and the minimum wages of 30s. and a little later of 31s., to which I have already referred, were duly fixed by proper committees in accordance with the Act. Section 7 provides as follows:

> "Where any minimum rate of wages has been made effective by an order of the Agricultural Wages Board under this Act, any person who employs a worker in agriculture shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the worker at a rate not less than the minimum rate, and, if he fails to do so, shall be liable on summary conviction in respect of each offence to a fine."

Sub-s. (2) provides:

> "In any proceedings against a person under this section it shall lie with that person to prove that he has paid wages at not less than the minimum rate."

Sub-ss. (3) and (4) give a court of summary jurisdiction, which deals with the prosecution for penalties under sub-s. (1), the power, whether there is a conviction or not, to > "order the employer to pay, in addition to the fine, if any, such sum as may be found by the court to represent the difference between the amount which ought at the minimum rate applicable to have been paid to the worker during the period of six months immediately preceding the date on which the information was laid or the complaint was served and the amount actually paid to him during that period."

Sub-s. (4) contains similar provisions, though less limited in their application. It says this:

> "Where an employer has been convicted under this section [it is limited to a case of an actual conviction] for failing to pay wages to any worker at not less than the minimum rate applicable, then, if notice of intention so to do has been served with the summons, warrant or complaint, evidence may be given of any failure on the part of the employer to pay wages to that worker at not less than the minimum rate applicable to him at any time during the eighteen months immediately preceding the period of six months mentioned in the last preceding subsection, and on proof of the failure the court may order the employer to pay" the difference between the amount actually paid and the amount that ought to have been paid in accordance with the Act. Section 7 (9) provides:

> "The powers given by this section for the recovery of sums due from an employer to a worker shall not be in derogation of any right of the worker to recover such sums by civil proceedings."

That, of course, clearly means that the special remedies under sub-ss. (3) and (4) are not to be exclusive and are not to bar the worker from proceeding, if he is so minded, by ordinary civil proceedings, and in any case it leaves him free to recover by civil proceedings any amount (as he is seeking to do here) to which he is lawfully entitled in accordance with the Act. By sub-s. (10):

> "Any agreement for the payment of wages in contravention of this Act, or for abstaining to exercise any right of enforcing the payment of wages in accordance with this Act, shall be void."

In sub-s. (11), the court is given power, subject to the various limitations and prohibitions, to

> "reckon as a payment of wages such amount as, in the opinion of the court, represents the value of any benefits or advantages (not being benefits or advantages prohibited by law) received by a worker under the terms of his employment."

It is obvious, in looking through those sections, particularly at s. 7, that the whole basis of this Act is that there should be an employment. In s. 2 (1), the minimum rates are to be for workers employed in agriculture; in s. 7 (1), the minimum rate of wages is to be effective against any person who employs the worker; in sub-s. (3), the proceedings referred to are to be those against an employer, and the same is true of sub-s. (4); in sub-s. (9) the sums to be recovered are to be those due from an employer to a worker; sub-s. (10) refers to an agreement of employment; and sub-s. (11) also refers to the terms of the worker's employment. In s. 16 (1), the definition section, there is this:

> "The expression 'employment' means employment under a contract of service or apprenticeship, and the expressions 'employed' and 'employer' shall be construed accordingly."

I have referred to this specifically because I want to emphasise the importance of this matter a little later. The question is whether the action is an action in debt upon a specialty, and, if the claim is a claim under the statute within the meaning of the expression, it is a claim upon a specialty. What is meant by that is very carefully discussed in a leading case of Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. v. Goode (1), which is relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiff. In that case the defendant was the holder of thirty shares in the railway company and he was sued in respect of nine calls. The declaration set out that an action had accrued to the company by virtue of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Cork and Bandon Railway Company Act, 1845, but the declaration went on, "the defendant had not paid the same, or any part thereof." To that there was a second plea, "that the action is upon contracts without specialty" and that the causes of action accrued did not accrue within six years before the suit.

> "To this plea the plaintiffs demurred, the ground of demurrer stated in the margin being that the statute of limitations referred to by the second plea, and therein pleaded, was not pleadable to the causes of action declared on."

It was held that that plea was a bad plea, because the proper limitation for such an action was twenty years under the Act of 1833. I draw attention there to the form of the declaration, which simply sets out that the defendant was the holder of thirty shares whereby an action had accrued to the company by virtue of the two Acts referred to. That is the whole of the case and nothing more. It was held, as I say, that that was an action upon the statute (or statutes), and, therefore, upon the specialty. Some observations made by the judges in the course of the argument are very significant. Maule, J., says to the counsel for the plaintiff (13 C.B. at p. 829): "You say that the facts stated here do not show any contract, except for the statute?" and counsel naturally agrees. Then Cresswell, J., says (ibid. at p. 831): "What is the contract between the shareholders and the company? When is it made? And how? By writing, by word of mouth, or by instrument under seal?" Maule, J., says: "Where is the shareholder's undertaking to pay calls but for the statute?" and it is answered by counsel for the defendant, "It must be conceded that there is none." Maule, J.: "Then he undertakes by the statute. Is an action brought upon that undertaking an action upon a contract without specialty?" obviously answering it in the negative. There are other passages to the same effect; and when I turn to the judgment itself, Jervis, C.J., says: "But for the Act of Parliament no action could be brought by the company against one of its own members." That, I think, is limited to the matter in debate, namely, an action for calls. "This, therefore, is an action brought in respect of a liability created by statute, and therefore is an action founded upon the statute." Maule, J., to the same effect, says:

> "It is manifest, upon reading the declaration, that it is a declaration in debt upon these two statutes. Now, a declaration in debt upon a statute, is a declaration upon a specialty; and it is not the less so because the facts which bring the defendant within the liability, are facts dehors the statute: that must constantly arise in actions for liabilities arising out of statutes. That appearing to be so, the allegation in the plea, that the action is upon contracts without specialty, is a false allegation of a matter of law."

The learned judge, when he says that the facts which bring the defendant within the liability are facts dehors the statute, is merely referring, as I understand it, to the circumstances that the defendant must have become a shareholder; once he has become a shareholder then the statute applies and defines the whole of his contract and all the rights and liabilities which flow from it. Maule, J., goes on to say:

> " There may, undoubtedly, be cases where a statute enables an action to be brought, which nevertheless is not an action on the Act of Parliament. But the question is, whether that state of things exists here. I think it manifestly appears that this is an action of debt, and upon the statute, and therefore an action upon a specialty."

Those words, as I shall show in a moment, are of first-rate importance. Then the judge points out,

> " whether assumpsit or case would lie, leaves altogether untouched the question whether this plea is an answer to this action."

Cresswell, J., says: " This is plainly an action upon a statutory liability to pay the calls"; and Talfourd, J., being of the same opinion, says:

> ' The relation between the shareholders and the company is the creation of the Act of Parliament. The action is in terms founded upon the Act of Parliament, and consequently an action upon a specialty."

Does that case cover the present case? In my judgment, it does not. In my judgment, the question which has to be determined here, and which can only be determined by looking at the Act of 1924 in connection with all the circumstances of the case, shows something entirely different. There is, as I think, here a contract of service between the plaintiff and the defendant, a contract of employment. That was a contract entered into in June, 1925, at a time, no doubt, when the Act was in force, but that was a contract which contained many terms, besides the mere question of what wages were payable, and it is on that contract that the plaintiff is here suing. What he seeks to do is to isolate the question of wages and say that that is a matter which arises in abstracto, and he seeks to say that his right to wages is the right in the Act and from nothing else, and that no other part of the relationship into which he entered with his employer, the defendant, can be considered. But I think that that contention is entirely unwarranted. It is clear that the contract of employment must contain many other conditions, many other terms. It is contemplated in s. 7 (11), and it is contemplated throughout—the whole position depends upon a relationship of employer and employed, the scope of which cannot be limited to the mere amount of wages which is payable. It is true that under s. 7 (10), there is a provision that, but that does not say that the employment as a whole—that is to say, the contract of employment as a whole—shall be avoided. On the contrary, s. 7 contemplates that the relationship of employer and employed continues, even though the employer has not been paying the proper rate of wages. That is perfectly clear by looking at sub-ss. (1), (3), (4) and (5), where the employer who has failed to pay the proper rate of wages is still treated as the employer, and must be so treated in all respects, except in regard to matters of wages. In my judgment, the effect of sub-s. (10) is merely to provide that where you have a contract of employment one item under the terms of that contract is to be, as it were, reconstructed by striking out the rate of wages, which is lower than it ought to be, and by inserting the proper rate of wages in accordance with the statute. It is not contended that the whole agreement, or the whole employment, is to be abrogated and swept aside.

If that is the true position, I think it is clear that the matter stands outside the ruling of Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. v. Goode (1). As I have already said, there, once the defendant had become a shareholder, the whole scope of his rights and duties and liability arose under the statute and nothing else; there was nothing outside the statute to which reference could be made, and, therefore, the claim against him was a claim upon the statute. But here the claim by the worker against the employer is a claim on the basis of the whole contract of employment, which is a contract involving many terms, and the only effect of the statute upon that contract is to insert, against, it may be, the overt agreement of the parties, the proper rate of wages and to eliminate the improper rate of wages, and in that way the worker, suing on the contract and not upon the Act, is able to claim that he should be paid the proper rate of wages. His claim really here is for 30s., or 31s., at the various appropriate dates, with a set-off against that of the amounts that he has actually received, and that, as I say, is a claim on the contract as amended by the statute.

We have been referred to a number of authorities which do seem to throw some light upon the general position and, as I think, support the view which I have already expressed, but none of these authorities seems to determine the question which is now before this court or to settle the problem which I have attempted to solve. I will not refer to the earlier cases before the Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. Case (1), and I can pass, at once, to Salford Corpn. v. Lancashire County Council (2), where it was held that the action could not be an action in debt at all, but could only be an action on the case, and, if it could not be an action in debt, still less could it be an action for debt on a statute. The matter was really decided on a quite different ground. It was a claim against the justices of the county by the borough council for the payment of certain moneys which, under a statute, the borough might claim to have recouped to them; but the claim, being against the justices, was not a claim in debt or a personal claim; it was a claim to be refunded either out of a particular fund which the council had or out of a rate which the council might raise to meet this expenditure if the fund were not sufficient. The substance of the decision was that that was a claim which could only be enforced by mandamus, and I need say no more about the incidental references made by LORD ESHER to this matter, the effect of which I have already indicated.

In Re Cornwall Minerals Rail. Co. (3) the claim was for interest on debenture stock, and there it was held, as I read it, on the same principle as that which is laid down in the Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. Case (1), that the liability was purely statutory and that the period of limitation was twenty years. Thomson v. Lord Clanmorris (4) deals with a claim under s. 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890

> "to recover from the directors compensation for loss or damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of untrue statements in the prospectus of the company on the faith of which he subscribed for his shares."

That Act, as we all know, was passed to obviate the conclusion arrived at as to the liability of directors in Derry v. Peek (5), and was to put their liability in certain circumstances on negligence instead of leaving it, as had been the case before, as a liability only for deceit. The Act by s. 3 (1), which is the important one, provides that the director should, in the events specified in the Act, be liable to pay compensation to all persons who subscribed for shares, debentures or debenture stock on the faith of the prospectus. That was a liability in one sense created by the statute and in one sense it might be said to be a liability upon the statute; but it clearly was not a case on the same footing as the Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. Case (1). VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., points that out very clearly, and I need only read one short passage from his judgment ([1900] 1 Ch. at p. 728):

> "But it is said that this is not an action on the case, but an action on the statute, and Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. v. Goode (1) is relied on. But it must be remembered that there the action was for a statutory debt, and the sole question was whether that debt was, within the terms of s. 3 of the statute of James, 'grounded on a contract without specialty.' It does not seem to me that that decision is really material to the case now before us. MAULE, J., pointed out that there is a difference between an action which is given by a statute and an action on the statute."

These words, I venture to think, are most relevant here. In this present case, the action for the 30s. or 31s. a week is given in one sense by the statute, because unless the statute had fixed the wages of the employment at those figures no action could have been brought for those figures, but, in my opinion, it is not an action on the statute;

it is an action on the contract of employment which is effected in the respect of the rate A of wages in that matter. Then the LORD JUSTICE goes on to add: "Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. v. Goode (1) was an action of debt on the statute." I think that is all I need read. These are very important words from that great judge.

I come to the last of the cases to which this court has been referred: that is Aylott v. West Ham Corpn.; Sisson v. Same (6). That case again was, on the facts, very different from the present case. It arose from a resolution of the council of the West Ham B
Corporation in September, 1914, to the effect that if their employees, married or single, were called up or volunteered for service with the forces they should be granted full civil pay. The plaintiff came within that definition. He was granted full civil pay, and when he brought his action in 1925 he claimed that he had not got full civil pay, because, although he had been paid the difference between his army pay and the rate of pay which he was getting at the time when he was called up in 1914, various increments would C have been added to his pay from time to time. He contended that these extra amounts ought to be paid to him in order to fulfil the obligation of the corporation. It was clear that in 1914 the resolution and promise to pay the full civil pay was ultra vires the corporation, but they were given the necessary power by the Local Government (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1916, and that Act was retrospective. But it is clear that the Act was merely permissive. It retrospectively gave power to the local authority, which D they had not originally possessed, to make such a contract, but unless and until they did make a contract the question of the validity of that contract could not arise, and, therefore, the claim of the plaintiff in that case was based, not on the permissive statute, but on the promise, the contract, contained in the resolution, and in the act on the part of the plaintiff in going into military service. Therefore, the relevancy of the Act was merely to get rid of the objection that the promise to pay full civil pay was ultra vires, E and on that ground it was held by ROMER, J. (as he then was) and by the Court of Appeal that the plaintiff could only recover such increments and pay as became payable in the six years preceding the issue, of the writ in the action, and Cork and Bandon Rail. Co. Case (1) was distinguished. There are, however, some observations which are somewhat helpful in dealing with the present question. ROMER, J., says this ([1927] 1 Ch. at p. 39): F

> "Had the Act of 1916 been in force at the time that the plaintiff enlisted in reliance upon the resolution of the defendants' council, the action would without doubt have been one founded upon simple contract, even though the power of the defendants to make the contract would have been derived from the Act," and having said that he then proceeds to discuss the relevancy of the Act in question. G

Then ROMER, J., observes ([1927] 1 Ch. at p. 41) in respect of Re Cornwall Mineral Rail. Co. (3) which I have already referred to:

> "There was no contract by the company to pay the interest. Its liability to do so was to be found in the statute and in the statute alone."

Then the learned judge (as he then was), after referring to the other cases, finally says H again ([1927] 1 Ch. at p. 44):

> "If, at the time the plaintiff enlisted, the Act of 1916 had been in force, his action would have been brought upon the simple contract subsisting by reason of the offer contained in the defendants' resolution, and the acceptance of that offer by the plaintiff," and then, having arrived at that conclusion, so far, he discusses the Act and says this:

I

> "It"—that is the Act—"provides in effect that the contract entered into with a servant of the former class is to be binding on the authority to the extent (though only to the extent) to which it would have been binding if the provisions of the Act had then been in force. It seems to follow from this that for the purpose of considering the rights and liabilities of the parties to such a contract I am to treat it as though, at the date it was entered into, the provisions of sub-s. (1) had been in force."

I think that the action here must also be treated as a claim in simple contract, namely, on the contract of employment, even though there has been the amendment or alteration, by reason of the statute, of the rate of wages, which is one of the elements in the contract, but not the whole of the contract. The Court of Appeal put the matter in very much the same way, and Warrington, L.J., if I may refer to a short passage in his judgment, says this (135 L.T. at p. 427):

> "The contention is that, inasmuch as the Act made the antecedent promise for the first time binding on the corporation, therefore the action upon that promise is an action upon the statute. In my opinion that is an entire misconception of the effect of the statute. The action is an action on the contract, upon the promise made in 1914. Without that promise there would be no action at all. All that the statute does is to make that promise binding so that, in case it is not performed, an action may be brought upon it."

The learned Lord Justice there is distinguishing between an action brought upon a statute and an action which can only be brought because of some provisions of a statute which has made the promise enforceable, and I think the same is true of a case like the present, where the effect of the statute upon a contract has been to alter or amend one term of that contract—a very material term no doubt, but one term of the contract, that is to say, the rate of wages payable under the contract.

In my opinion, this is not an action brought upon a specialty—that is to say, upon a statute within the meaning of the Act of 1833—and I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—The question which arises upon this appeal may be stated in this way: Is the plaintiff bringing an action on the statute of 1924, or is he merely suing in respect of a cause of action given to him by that statute? In my opinion, he is merely suing upon a cause of action given him by the statute.

It is quite true that s. 7 (1) of the statute in question, which is the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, does in terms purport to impose upon the employer a liability to pay wages at the minimum rate, but as I ventured to point out in Aylott v. West Ham Corpn., Sisson v. Same (6) ([1927] 1 Ch. at p. 41), the fact that a liability to make a payment is imposed by an Act does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that an action brought to enforce such liability is an action upon a specialty—that is, an action upon the statute. Whether it is or is not an action on the statute depends upon the wording of the statute. A good illustration of that is to be found in the case the Master of the Rolls has already referred to of Thomson v. Lord Clanmorris (4). The statute in question there was the Directors' Liability Act of 1890 which, by s. 3, in terms at any rate, purported to impose upon the directors, and other persons who authorised the issue of a prospectus, a liability to pay compensation to persons who subscribed for shares and so forth upon the faith of such prospectus for loss or damage they had sustained by reason of untrue statements therein contained. In that case the question was debated—it was not an action which was tried, because it did not become necessary to decide it—whether an action brought by a person who had been deceived by a prospectus to recover compensation from directors who had authorised the issue of a prospectus, was an action upon the statute, or whether it was an attempt to enforce a cause of action given by the statute. Vaughan Williams, L.J., expressed the opinion that, notwithstanding the words of the section, the section merely imposed a new statutory duty upon directors and gave to the persons who had been damaged by the prospectus or misled by the prospectus a new cause of action against the directors. But, for the purpose of deciding that question, he said ([1900] 1 Ch. at p. 727):

> "One must consider what is really the nature of the enactment contained in s. 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890."

Therefore, for the purpose of deciding the question on this appeal, it is necessary to consider the wording of the section which it is said creates a liability and enables a person to maintain an action founded upon the statute. The section in question is s. 7, but before reading s. 7 I should like to refer to the definition section—s. 16 (3). There it is said: A

> "The expression 'employment' means employment under a contract of service or apprenticeship, and the expressions 'employed' and 'employer' shall be construed accordingly."

Bearing that definition in mind, one must read s. 7 (1), as follows: B

> "Where the minimum rate of wages has been made effective by an order of the Agricultural Wages Board under this Act any person who employs under a contract a worker in agriculture shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the worker at a rate not less than the minimum rate"; and sub-s. (10) of that section provides that C

> "Any agreement for the payment of wages in contravention of this Act, or for abstaining to exercise any right of enforcing the payment of wages in accordance with this Act, shall be void."

In my opinion, the true effect of that s. 7 is that in all contracts of employment of a worker in agriculture where the wages fixed for that contract are less than the minimum D rate of wages ordained by the Agricultural Wages Board there shall be substituted in the contract for the wages, or provided for by the contract, the minimum rate of wages mentioned in the order of the Agricultural Wages Board, and that the provision in the contract fixing wages less than that minimum wage is rendered void under sub-s. (10). That, I think, is the natural meaning of the section. There are words in the section which seem to me to confirm the view which I have taken of that as meaning that if an E action, such as the present one, is an action brought on the statute, it must be an action or a proceeding under s. 7. But if one looks at sub-s. (3) of s. 7 it becomes apparent that in the view of the Legislature no proceedings under the section can be taken, except proceedings of a criminal nature, that is to say, proceedings to recover the fine which is imposed by s. 7 (1), in respect of an offence against the subsection. I will not examine sub-s. (3) further than to say it is really apparent, if that subsection be read F carefully, that the Legislature contemplates that the proceedings under the section are proceedings of a criminal nature and not otherwise. Proceedings in respect of the cause of action given by the section are dealt with, as I read the subsection, by sub-s. (9), which provides that the right, in other words, to sue upon the contract as altered by the statute is in terms preserved.

> "The powers given by this section for the recovery of sums due from an employer to a worker shall not be in derogation of any right of the worker to recover such sums by civil proceedings"; G

I think the view I have taken of the construction of the Act is further confirmed by this consideration: supposing that at the time the first order of the Agricultural Wages H Board came into operation a worker in agriculture was employed at a weekly wage of 30s. Certainly up to the time the order came into force the only liability of the employer to pay that wage was a liability under the contract. Can it be said that from the moment the order came into force the employer was under two liabilities—a liability to pay 30s. under the contract and another liability to pay 30s. under the statute? It would be ridiculous to make any such suggestion. Then when the second order of the I Board came into force and the minimum wage was 31s., can it really be said that as from that date the employer was under two liabilities, a liability to pay 30s. under the contract and a liability to pay 31s. under the statute? It appears to me to be ridiculous. In both cases the liability of the employer was one, and one only, namely, a liability under his contract to pay the wage of the worker, not as fixed in the contract, but as altered and fixed by the statute.

For these reasons, in addition to those given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, I think that this appeal fails.

EVE, J.—This action is founded only on the contract of employment, and I agree that the proper statutory limitation applicable to the case is that created by the statute of James, and there is no room, in my opinion, for the application of any other principle. I agree that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Coal Mining—Working of mine—Letting down surface—Surface owned by water undertakers—Acquisition from vendors of common law right of support—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict., c. 17), ss. 18 to 27*—Public Health Act,* 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 37), s. 3 (2).

In 1901 the plaintiffs, statutory undertakers for the supply of water, purchased land which in 1810 had been allotted under an Inclosure Act to the predecessors in title of the vendor, there being then reserved to the lord of the manor the right to work minerals, subject to liability to compensate the allotment-holders for damage done to the surface. In 1911, the plaintiffs having erected reservoirs thereon, the defendants, lessees of coal lying under and adjacent to the plaintiffs' works, gave notice under the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883, of intention to work coal under and within a distance of forty yards of the plaintiffs' works. The plaintiffs did not give any counter notice expressing willingness to treat or to make compensation for preventing, or of their intention to prevent or interfere with, the working of minerals within the forty yards area or outside it, as provided by the Act of 1847. In 1914 the plaintiffs acquired additional land from the same vendor, subject to the same reservations, and built other reservoirs thereon. In 1928 the working of the coal, by subsidence of the surface, caused damage to the plaintiffs' works.

Held: on the true construction of the Inclosure Act of 1910 there was no provision therein excluding the common law right of support possessed by the owners of the surface of the land, and, further, there being no evidence that at the date of the passing of the Act it was known that the minerals under the land could not be worked without letting down the surface, such right was not excluded by necessary implication; in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 18 to 27, and the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883, s. 3 (2), there was no provision, express or to be implied, prohibiting a statutory undertaker from purchasing by agreement land with a right to support from the subjacent minerals from the owner who had such a right attached to his land as against the mineral owner; and, therefore, the right of support which the vendor to the plaintiffs had under the Inclosure Act passed to the plaintiffs in 1901 and 1914, and the defendants were not entitled to ignore those rights although the plaintiffs had not given any counter notice under s. 23 of the Act of 1847.

Action for an injunction restraining the defendants from working minerals so as to damage the plaintiffs' lands and for damages.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment:

The plaintiff council is the statutory undertaker for the supply of water for the Wath-upon-Dearne urban district, and in that capacity is the owner of certain surface lands on which waterworks with the appropriate reservoirs and filter beds have been constructed. The defendant company are the lessees of a seam of coal lying under and adjacent to the council's waterworks. The council claims that the defendant company, by working the seam of coal, have caused the council's land to subside, and that substantial damage has thereby resulted. It claims an injunction restraining the defendant company, "their servants, workmen, and agents from working the minerals lying under or near the said lands of the plaintiffs in such a manner as to cause injury or damage to the plaintiffs' said lands, reservoirs, and filter beds or any of them." It also claims damages or compensation for the damage or injury to the plaintiffs' works, and ancillary relief.

The defendant company alleges that the council has no ground of complaint against it, because no subsidence has been caused by its working. It further alleges that, if subsidence has in fact been caused by that working, the defendant company is not liable, because the council, having received due notice of the defendant company's intention to work its coal under the land within forty yards of the plaintiffs' waterworks in accordance with the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883, took no steps to acquire the coal, or any part of it, or to make compensation for it, or to prevent or interfere with the working of the coal. To this the council replies that it relies, not on any statutory right, but on the common law right to support, which was vested in the vendors to the council at the date of the sale and conveyance to it in respect of the land sold and conveyed. In answer to this contention, the defendant company says, first, that the vendors had no right of support at common law, and, secondly, if the vendors had any such right, it did not pass to the council by the conveyance of the land in question, and that the council's only right of support is that afforded by the provisions of the Acts of 1847 and 1883.

For some period before 1898 and down to the passing of the Wath-upon-Dearne Urban District Council (Water) Act, 1898, the area comprised in that district was supplied with water by the West Melton Waterworks Company. The 1898 Act authorised the taking over of the existing works of the last-named company, and constituted the council the statutory undertaker for the supply of water for the district. It incorporated, among other general Acts, the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, and the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883. By s. 15, the council was authorised to purchase by agreement additional lands. It is in the following terms:

> "The council may for any of the purposes of their water undertaking purchase by agreement any lands not exceeding one hundred acres, but the council shall not create or permit the creation or continuance of any nuisance on any such lands or use such lands for any building except offices and dwellings for persons in their employ and such buildings and works as may be incident to or connected with their waterworks."

The Act does not confer on the council any authority to purchase compulsorily. Section 20 confers on the council the necessary powers to maintain the waterworks.

On June 14, 1901, the council purchased 4,840 sq. yds. of land in the highest part of Wath Wood. The vendors were the trustees for sale of a settlement made on the marriage of a Mr. R. C. Otter. This land had, with other land, been allotted to the vendors' predecessors in title under an Act passed in the year 1810 intituled an Act for enclosing lands in the township of Wath-upon-Dearne. The allotment was made subject to a reservation to the then Earl Fitzwilliam, as lord of the manors of Wath-upon-Dearne and Thornhill Hall, of any mines of coal and other minerals in or under the allotted lands. I will refer to this Act with more particularity later. The conveyance of 1901 was expressed to be subject to the exception and reservation of minerals, and the power to work the same "granted to the lord of the manor by the inclosure award for the parish of Wath-upon-Dearne," meaning the 1810 Inclosure Act. By the end of the year 1903 the council had constructed two reservoirs and three filter beds on the land conveyed to it by the conveyance of June 14, 1901.

Before the land was purchased, coal had been worked under it. There are a number of seams of coal under the land in question and throughout the district. One of these seams is known as the Barnsley seam. This lies at a depth of some 264 yds. below the surface of the land comprised in the 1901 conveyance. Another of the seams is known as the Parkgate seam, and lies at a depth of about 780 yds. below the surface, and 505 yds. below the Barnsley seam. The Barnsley seam has substantially been worked out under the land comprised in the 1901 conveyance, and in its immediate neighbourhood. The working took place mainly between the years 1881 and 1885, and any subsidence resulting from it occurred long before any date material to be considered in this action, and it was admitted that no further subsidence was likely to occur in respect of the old workings, provided these were not disturbed by the subsequent working of any of the seams below the Barnsley seam.

On Jan. 21, 1911, the defendant company gave to the council a notice of its intention to work the coal under and within a distance of forty yards from the plaintiff council's waterworks. This notice was given under the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883. The receipt of this notice was duly acknowledged, but the council did not then, or at any later date, give to the defendant company any counter notice of willingness to treat or to make compensation for preventing or of its intention to prevent or interfere with the working of any underlying or surrounding mines or minerals, whether within or outside the forty yards area. At the date of the notice the defendant company had not worked any of the coal within a distance of some 250 yards from the council's waterworks. On Oct. 5, 1914, the council purchased from the then trustees of the same settlement a piece of land adjoining the land bought in 1901. This land comprised an area of 3,886 sq. yds., and was conveyed subject to a similar exception and reservation of the mines and minerals to that contained in the 1901 conveyance. It formed part of the land allotted to the vendors' predecessors in title under the 1810 Allotment Act, and was subject to the reservation of mines and minerals in favour of Earl Fitzwilliam as Lord of the Manors to which I have already referred. By the end of the year 1915 the council had constructed and completed two further reservoirs, two new filter beds, an engine house, and water-tower on this land.

The defendant company, after the expiration of the statutory period of thirty days from the giving of the notice, started to work the Parkgate seam, and by September, 1928, had reached a point within the forty yards area. No sign of trouble was manifested at the plaintiff council's waterworks until October, 1926. At that date, while one of the new reservoirs constructed in 1915 was being cleaned, fine vertical cracks were noticed in the angles of the east and west walls of that reservoir, and some slight cracks were observed in its floor. These cracks were made good, and for a time there was no further trouble; but on Oct. 12, 1928, it was discovered that a large quantity of clear water was collecting on the surface of the land which is adjacent to and on the south-west side of the council's waterworks. Examination of the waterworks disclosed the fact that water was escaping from the base of one of the filters at the rate of 57,000 gallons a day, and serious cracks were found in its west wall and floor. These cracks were dealt with temporarily. On Jan. 16, 1929, it was noticed that the level of the water in the new reservoir was dropping at a rate out of all expected proportions to the service then being given, and in consequence the two filters were tested. It was found that there were serious cracks in both filters, and that water was being lost at the rate of over 65,000 gallons per day. On Jan. 20 and 21, 1929, the reservoir was again tested, and the cracks were found to be worse than they were on Jan. 17. Letters were written to the defendant company and to Messrs. Stewarts and Lloyds, Ltd., who were the lessees of the Barnsley seam. The plaintiff council repaired its works by lining them with a bitumastic sheeting, so that in effect there was a system of tanks constructed inside the original filters and reservoirs. In the result, there has been no further loss of water, and it is apprehended that, even if any further cracks should develop in the filters or reservoirs, no water is likely to escape. The total cost of the work done to remedy the damage was stated to be £1,349 18s. 7d.

On Feb. 18, 1930, the defendant company gave to the council a further notice, which was expressed to be in confirmation and continuation of the notice previously given to the council in 1911. In it the defendant company is described as the owner, lessee or occupier of mines or seams of coal, including the Parkgate seam, under and near the council's waterworks, and under the lands within the distance of forty yards therefrom. The notice stated that the defendant company was desirous of working this seam of coal at the expiration of thirty days from the service of the notice. No counter notice was served on behalf of the plaintiff council under the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883, or either of them.

On May 30, 1930, the writ in this action was issued against the defendant company, and Messrs. Stewarts and Lloyds, Ltd. On July 26, 1930, the plaintiff council gave to Messrs. Stewarts and Lloyds, Ltd., notice of discontinuance, and since that date the action has proceeded against the defendant company alone.

Spens, K.C., and Gilbert, for the plaintiffs. In the Inclosure Act of 1810 there was no provision to let down the surface: (Butterknowle Colliery Co. v. Bishop Auckland Industrial Co-operative Co. (1); Davis v. Treharne (2); Butterley Co. v. New Hucknall Colliery Co. (3); Warwickshire Coal Co. v. Coventry Corpn. (4)). On those authorities the plaintiffs claim relief.

Archer, K.C., and Rabagliati, for the defendants. The plaintiffs have no common law right of support: (New Moss Colliery Co. v. Manchester Corpn. (5); Pountney v. Clayton (6); Great Western Railway v. Bennett (7); Consett Waterworks Co. v. Ritson (8); Howley Park Coal and Cannel Co. v. London and North Western Railway (9)). The mine had been worked for years before the plaintiffs acquired it. There cannot be coal mining without subsidence, and they must have known it. It cannot be supposed that the surface will be covered with buildings: (Beard v. Moira Colliery Co. (10); Davies v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co. (11); Warwickshire Coal Co. v. Coventry Corpn. (4)). The Inclosure Act gave the right to let down the surface, subject to compensation. A right of support never passed to the plaintiffs. The Code was in substitution of the common law right. The Inclosure Act must be construed as to compensation as a covenant in a deed: (MACSWINNEY ON MINES, 5th edit., p. 197; Barr v. Baird (12); Neill's Trustees v. William Dixon, Ltd. (13)). The covenant did not extend to statutory works.

Spens, K.C., in reply. The right to compensation arises because of an extraordinary user by a neighbouring owner: (Aynsley v. Bedlington Coal Co. (14); Love v. Bell (15)).

The material parts of the statutes referred to are set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22, 1935.—LUXMOORE, J. [after stating the facts as set out above, continued:] The question which I have to determine is whether the plaintiff council has any legal cause of complaint against the defendant company. To answer the question a number of other questions arise or may arise for solution. Some of these are of considerable difficulty. I propose to formulate the questions which seem to me to require or may require consideration, and to state them in what appears to me to be their logical sequence. (i) Had the vendors to the council, at the respective dates in 1901 and 1914, when they conveyed to it the two plots of land already mentioned, any right of support for the surface of these plots from the subjacent minerals and adjacent land and minerals? (ii) If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, did such right pass to the council? (iii) If the answer to the first question is in the negative, had the vendors at the same dates any right to receive compensation for damage which might thereafter be suffered in respect of the land in question by reason of the working of the mines and minerals? (iv) If the answer to the third question is in the affirmative, did that right pass to the council? (v) Is the council entitled to any, and what, relief, having regard to the answers to the preceding questions?

The answer to the first question necessitates a careful consideration of the Wath-upon-Dearne Inclosure Act of 1810. In construing the Act, it is necessary to bear in mind the rules laid down in the cases which have been decided with reference to other Inclosure Acts of a similar character. These rules were summarised by LORD LOREBURN and LORD MACNAGHTEN in Butterknowle Colliery Co. v. Bishop Auckland Industrial Co-operative Co. (1), where LORD LOREBURN, L.C., said ([1906] A.C. at p. 309):

> "Whenever the minerals belong to one person and the surface to another, the law presumes that the surface owner has a right to support, unless the language of the instrument regulating their rights, or other evidence, clearly shows the contrary. In order to exclude a right of support, the language used must unequivocally convey that intention, either by express words or by necessary implication. For the same presumption in favour of a right of support which regulates the rights of parties in the absence of an instrument defining them will apply also in construing > the instrument when it is produced. If the introduction of a clause to the effect that the mines must be worked so as not to let down the surface would not create an inconsistency with the actual clauses of the instrument, then it means that the surface cannot be let down. Illustrations are numerous in the reports. Words, however wide, that merely authorise the getting of all the minerals, have been held not to authorise so getting them as to let down the surface. Where power is given to get the minerals on paying compensation for damage done to the surface, the court will still scrutinise the compensation clause. Are there any rights belonging to the mine owner on the surface—such as a right of making roads—to which the compensation clause may refer? If the compensation clause is capable of being satisfied by reference to acts done on the surface, then, though it may be wide enough to cover also damage done to the surface by taking away the support, still it must be confined to damage done on the surface, and the inference that support may be taken away on payment of compensation will not be drawn. Again, courts have asked whether the compensation is manifestly inadequate for such an injury as letting down the surface, and have commented upon the absence of any provision for compensation. Either of these circumstances has supplied judges with a reason for so cutting down wide language in a grant of minerals as to imply a condition that the surface shall be supported. The process of reasoning in such cases seems to be that parties must not be supposed to have intended what would be unreasonable and unjust. I think that in each of them a clause providing for a continuance of support would not have been inconsistent with the actual clauses."

Then LORD MACNAGHTEN in the same case said ([1906] A.C. at p. 313):

> "The result seems to be that in all cases where there has been a severance in title and the upper and the lower strata are in different hands, the surface owner is entitled of common right to support for his property in its natural position and in its natural condition without interference or disturbance by or in consequence of mining operations, unless such interference or disturbance is authorised by the instrument of severance either in express terms or by necessary implication. This presumption in favour of one of the ordinary and most necessary rights of property holds good whether the instrument of severance is a lease, or a deed of grant or reservation, or an inclosure Act or award. To exclude the presumption it is not enough that mining rights have been reserved or granted in the largest terms imaginable, or that powers and privileges usually found in mining grants are conferred without stint, or that compensation is provided in measure adequate or more than adequate to cover any damage likely to be occasioned by the exercise of those powers and privileges. Nor is it enough, in the case of a lease, that the lessee is bound to work out the minerals or to work the minerals in a prescribed manner, or, in the case of an inclosure Act or award, that the lord in whose favour the mines are reserved or regranted may be authorised to work the minerals and enjoy the property as fully and freely as if the inclosure Act had not been passed. The difficulty of applying such an hypothesis to the altered condition of things brought about by an inclosure Act has, as it seems to me, led this House to treat the provision in which it is found, and of which it would seem at first sight to be the keynote, as a dead letter for any practical purpose."

H

No limitation or alteration of these rules has been introduced by any subsequent decision. Indeed in Butterley Co. v. New Hucknall Colliery Co. (3)—where it was held that on the construction of a lease the right of support from subjacent minerals was excluded—the House of Lords expressly approved and applied the statements which I have quoted from the Butterknowle Case (1).

I

The material provisions in the 1810 Inclosure Act are those contained in the proviso dealing with the rights of the lord of the manor. Read shortly they are as follows:

> "Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed or adjudged to extinguish defeat release lessen or prejudice the right title or interest" of the lord of the manor "of in or to any mines of coal"

A and a number of specified metals, followed by the general words

> "or to any other mines ores or minerals whatsoever, or to any beds of marl and clay save and except all quarries of stone and slate and such clay as is used for making common red bricks and tile" already discovered or thereafter to be discovered in all or any of the allotments thereby B directed to be made. The proviso contains express reservation to the lord of the manor of > "full and free liberty to search for work dig win raise get carry away and dispose of" the excepted mines, ores, and minerals and also

> C "to erect any engine or engines, or other machines or buildings, and to open sink drive make and use such pits shafts soughs levels roads and ways in through upon and over" the allotments as may be thought necessary for the purposes of the reservation. Pausing here, it is to be observed that the word "under" is absent. The proviso goes on to state that the lord is to make and pay full and ample satisfaction to the allotment owners D for any damage which shall or may be thereby—by the exercise of the powers reserved to the lord—

> "occasioned to the surface of the lands so allotted."

The proviso concludes with a declaration that the lord of the manor is

> E "to have hold use exercise take and enjoy all and every the seigniories rights . . . authorities liberties privileges advantages and emoluments" belonging or incident to the manor other than and except all quarries of stone and slate and such clay as is used for making common red bricks and tile as aforesaid

> "in as full ample and beneficial a manner, to all intents and purposes as he . . . F [had theretofore] held used exercised or enjoyed or might or could have held used exercised and enjoyed in case" the general Inclosure Act and the 1810 Inclosure Act had not been made.

In the first instance I propose to consider the words of the proviso apart from any evidence as to mining methods and knowledge in or before 1810. The language is undoubtedly wide, but it is not wider than that to be found in some of the other Inclosure G Acts which have been already considered in these courts. If the test laid down in the Butterknowle Case (1) is applied—and it is assumed that there is introduced into the 1810 Act an express provision that the mines and minerals must be worked so as not to let down the surface—it seems to me that there is no difficulty in construing the Act without rejecting any part of it as being inconsistent with the provision so introduced. I consequently come to the conclusion that there is no provision in the 1810 Act on its H true construction to exclude the right of support. The question then arises whether the evidence submitted in this case has introduced by way of necessary implication an unequivocal intention to exclude the right of support. To bring about this result the evidence must be sufficient to satisfy the court that at the date of the passing of the 1810 Act it was known that the reserved mines and minerals could not be worked at all by the methods then employed in the district without letting down the surface. The I evidence falls to be considered without reference to any light which might be thrown on it by reason of modern knowledge or modern systems of working. It has been suggested in this case, as it apparently was suggested in some of the more recent cases, that it is now known that there is no method by which any coal can be worked in any part of the country so as not to cause subsidence. MAUGHAM, L.J., pointed out in the most recent case to be found in the reports (see Warwickshire Coal Co. v. Coventry Corpn. (4) ([1934] Ch. at p. 518) that such a statement requires modification and explanation and is probably only true if applied to the working of coal at a commercial profit by the means now in use and with prices and wages as they are at the present time.

I have carefully considered the evidence in the present case. It was stated in argument that the plans of the workings of coal in this district produced during the hearing were more complete than in any of the previous cases of a like nature tried in these courts. The plans show that coal was being worked in this district before 1810 by a system which is a modification of that known as "the long wall system." It is said that under the system used the surface must have invariably subsided and that persons living in the district could not have failed to see that subsidence; but the plans themselves establish that in working the system it was usual to leave support for buildings and reservoirs if necessary, and that there was no difficulty in making variations in the system of working in any case where it was necessary to leave support. I do not think the available evidence justifies a finding that it was common knowledge in the year 1810 that it was impossible to work coal in this district without letting down the surface. The evidence establishes that at this date the deepest workings of coal then known in this country were carried out on a commercial basis under systems which entailed the retention of a high percentage of coal in order to prevent surface subsidence. In my judgment the defendant company has not discharged the onus of satisfying the court that the common law right of support was excluded by necessary implication on the true construction of the 1810 Act, and I hold that the vendors to the council had in 1901 and 1914, respectively, a common law right to have the surface of the lands conveyed to the council supported by the subjacent minerals and adjacent land and minerals.

The next question that arises is: Did this common law right of support pass to the council by the conveyances of 1901 and 1914? Apart from any statutory enactment prohibiting such a result it would seem to be reasonably clear that a vendor entitled to land without the subjacent minerals, but with a right to have his land supported by the subjacent minerals and the adjacent land and minerals, is at liberty to sell his land together with that right of support. If such a vendor sells to a purchaser other than a statutory undertaker, it is clear that that purchaser gets the vendor's land, together with the right of support attached to it. Why should not the statutory undertaker get the same advantage? It is said he is precluded from doing so by reason of the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883, and by the decided cases. The provisions relied on are those to be found in ss. 18 to 27 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and s. 3 (2) of the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883. The sections are frequently referred to in cases like the present as "the code." Section 18 provides that the undertakers are not to be entitled to any mines under any land purchased by them "unless the same shall have been expressly purchased." This section has no application to the present case because the vendors to the council never had any of the minerals under the land sold by them. Sections 19, 20, and 21 provide for the making and deposit of certain maps or plans of the undertakers' works and for their inspection. Section 22 is in these terms:

> "Except where otherwise provided for by agreement between the undertakers and other parties, if the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines lying under" the waterworks "or within the prescribed distance, if any, and if no distance be prescribed, within forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give the undertakers notice in writing of his intention so to do thirty days before the commencement of working; . . ."

In that event the undertakers may, to put it shortly, prevent the working of the mines and make compensation to the mine-owners. This section was slightly amended in the case of tenants for life by the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 58 (3), and also in the case of a university or college by the Universities and College Estates Act, 1925, s. 17 (3), but neither of these amendments affect the question now before the court. Section 23 provides for the cases in which the undertakers are unwilling to make compensation. In any such case the mine-owner is enabled to work the mines,

> "by means of engines or otherwise, as if this Act and the special Act had not been passed, so that no wilful damage be done to the said works, and so that the said mines be not worked in an unusual manner; . . ."

Sections 24 to 27 deal with matters which are not material to be considered for present purposes.

Section 3 (2) of the 1883 Act—which only applies to cases where the undertakers are local authorities—provides that

> "the local authority, by or with any notice under the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, of willingness to treat for or make compensation, or of intention to prevent or interfere with the working of any mines, may specify, and define the nature and extent of support which they require to be left, and any such notice may extend to minerals beyond the distance of forty yards mentioned in the Act or to such less distance as the local authority may think fit."

The decisions with reference to "the code"—and for this purpose I include the cases under the somewhat similar provisions of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845—have settled beyond further controversy that in cases where the undertaker purchases from an owner who is entitled to land and the minerals under it, the undertaker who does not expressly purchase the minerals gets no common law right to support for his land from the minerals or from the adjacent land or the minerals under it within forty yards of the land purchased, and is relegated solely to such rights and privileges with regard to subjacent minerals and adjacent land and minerals as is conferred on him by "the code." But the common law right to support beyond the forty yards limit is left untouched. It was decided in New Moss Colliery Co. v. Manchester Corpn. (5) that an undertaker purchasing by agreement land expressly including the subjacent minerals is not affected by "the code," and that the common law right of support for the land and the subjacent minerals from the adjacent land and the minerals under it remains unimpaired. There is no actual decision covering the case where the undertaker purchases by agreement land from which the minerals have been completely severed before the purchase so that the land and the minerals are in different ownership. Of course, if, on the severance, the mineral owner became entitled to work so as to let down the surface and the owner of the land has no right of support, no question can arise, because the undertaker purchasing from the owner of the land could not by any possibility acquire from him a right of support which he himself had not got. But if, on the severance, the owner of the land obtained a common law right to support, it is difficult to appreciate why that owner should not be free to sell to the undertaker by agreement his land with that right of support, or why the undertaker should not be free to purchase it; or why—having purchased it—the undertaker should not be entitled to rely on it. It is equally difficult to understand why in such a case the mine-owner should be freed from his duty to support the land by reason of the fact that the owner of the land has, instead of keeping it or transferring it to a transferee other than a statutory undertaker, sold it to a statutory undertaker. If such be the case, the statutory undertaker is deprived of the right of support attached to the land purchased, although he has paid for such right and the mineral owner is without payment freed from a burdensome duty to his own pecuniary advantage. There is certainly no express provision in "the code" prohibiting a statutory undertaker from purchasing by agreement land with a right of support from the subjacent minerals from the owner who has such a right attached to his land as against the mineral owner, and if the statutory owner is precluded by "the code" from purchasing the common law right of support in such a case, it must be because there is some necessary implication to that effect introduced by the actual provisions of "the code." It is to be observed that s. 22, which lays down the conditions precedent to the working of the minerals by the mineral owner, is introduced by the words that is, parties other than the particular mineral owner. It seems to me that these words exclude from the operation of the section a case in which there is an agreement between the undertaker and a third party affecting the right of support, and that a purchase of land from a third party with such right of support is an agreement within the express words of this exception. In my judgment, the principles laid down in the

A New Moss Colliery Case (5) are applicable to the present case and lead to the conclusion that the council was free to purchase surface land with the right of support from the Otter trustees, and that the purchases made in 1901 and 1914 were outside the provisions of "the code."

It is said, however, that I am precluded from coming to such a conclusion by authority which is binding on me. The authority relied on is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pountney v. Clayton (6). B The question in that case arose in respect of a compulsory purchase under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The railway company had purchased surface land under the compulsory powers conferred by its special Act incorporating the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. There was no purchase of the minerals nor was any compensation paid for them. The vendor was the owner of the minerals in question, subject to a demise thereof to the defendants for a term of years. C The mine owner had reserved a right of support for the surface during the term of the lease, but there was no complete severance of the minerals from the surface because the reversion expectant on the determination of the lease remained vested in the vendor. The surface purchased by the railway company was sold as superfluous land to the plaintiff by the railway company. The minerals were worked by the defendants—the lessees—and subsidence was thereby caused. It was held that the plaintiff acquired no higher right than the railway company from which he derived D his title and had no cause of action against the lessees. It is plain that, if there had been no demise of the minerals, the railway company would have got no right of support from those minerals by reason of the purchase of the surface. It is true that the vendor had by reason of the demise a right as against the lessees to have the surface support during the term of the lease. It is equally plain that the railway company did not in express terms acquire from the vendor any right of support during the term of the lease, and it is E difficult to understand why in that case it should be said that the existence of the contractual right of support during the term of the lease should have resulted in the transfer of the complete common law right of support for all time by reason of the conveyance of the land without the subjacent minerals. On the actual facts of the case the point which has arisen for decision by me was not before the court and was not considered, with the result that, so far as the present case is concerned, the statements which are now relied F on by the defendant company are dicta. BOWEN, L.J., appears to have drawn a distinction between the right of a railway company to have surface supported where the purchase is by agreement and its right where the purchase is compulsory. After enumerating the rights of the surface owner where there are minerals under that surface, he divided surface owners into four classes. The third is the class material to the consideration of the present case, and is that in which the surface owner has the right to G support created by the document which effected the severance, in which case the extent of the right of support depends on the terms of the document and their true construction. Pausing there, the Otter trustees, who sold the surface lands to the council in the present case, fall within this class. BOWEN, L.J., proceeded to consider the case of a railway company making a purchase from the surface owner voluntarily. He says this (11 Q.B.D. at p. 340): H

> "What in that case does such a company get from the surface owner? First, they get only what he has got to give and, secondly, what he intended to give, and as to that last one must look at and construe the deed of conveyance."

He then proceeded to consider the position of each class of surface owner from that point of view, and said with regard to the third class: I

> "The surface owner in the third class is one whose right to support depends on the document, and if by virtue of it he can give the right to support he gives it to the railway company."

This dictum seems to apply to and cover the present case. He goes on to say:

> "I wish to observe that where he" [that is the surface owner] "was the lessor of the mine, and has such right to support created by the deed by which he leased the > mines, he transfers the right to support to the railway company to whom he has conveyed the surface, not because the covenant between his lessee and himself runs with the land, but because, if such was the intention of the parties, the railway company are entitled to the benefit of any covenant express or implied between the lessor and lessee."

The intention, as BOWEN, L.J., has already pointed out, depends on the construction of the conveyance. In the absence of an express assignment of the benefit of the covenant, it would be difficult to imply such an intention in the absence of any reference to the right of support on the determination of the lease. Having dealt with the position of a voluntary purchase, he proceeds to consider the case of a compulsory purchase under the Act, and decides that the surface owner who still has an interest in the minerals is still entitled to such rights as are afforded to a vendor on a compulsory sale notwithstanding the fact that he has made a partial disposition of the minerals by reason of an existing demise.

It must, further, be borne in mind that the provisions of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, differ from those of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. Section 78 of the former Act, which corresponds with s. 22 of the latter, does not contain the words to which I have already referred, namely:

> "except where otherwise provided by agreement between the undertakers and other parties";

while s. 79 of the former Act provides that the mine-owner's power to work in default of a counter notice is > "in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof, and according to the usual manner of working such mines in the district where the same shall be situate"; in other words, this section confers on the mine-owner a new power to work the minerals, and this is the only power on which he can rely. On the other hand, s. 23 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, provides that the mine-owner may work "as if this Act and the special Act had not been passed." These words seem to me to be apt not to create a new statutory power of working, but to lift the embargo imposed by s. 22 on the exercise of the right which existed apart from the Act. The restrictive words which follow:

> "so that no wilful damage be done to the said works, and so that the said mines be not worked in an unusual manner," seem to me to support this view.

The view I have ventured to express with regard to the decision in Pountney v. Clayton (6) is in accordance with that taken by CAVE, J., in Consett Waterworks Co. v. Ritson (8). It is true that in that case SMITH, J., expressed a different view of Pountney v. Clayton (6), but with the greatest possible deference to that learned judge, and with due humility, I feel bound to state my preference for the opinion and reasoning in support of it to be found in the judgment of CAVE, J.

In my judgment, and for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I think that the right of support, which the Otter trustees had by reason of the provisions of the 1810 Inclosure Act, passed to the council, and that the defendant company was not and is not entitled to ignore those rights although the council failed to give any counter notice under s. 23 of the 1847 Act.

So far I have only dealt with the position under the 1847 Act. If I am wrong in the view I have expressed as to the effect of that Act, it is, I think, well settled that there is nothing in it to affect the council's right to support from the minerals outside the forty yards area: (see Howley Park Coal and Cannel Co. v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (9). Has this position been altered in the case of statutory undertakers who, like the plaintiff council, are also local authorities by s. 3 (2) of the Public Health Act, 1875 (Support of Sewers) Amendment Act, 1883? The section is difficult to construe, but it seems to me to confer on the local authority undertaker an option to acquire or prevent the working of minerals beyond the forty yards area. The words of the section are A in form permissive, and there is nothing in the section depriving the local authority of such right as it may have outside the forty yards area if the option is not exercised; and for this reason I think the council's right to support remains unaffected outside that area because it did not in fact exercise the option.

Having regard to the answers given by me to the first and second questions, the third and fourth questions propounded by me do not arise, and I do not propose to consider B them.

The fifth question is: Is the council entitled to any relief in view of the answers given to the first and second questions? In my judgment, the council is entitled to a declaration that the defendant company is not, in the events that have happened, entitled to work the Parkgate seam or any other minerals under the waterworks or under the adjacent land, whether within or beyond the forty yards area, in any manner so as to C interfere with the council's common law right of support for their land in its natural state. Having regard to the evidence that the possibility of future damage is remote, I do not think it is necessary to grant any injunction at the present time. The order I propose to make will reserve liberty to the council to apply for an injunction, if so advised.

During the argument a question arose as to the meaning of the words in s. 23 of the D Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, conferring on the mineral owner the right to work the minerals in the events there stated "so that no wilful damage be done to the said works." On the primâ facie meaning of these words, it would seem to prohibit the mineral owner from working the minerals, even though the statutory undertaker has not expressed its willingness to make compensation to the mineral owner if the mineral owner knows that the inevitable consequence of his working must result in damage E to the undertaking. It is not necessary to decide this question at the present moment, and I only refer to it to call attention to the fact that such a question may hereafter arise.

There will be an inquiry as to the damages sustained by the council by reason of the defendant company's mining operations, and I order the defendant company to pay the costs of the action up to and including the date of this order. The costs of the inquiry F will be reserved, and there will be general liberty to apply.

Canada—Dominion legislation—Right to enact law repugnant to English law and having extra-territorial operation—Statute of Westminster (22 & 23 Geo. 5, c. 4), s. 2 (2), s. 3.

Statute—Construction—Act giving Dominion legislature power to legislate for peace, order, and good government.

The Judicial Committee Act, 1833, recites that " from the decisions of . . . courts . . . in the . . . Dominions . . . an appeal lies to His Majesty in Council."

By s. 2 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, any colonial law which was repugnant to the provisions of an Act of the Imperial Parliament was to be void and inoperative to the extent of such repugnancy.

By s. 2 (1) of the Statute of Westminster, 1931: " the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this Act [Dec. 11, 1931] by the Parliament of a Dominion." By s. 2 (2): " No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any . . . Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom . . . and the powers of the Parliament of a Dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such Act . . . in so far as the same is part of the law of the Dominion." By s. 3: " . . . the Parliament of a Dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation."

By s. 17 of the Criminal Code Amendment Act of Canada, 1933: " Notwithstanding any Royal prerogative or anything contained in the Interpretation Act, or in the Supreme Court Act, no appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or order of any court in Canada to any Court of Appeal or authority by which in the United Kingdom appeals or petitions to his Majesty in Council may be heard."

Held: the limitations on the legislative powers of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada imposed by the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and by the doctrine which forbids extra-territorial legislation by a Dominion Parliament were abrogated by the provisions of the Statute of Westminster; section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, invested the Dominion Parliament with power to prohibit an appeal from a court within the Dominion to the Sovereign in Council; and, therefore, the provisions of the Canadian Act of 1933 were valid, and a petition for special leave to appeal from an order of a provincial appeal court in a criminal matter was barred.

Per curiam: A statute giving a Dominion or colony legislative power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion or colony must be given that construction which is most beneficial to the widest possible amplitude of those powers.

Preliminary objection on a petition for special leave to appeal by the British Coal Corporation and four other coal importing companies from an order of the Court of King's Bench (Appeal Side) of the province of Quebec, dismissing the appeal of the petitioners from a conviction before the King's Bench (Crown Side), on a charge of combining to restrict the coal industry when the petitioners were fined $30,000.

The constitutional question raised by the preliminary objection was whether s. 17 of the Criminal Code Amendment Act of Canada, 1933, took away the right of appeal to His Majesty in Council in criminal matters.

June 6. LORD SANKEY, L.C.—This is a petition for special leave to appeal from a judgment of the Court of King's Bench (Appeal Side) of the province of Quebec, delivered on Oct. 5, 1934. The petitioners had been convicted on Dec. 12, 1933, under s. 498 of the Canadian Criminal Code and under ss. 2 and 32 of the Combines Investigation Act, 1923, before the Court of King's Bench (Crown Side) and had been subjected to fines totalling $30,000, but the more serious effect to the petitioners of the conviction was that their business operations in the import of British anthracite coal were held to be illegal. The conviction was upheld by the judgment of the Appeal Court.

Before their Lordships proceeded to consider questions appertaining to the merits of the petition, they decided in the first instance to determine a preliminary objection, which was that the petition was incompetent by reason of the provisions of s. 17 of the Canadian Statute 23 & 24 Geo. 5, c. 53 (an Act to amend the Criminal Code) which was in the following terms:

> S. 10 (4) of the said Act (the Criminal Code) is repealed and is hereby re-enacted as follows. . . . "(4) Notwithstanding any royal prerogative or anything contained in the Interpretation Act or in the Supreme Court Act, no appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or order of any court in Canada to any Court of Appeal or authority in which in the United Kingdom appeals or petitions to His Majesty may be heard."

It is clear that, if this enactment is valid, the petition is barred. It is, however, contended on behalf of the petitioners that the section is invalid.

A section in identical terms had been held invalid by the Judicial Committee in Nadan v. R. (the A.-G. of England and the A.-G. of Canada interveners) (1), and that decision was founded upon in these proceedings by the petitioners, who contended on various grounds that the enactment of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, had not affected the position which the decision just cited had established. On behalf of the respondent it was argued that the Statute of Westminster, 1931 (which will be referred to here as "the statute"), had removed certain fetters which, according to that decision, had till then affected the legislative competence of Canada in the relevant respects, and that, these fetters being removed, the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, had full effect to invest the Parliament of Canada with power to enact the section in question.

It will be convenient to summarise in the briefest terms the nature of the appeal from Dominion or colonial courts to His Majesty in Council. The position of this board, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in relation to such appeals may first be indicated. The Judicial Committee is a statutory body established in 1833 by an Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 41, entitled an Act for the better Administration of Justice in His Majesty's Privy Council. It contains (inter alia) the following recital:

> "and whereas from the decisions of various courts of judicature in the East Indies, and in the plantations, colonies, and other dominions of His Majesty abroad, an appeal lies to His Majesty in Council."

The Act then provides for the formation of a committee of His Majesty's Privy Council, to be styled the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and enacts [s. 3] that

> "all appeals or complaints in the nature of appeals whatever, which, either by virtue of this Act or of any law, statute, or custom, may be brought before . . . His Majesty in Council" from the order of any court or judge should thereafter be referred by His Majesty to, and heard by, the Judicial Committee, as established by the Act, who should make a report or recommendation to His Majesty in Council for his decision thereon, the nature of such report or recommendation being always stated in open court. The Act contained a great number of provisions for the conduct of appeals. It is clear that the committee is regarded in the Act as a judicial body or court, though all it can do is to report or recommend to His Majesty in Council, by whom alone the Order in Council which is made to give effect to the report of the committee is made. But according to constitutional convention it is unknown and unthinkable that His Majesty in Council should not give effect to the report of the Judicial Committee, who are thus, in truth, an appellate court of law, to which by the statute of 1833 all appeals within their purview are referred.

A later Act, the Judicial Committee Act, 1844, must next be mentioned. Apart from certain changes in procedure, the main effect of that Act was to authorise Her Majesty to provide, by Order or Orders in Council made for that purpose, for the admission of any appeals to Her Majesty in Council from judgments or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad even though such court might not be a court of error: this followed a recital that by the laws in force in certain of Her Majesty's colonies no appeal could be brought save only from courts of error or of appeal and that it was expedient to provide that Her Majesty in Council should be authorised to admit such appeals. In effect, therefore, Her Majesty in Council was thus empowered to override a colonial law limiting or excluding appeals to Her Majesty in Council from any colonial court.

In this way the functions of the Judicial Committee as a court of law were established. The practice had grown up that the colonies under the authority either of Orders in Council or of Acts of Parliament should provide for appeals as of right from their courts to the King in Council and should fix the conditions on which such appeals should be permitted. But outside these limits there had always been reserved a discretion to the King in Council to grant special leave to appeal from a colonial court irrespective of the limitations fixed by the colonial law: this discretion to grant special leave to appeal was in practice described as the prerogative right: it was, indeed, a residuum of the royal prerogative of the Sovereign as the fountain of justice. In early days it was to the King that any subject who had failed to get justice in the King's court brought his petition for redress. As time went on, such petitions were brought to the King in Parliament (which was the origin of the modern judicial functions of the House of Lords) or to the King in his chancery (from which flowed the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery). But this was so only in causes which had been dealt with in English courts: from the courts of the Channel Islands and later from the courts of the plantations or colonies the petition went to the King in Council, and this continued to be the practice after the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in English common law cases had been abolished. It was this appellate jurisdiction (along with other jurisdictions such as in Admiralty or Ecclesiastical Causes) which was affirmed and regulated by Parliament in the Privy Council Acts of 1833 and 1844. Although in form the appeal was still to the King in Council, it was so in form only and became in truth an appeal to the Judicial Committee which as such exercised as a court of law in reality, though not in name, the residual prerogative of the King in Council. No doubt, it was the order of the King in Council which gave effect to their reports, but that order was in no sense other than in form either the King's personal order or the order of the general body of the Privy Council.

In 1865 the Colonial Laws Validity Act was passed. It was described as an Act to remove doubts as to the validity of colonial laws. For this context it is enough to say that it was an Act which declared that a colonial law should be deemed to be and to have been void to the extent that it was repugnant to any Act of the Imperial Parliament extending to the colony or any order or regulation made under such Act.

In 1867 the British North America Act was passed. It was an Act to provide for the establishment in Canada of one Dominion and for the legislative authority in the Dominion and to declare the nature of the executive government therein. It was declared that the executive government of and over Canada should be vested in the Queen, and that there should be a council (the Queen's Privy Council in Canada) to aid and advise in the government of Canada. The legislative power was vested in the Parliament for Canada, which by s. 91 was to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned by s. 92 exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. Without restricting the generality of that provision, certain matters were specifically enumerated as falling within the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada: of these it is sufficient here to mention No. 27, which was:

> "The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters."

On the other hand, among the matters assigned by s. 92 exclusively to the provincial authority there fell No. 14:

> "The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organisation of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts."

By s. 101 of the Act it was provided:

> "The Parliament of Canada may notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organisation of a general court of appeal for Canada and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada."

Under the last-mentioned section the Parliament of Canada by an Act of 1875 established (along with the Exchequer Court) "The Supreme Court of Canada" which was to exercise an appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction within and throughout the Dominion of Canada: it was provided by s. 47 that

> "the judgment of the Supreme Court should be in all cases final and conclusive. . . . Saving any right which Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal Prerogative."

In 1880 in Cushing v. Dupuy (2) which was an appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench for Quebec, the Judicial Committee had to consider the effect of a Dominion Act dealing with insolvency, which contained a clause providing that

> "the judgment of the court to which under this section the appeal can be made shall be final."

That court in the case in question was the Court of Queen's Bench for Quebec. The Judicial Committee decided that as the Act in question

> "contains no words which purport to derogate from the prerogative of the Queen to allow as an act of grace appeals from the Court of Queen's Bench in matters of insolvency, her authority in that respect is unaffected by it."

But they added that they did not consider it necessary "to consider what powers may be possessed by the Parliament of Canada to interfere with the royal prerogative."

In 1888 a section identical in terms with the section now in question was enacted as s. 1025 of the Criminal Code of Canada. Between that year and 1926 appeals came before the board in which the question of the validity of that section might have been raised, but was not, or, if it was raised, was not the subject of decision. To take one instance, in A.-G. for Ontario v. Reciprocal Insurers (A.-G. for Canada intervener) (3) ([1924] A.C. at p. 348) the Judicial Committee said that their order > "involved no decision as to the power of the Parliament of Canada to enact s. 1025 of the Criminal Code."

But in 1926 in Nadan v. R. (the A.-G. of England and the A.-G. of Canada interveners) (1), a decision was for the first time given on the question whether the section was valid. It was held that the section was ultra vires and invalid. It is essential, however, to determine the ratio decidendi on which this judgment was based. The ratio decidendi is, in their Lordships' opinion, to be found in a comparatively short passage which follows a citation of the Privy Council Acts of 1833 and 1844, and which is of so vital an import that it must be here quoted in full ([1926] A.C. at p. 492):

> "Under what authority, then, can a right so established and confirmed be abrogated by the Parliament of Canada? The British North America Act, by s. 91, empowered the Dominion Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the classes of subjects by that Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and in particular it gave to the Canadian Parliament exclusive legislative authority in respect of 'the criminal law, except the constitution of Courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.' But however widely these powers are construed they are confined to action to be taken in the Dominion; and they do not appear to their Lordships to authorise the Dominion Parliament to annul the prerogative right of the King in Council to grant special leave to appeal. Further, by s. 2 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, it is enacted that 'any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the Colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under the authority of such Act of Parliament or having in the Colony the force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order or regulation, and shall to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative,' In their Lordships' opinion s. 1025 of the Canadian Criminal Code, if and so far as it is intended to prevent the Sovereign in Council from giving effective leave to appeal against an order of a Canadian Court, is repugnant to the Acts of 1833 and 1844 which have been cited, and is therefore void and inoperative by virtue of the Act of 1865. It is true that the Code has received the royal assent, but that assent cannot give validity to an enactment which is void by Imperial statute. If the prerogative is to be excluded, this must be accomplished by an Imperial statute; and in fact the modifications which were deemed necessary in respect of Australia > and South Africa were effected in that way: (see Commonwealth of Australia Act, 1900, s. 74, and Union of South Africa Act, 1909, s. 106)." A

The judgment then goes on to review a number of authorities, and thus concludes ([1926] A.C. at p. 495):

> "Upon a review of these authorities, it appears to their Lordships that they contain nothing inconsistent with the conclusion which their lordships have reached upon principle, and that, so far as they go, they support that conclusion." B

On a careful consideration of the judgment of the Board in Nadan's Case (1), their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment was based on two grounds only: (i) that s. 1025 was repugnant to the Privy Council Acts of 1833 and 1844 and was, therefore, void under the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865; (ii) that it could only be effective if construed as having an extra-territorial operation, whereas, according to the law as it was in 1926, a Dominion statute could not have extra-territorial operation. These two difficulties as the law then stood could only be overcome by an Imperial statute: the Australian and South African Acts were cited as illustrations of Imperial statutes containing clauses apt to define or limit this prerogative. Such, their Lordships think, is the meaning of the decision in Nadan's Case (1); they do not find in it any clear or precise determination of what, if these two fundamental difficulties had been removed, would have been held to have been the true effect of the Act, nor can their Lordships say how, apart from these objections, the Judicial Committee would have decided the issue whether or not the Act had given the Canadian Legislature power to enact s. 1025. C D

Their Lordships have now to decide that very same question, and to decide it, as they conceive, without any direct help or guidance from earlier decisions of the Judicial Committee, now that the statute has removed the two difficulties which were decisive in Nadan's Case (1). The relevant sections of the Statute of Westminster which have this effect are as follows: E

> "2. (1) The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion.
>
> "(2) No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule or regulation made under any such Act, and the powers of the Parliament of a Dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such Act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the Dominion. F
>
> "3. It is hereby declared and enacted that the Parliament of a Dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation. G
>
> "7. (1) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.
>
> "(2) The provisions of s. 2 of this Act shall extend to the laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces. H
> "(3) The powers conferred by this Act upon the Parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the provinces respectively."

What is the extent of the legislative competence in the relevant regard conferred on the Canadian Parliament, putting out of question the limitations which are now removed, must be ascertained from the words of the constituent Act [the British North America Act, 1867]. In construing the words of that Act, it must be remembered what the nature and scope of the Act are. They are indicated in the words used by LORD LOREBURN, L.C. in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in A.-G. for Province of Ontario v. A.-G. for Canada (4) ([1912] A.C. at p. 581): I

> "In 1867 the desire of Canada for a definite constitution embracing the entire > Dominion was embodied in the British North America Act. Now, there can be no doubt that under this organic instrument the powers distributed between the Dominion on the one hand and the provinces on the other hand cover the whole area of self-government within the whole area of Canada. It would be subversive of the entire scheme and policy of the Act to assume that any point of internal self-government was withheld from Canada."

The same principle was recognised in the following language used in Hodge v. R. (5) (9 App. Cas. at p. 132) in respect of the powers of provincial legislatures:

> "When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in s. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by s. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect."

The same language can properly be used in regard to the Dominion Parliament, to which, indeed, the passage just quoted was applied in A.-G. for Canada v. Cain, Same v. Gilhula (Consolidated Appeals) (6). That was a case in which it was held that the power to make laws for the peace, order and good government were wide enough to enable the Dominion Parliament to pass a statute vesting in the Dominion executive the prerogative power to expel and deport aliens. Indeed, in interpreting a constituent or organic statute such as the Act, that construction most beneficial to the widest possible amplitude of its powers must be adopted. This principle has been again clearly laid down by the Judicial Committee in Edwards v. A.-G. for Canada (7) ([1930] A.C. at p. 136):

> "Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board—it is certainly not their desire—to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation so that the Dominion to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house, as the provinces to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs. 'The Privy Council, indeed, has laid down that courts of law must treat the provisions of the British North America Act by the same methods of construction and exposition which they apply to other statutes. But there are statutes and statutes; and the strict construction deemed proper in the case, for example, of a penal or taxing statute or one passed to regulate the affairs of an English parish, would be often subversive of Parliament's real intent if applied to an Act passed to ensure the peace, order and good government of a British colony': see CLEMENT'S CANADIAN CONSTITUTION, (3rd ed.,) p. 347."

No doubt, the principle is clearly established that the King's prerogative cannot be restricted or qualified save by express words or by necessary intendment. In connection with Dominion or colonial matters that principle involves that, if the limitation of the prerogative is by a Dominion or colonial Act, not only must that Act itself deal with the prerogative either by express terms, or by necessary intendment, but it must be the Act of a Dominion or colonial legislature which has been endowed with the requisite power by an Imperial Act likewise giving the power either by express terms or by necessary intendment. In the matter now in question it is beyond question that s. 17 of the Canadian Act [of 1933] is expressed in precise terms. The next question is whether s. 91 of the Act invests the Dominion Parliament, in cases within its jurisdiction, with the power to regulate or prohibit the appeal to the King in Council. Their Lordships are of opinion that the Act does invest the Dominion Parliament with these powers. It does not, indeed, do so by express terms, but it does so by necessary intendment. Section 91 of the Act, read along with the rest of the Act, is according to its true construction, in their Lordship's opinion, apart from the limitations already referred to, intended to make and is apt to make the Dominion legislature supreme and endow it with the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, within the assigned limits of subject and area, just as it was said in Hodge v. R. (5) that s. 92 of the Act had that effect in regard to the provincial legislatures. It is true that before the Statute of Westminster the Dominion legislature was subject to the limitations imposed by the Colonial Laws Validity Act, and by s. 129 of the Act, and also by the principle or rule that its powers were limited by the doctrine forbidding extra-territorial legislation, though that is a doctrine of somewhat obscure extent. But these limitations have now been abrogated by the statute. There now remain only such limitations as flow from the Act itself, the operation of which as affecting the competence of Dominion legislation was saved by s. 7 of the statute, a section which excludes from the competence of the Dominion and provincial Parliaments any power of "repeal, amendment, or alteration" of the British North America Acts. But it is well known that s. 7 was inserted at the request of Canada and for reasons which are familiar. It is doubtless true that the power of the Imperial Parliament to pass on its own initiative any legislation that it thought fit extending to Canada remains in theory unimpaired; indeed, the Imperial Parliament could, as a matter of abstract law, repeal or disregard s. 4 of the statute. But that is theory and has no relation to realities. In truth, Canada is in enjoyment of the full scope of self-government; its legislature was invested with all necessary powers for that purpose by the Act, and what the statute did was to remove the two fetters which have already been discussed.

Among the powers which go to constitute self-government there are necessarily included powers to constitute the law courts and to regulate their procedure and to appoint their judges; save for the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, these powers in regard to the then newly constituted Dominion would have all belonged to the King as the fountain of justice; but by the Act these powers are vested in the Dominion legislature, and thus pro tanto the prerogative is merged in the statutory powers. A most essential part of the administration of justice consists of the system of appeals. It is not doubted that with the single exception of what is called the prerogative appeal, that is, the appeal by special leave given in the Privy Council in London, matters of appeal from Canadian courts are within the legislative control of Canada, that is, of the Dominion or the provinces as the case may be. Even conditions of the appeal "as of right" to the Privy Council, have been dealt with by the Parliaments of Quebec and Ontario, acting under the powers vested in them under the Constitutional Act, 1791.

It may now be considered whether there is since the Statute of Westminster any sufficient reason why this matter of the special or prerogative appeal to the King in Council should be treated, as, according to the contentions on behalf of the petitioners, it should be treated, as being something quite special and as being a matter standing, as it were on a pedestal by itself. Ought it not to be treated as simply one element in the general system of appeals in the Dominion? The appeal, if special leave is granted, is from the decision of a Canadian court, and is to secure a reversal or alteration of an order of a Canadian court; if it is successful, its effect will be that the order of the Canadian court will be reformed accordingly. Rights in Canada and law in Canada will thus be affected. The appellant and respondent in any such appeal must be either Canadian citizens or persons who have submitted to the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts. Such appeals seem to be essentially matters of Canadian concern and the regulation and control of such appeals would thus seem to be a prime element in Canadian sovereignty as appertaining to matters of justice. But it is said that this class of appeal is a matter external to Canada; emphasis is laid particularly on the fact that the Privy Council sits in London, and that in form the appeal by special leave is not to the Judicial Committee as a court of law, but to the King in Council exercising a prerogative right outside and apart from any statute. As already explained this latter proposition is true only in form, not in substance. But even so the reception and the hearing of the appeal in London is only one step in a composite procedure which starts from the Canadian court and which concludes and reaches its consummation in the Canadian court. What takes place outside Canada is only ancillary to practical results which become effective in Canada. And the appeal to the King in Council is an appeal to an Imperial, not a merely British, tribunal.

Their Lordships can see no valid reason since the Statute why the power to regulate or prohibit this type of appeal should not be held to be vested in the Dominion Parliament by the Act, with the consequence that it was validly exercised by the impugned section of the Act to amend the Criminal Code. Their Lordships do not construe the decision in Nadan's Case (1) as involving the negation of that general power: the view there stated that the prerogative power to admit appeals could only be abrogated by an imperial statute was, in their Lordships' opinion, based on the special grounds that it would affect matters not confined locally to Canada and would contravene an Imperial Act. Before 1867, it had been held in Cuvillier v. Aylwin (8) that the Constitution Act of 1791 had conferred power on the Canadian legislature to take away the prerogative right of appeal: that decision was indeed, criticised in Re Louis Marois (9), but the ground of actual criticism, or, perhaps, dissent, was not based on the general limits of power of the Canadian legislature, but on the view that the relevant enactment of that legislature was not sufficiently express in its terms. After 1867 the same ground for denying the validity of the enactment there in question was taken in Cushing v. Dupuy (2) as already explained.

It was further contended on behalf of the petitioners that if the Imperial Parliament desired to regulate in a constitutional enactment the prerogative right of petitioning for leave to appeal to the King in Council, an entirely different method of dealing with the problem was adopted, as was done in s. 74 of the Commonwealth of Australia Act, 1900, and in the South African Act. It is difficult to see how light can be thrown on the construction of the Act of 1867 by comparing with it an entirely different Act of 1900. But in any case the contrary argument may be drawn from the Commonwealth Act: the truer view may well be that the express limitation inserted in the Act of 1900 was so inserted because the general powers conferred on the Commonwealth by that Act would have included the abrogation of the prerogative appeal if the specific limitation had not been expressed. But it is to be noted also that the Commonwealth was invested with power to alter or amend the provisions of the Commonwealth Act relating to the prerogative appeals. A similar power is given in the South African Constitution. In the report of the Imperial Conference, 1926, at p. 19, it is stated that > "it was no part of the policy of His Majesty's government in Great Britain that questions affecting judicial appeals (i.e., to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) should be determined otherwise than in accordance with the wishes of the part of the Empire primarily affected."

Their Lordships have in this judgment been dealing only with the legal position in Canada in regard to this type of appeal in criminal matters. It is here neither necessary nor desirable to touch on the position as regards civil cases.

For all these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the petition should be dismissed. As they are of this opinion on the sole ground that the petition is barred by s. 17 of the amended Criminal Code, it is not necessary to discuss the merits of the petition.

In the result their Lordships, being of opinion that the petition should be dismissed, will humbly so advise His Majesty.

Petition dismissed.

OFFER v. MINISTER OF HEALTH

[COURT OF APPEAL (Greer, Slesser and Roche, L.JJ.), June 24, 1935]

Housing—Clearance order—Validity—Ex parte advice given by Ministry to local authority before order made—Housing Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 14), s. 117—Housing Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 39) ss. 1, 11 (3), Sched. I., para. 4.

A clearance order having been made by a local authority, objection was taken by the applicants, who were the owners of certain houses in the area in question. The Minister of Health caused a public local inquiry to be held, and at that inquiry it was elicited that, without giving notice to the applicants, a visit of inspection to the area had been made by an official of the Ministry, and that during that visit advice was given by the official to representatives of the local authority, the effect of which was to encourage the local authority to declare the area a clearance area. Subsequently, the Minister confirmed the order.

Held: while the Minister, in considering objections to a clearance order made at a public inquiry and deciding whether or not to confirm the order, was performing a quasi-judicial function and must not consider any ex parte statements, the inspection made by the official in the present case in no way bound a person who might hold a subsequent inquiry, nor the Minister in considering the order, and, in those circumstances and in view of the provisions of s. 117 of the Housing Act, 1925, there was no ground on which the order should be quashed.

Notes. The Housing Act, 1925, was repealed by the Housing Act, 1936, but s. 117 was re-enacted by s. 179 of the later Act. Section 11 (3) of the Housing Act, 1930, has been re-enacted by the Housing Act, 1936, Sched. II, para. 2. The powers and duties of the Minister of Health relating to housing have been transferred to the Minister of Housing and Local Government.

Appeal from an order of SWIFT, J., made upon an application by H. J. Offer and his wife under s. 11, (3), of the Housing Act, 1930, for an order to quash a clearance order made by the Kingston-upon-Thames Corporation.

The facts as set out in the judgment of SWIFT, J., were these: "Mr. and Mrs. Offer owned a number of dwelling-houses which were included in the Kingston-upon-Thames (Canbury Passage, Area A) Clearance Order, 1934, and having received notice of the making of the order they objected in the manner prescribed by the Housing Act, 1930, to the Minister of Health. The Minister caused a public local inquiry to be held by Mr. A. R. Dent, one of his inspectors, at which inquiry objectors were given an opportunity of presenting their cases in opposition to the making of the order. Mr. Offer and his wife were represented at that inquiry by counsel. It was elicited by counsel on their behalf from Mr. Perry, the chief sanitary inspector of the corporation, that before the area was officially declared a clearance area Mr. Collin, the senior housing inspector of the Ministry, had visited the area and inspected it along with Mr. Perry. Although Mr. Perry would not go the whole length, I think, probably, the suggestion was right that the effect of what Mr. Collin said at the inspection encouraged the corporation to declare the area a clearance area. What the inspector said, according to Mr. Perry's recollection, was that the houses appeared to him to be houses which the corporation could deal with under the Housing Act, 1930. Upon that counsel for the present applicants intimated to the inspector that he proposed to take exception to this preliminary visit of inspection by Mr. Collin, of which his clients had had no notice, and at which they had had no opportunity of being present."

In giving judgment, Swift, J., said: "This case has been presented to me by Mr. Hill, who contended that the Minister, acting through his officials, is at all times a judicial or quasi-judicial authority, or, if he was not even before objection a quasi-judicial authority, still by his conduct before objection was made he had put it out of his power to act impartially when the objection had to be heard and determined. I cannot distinguish the position of the Minister in the Birkenhead (Cambridge Place) Clearance Order Case (1) from the position of the Minister in the Kingston-upon-Thames (Canbury Passage, Area A) Clearance Order Case. It is not necessary for me to repeat what I said in the Birkenhead Case (1) I propose to follow it, and if this case goes to the Court of Appeal, then the reasons which I gave in the Birkenhead Case (1) can be examined and criticised as though I had given them in this case. In my view, the Minister here was doing his bounden duty under the Act in advising local authorities as to the scope and operation of the Act, and the steps which they could or might take under it, and I see no reason for thinking that he has done anything which is in the least degree wrong or which invalidates his order. This application must be dismissed." The applicants appealed.

H. A. Hill for the applicants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Donald Somervell, K.C.) and H. L. Parker for the Minister were not called upon to argue.

GREER, L.J.—This is an appeal by the owner of certain property in Kingston-upon-Thames, which has been included in a clearance order. Under the Housing Act, 1930, a clearance order was made by the local authority in reference to an area which is called the Canbury Passage, Area A. After the clearance order was made objections were taken to the order in accordance with the statutory provisions. It then became the duty of the Minister of Health to cause a public inquiry to be held in order that the objections of the objectors might be considered by the inspector who held the inquiry, and that a report should be made by him to the Minister before the Minister decided whether the order should or should not be confirmed. In a case of that sort the order has no effect after there has been a public inquiry until the Minister has considered the result of the inquiry into the objections which have been made and the report of the inspector whom the Minister has caused to hold the inquiry.

In these circumstances I have not the slightest doubt that the Minister, when he comes finally to deal with the subject-matter, is acting in a semi-judicial capacity, and that, once the objections have been heard and the report has been made, he is not entitled—as we held in Errington v. Minister of Health (2)—to hear one side in the absence of the other, namely, either to hear the local authority in the absence of the property-owning objector, or to hear the property-owning objector in the absence of the local authority. He must, in giving his final decision, act judicially, but by the statute power is expressly given to the Minister to deal with matters of this kind and he has a general jurisdiction to exercise his powers for the purpose of maintaining the good health of the inhabitants of this country. Under s. 117 of the Housing Act, 1925, which has to be read as one with and as part of the Housing Act, 1930, he has these powers:

> "If it appears to the Minister that owing to density of population, or any other reason, it is expedient to inquire into the circumstances of any area with a view to determining whether any powers under this Act should be put into force in that area or not, the Minister may require the local authority to make a report to him containing such particulars as to the population of the district and other matters as he may direct, and the local authority shall comply with the requirement of the Minister, and any expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid as expenses incurred in the execution of such part of this Act as the Minister may determine."

Surely that is not confined merely to asking for a report without, first of all, making some investigation whether it is a proper case for a report or not, or making an investigation after the report has been made in order to see whether or not further action should be taken? To my mind, Parliament intended that these semi-official duties should be conferred on a Minister who naturally will have some knowledge of the matter before he begins his semi-judicial inquiry, and will possibly have had communications before what I have called the lis is joined between the objecting property owners and the local authority, and have had some knowledge and given some opinion about it.

All that was done here is stated in Mr. Collin's affidavit, which has been read by counsel for the applicants. It is this. Before there was any knowledge whether there would be any objection by any property owner at all, and before any step had been taken to put the Act into force with regard to any area in Kingston, one of the Minister's inspectors was asked by the representatives of the corporation of Kingston-upon-Thames with regard to their 1933 five-year slum clearance scheme. A circular was sent out by the Minister on April 6, 1933, in which he stated that he was prepared to place the services of his staff at the disposal of local authorities who found any difficulty, technical or otherwise, in preparing their programmes. Then Mr. Collin goes on in his affidavit to say:

> "I declined to give any advice as I was not sufficiently acquainted with the conditions in the borough."

At that time there could not be any complaint, and was not, about what was done by the inspector on this occasion. The affidavit continues:

> "I cannot remember exactly what was said by me at the meeting of Sept. 11, 1933, but I probably indicated in a general way the matters which the council should consider before they decided upon any course of action."

He then inspected the district with the sanitary inspector, Mr. Perry and he says:

> "As a result of this inspection I informed Mr. Perry that on the information then before me the properties which I had seen appeared, primâ facie, to be the class of property which other local authorities were including in clearance orders."

I cannot conceive what objection can be taken to the making of that statement to the corporation by the inspector. It did not in any way bind either Mr. Perry or any other person who might hold the inquiry, or the Minister of Health, to any opinion upon the question which might ultimately have to be determined whether certain objections, if made by the owners, ought to be given effect to and the scheme, therefore, refused confirmation. It was in no way inconsistent with the duty which the Minister would have to perform when he came to exercise his powers of saying whether he would or would not confirm the order made by the local authority. I cannot conceive, therefore, the slightest ground for saying that what had been done in any way prejudiced the decision which was finally made by the Minister of Health on the report of the inspector and after full consideration of the objections which had been made.

It seems to me that the applicants have no ground for complaint against the order which was made. There is no ground for saying that the order was one which ought to be quashed because it was made in a semi-judicial inquiry by a tribunal which had acted contrary to natural justice. I see no reason whatever to suppose that the order was made in any such circumstances, or that anything improper was done from beginning to end. I agree, although, perhaps, not for entirely the same reasons, with the decision of the learned judge. I see nothing in the decision in this case at all inconsistent or contrary to the decision in Errington v. Minister of Health (2). That case depended on different facts and upon the action of the Minister, who, after a public inquiry had been held, held a private inquiry to which the property owners were not invited and took into consideration ex parte statements with which the owners had had no opportunity of dealing.

For these reasons I think that the judgment was quite right, and the appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

SLESSER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The problem which has been raised in this case by counsel for the applicants is one which has arisen in many cases where public authorities are entrusted both with executive and with quasi-judicial functions. The principles on which such public authorities have to proceed have been laid down with great clarity by the House of Lords in the leading case of Local Government Board v. Arlidge (3), following a decision of the House of Lords in Board of Education v. Rice (4). Lord Haldane, in his speech in Local Government Board v. Arlidge (3), points out that although the tribunal must act in accordance with natural justice, yet the actual limits of its obligations must be considered in respect of the other obligations imposed on it by statute. Lord Haldane said ([1915] A. C. at p. 132):

> "The decision must be come to in the spirit and with the sense of responsibility of a tribunal whose duty it is to mete out justice. But it does not follow that the procedure of every such tribunal must be the same. In the case of a court of law tradition in this country has prescribed certain principles to which, in the main, the procedure must conform. But what that procedure is to be in detail must depend on the nature of the tribunal. In modern times it has become increasingly common for Parliament to give an appeal in matters which really pertain to administration rather than to the exercise of the judicial functions of an ordinary court, to authorities whose functions are administrative and not in the ordinary sense judicial."

What is complained of in this case—and this is the ground for impeaching this order under s. 11 (3), of the Housing Act, 1930—is that the body which had in its quasi-official function to consider whether an order should be confirmed or not, had previously given advice on the matter, or some part of the matter, upon which it had to determine, and that, therefore, it did not arrive at the determination under the Act with an open mind. Applying the test which Lord Haldane, in Arlidge's Case (3), tells us to apply, though the problem there was different, we come to this result, that the Housing Act, 1930, and the Housing Act, 1925, both give to the Minister of Health the very right which is here complained of—that is to say, the right to give the advice to local authorities and to make inquiries.

My Lord has referred to s. 117 of the Act of 1925, which is to be read together with the Act of 1930, and which in terms says:

> "If it appears to the Minister that owing to the density of population, or any other reason, it is expedient to inquire into the circumstances of any area with a view to determining whether any powers under this Act should be put into force in that area or not, the Minister may require the local authority to make a report to him."

Our attention has been drawn to other consequential provisions in the Act of 1930, which make it clear beyond question that the Minister is acting fully within his rights in proffering or giving advice to local authorities. If the Minister has that right to give that advice, and also has the duty imposed on him under s. 2 of the Housing Act, 1930, of confirming orders, it follows that he must or may carry out both these obligations, and they cannot be said to be contrary to one another when the legislature has in fact given him the power both to do the one and to do the other—namely, first give the advice, and, secondly, consider quasi-judicially the confirmation of the order. Such a provision does not seem to me to be a very startling one.

Here we are dealing with legislation conferring rights and obligations, but a very similar problem long ago arose in a case where the parties to a contract had agreed that the person who had to perform certain duties as between the parties should also act as their arbitrator—such as in the case of an engineer, in building and similar contracts, as was pointed out by Bowen, L.J., in Jackson v. Barry Rail. Co. (5), which is the leading case on that class of authority, where the parties had agreed that the engineer who knew all the facts and had authority, and was to act in that capacity, none the less was to be the arbitrator.

Although we have not an agreement but an obligation or right imposed by the legislature, the result, to my mind, between the parties is precisely the same, and to say that the Minister's order is invalid because he is doing the very thing which the Act authorises him to carry out appears to me, with every respect to counsel for the applicants, to be unarguable. I agree with my Lord that there is no relation at all between this case and Errington v. Minister of Health (2), which lays down that the Minister must act, when he has to perform quasi-judicial functions, in a quasi-judicial manner.

ROCHE, L. J.—But for the earnest argument of counsel for the applicants I should have thought this case was difficult to argue. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by the Lords Justices who have given judgment.

I only desire to add a few words with regard to the case of Errington v. Minister of Health (2). I have nothing to add or to take away from what I said in that case. With regard to the distinction between that case and the present case I have nothing to add to that which Swift, J., said in his judgment in Re Birkenhead (Cambridge Place) Clearance Order, 1934, Ex parte Frost (1), to which he referred in his judgment in this case. I am not referring to the earlier remarks of the learned judge where, with a humility that I cannot help thinking was undue, he professes an inability to understand Errington's Case (2) but I am referring rather to the passage where the learned judge says:

> "From the moment an objection is made the Minister is exercising quasi-judicial functions, but it seems to me to be clearly recognised by the Court of Appeal that up to the time of objection being made the Minister acts in an administrative, and not a judicial, capacity."

That shows plainly that he quite well understood the difference between the two cases, and expresses the difference so admirably that I desire to adopt and approve his language.

Appeal dismissed.

WALKER v. BAIRDS & DALMELLINGTON, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Tomlin, Lord Thankerton, Lord Macmillan, Lord Wright, and Lord Alness), May 13, June 3, 1935]

Workmen's Compensation—Injury by accident—Broncho-pneumonia—Result of immersion in cold water to clear mine sump—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 84), s. 1 (1).

A workman was employed by the respondents to clean out a sump in their colliery into which water was collected from the underground workings. In carrying out the work it was necessary for the workman to stand in cold water about waist-deep. After coming out of the sump on the material occasion he contracted a chill which developed into broncho-pneumonia, from which he died. On an application by his widow for compensation under s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

Held: in the circumstances the disease from which the workman died was a "personal injury by accident" within s. 1 (1), and, as it was not disputed that it arose out of and in the course of his employment, the widow was entitled to compensation.

Notes. The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, was repealed by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, which prescribes a system of insurance against injuries caused by industrial accidents, but s. 1 (1) of the latter Act provides that the insurance shall be "against personal injury caused . . . by accident arising out of and in the course of" employment, thus adopting the wording of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1925.

Appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session (reported 1934 S.C. 484) arising out of an application by Mrs. Mary Currie McCrorie or Walker in the Sheriff Court at Ayr for an award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, in respect of the death of her husband, John Walker, underground fireman, while in the employment of Bairds and Dalmellington Limited, coalmasters, Auchincruive Collieries, Prestwick. The Sheriff-Substitute refused compensation and, at the request of the applicant, stated a Case for appeal.

The Case set forth:

"1. On March 24, 1933, the deceased John Walker was in the employment of the respondents at No. 3 Auchincruive Colliery as an underground fireman. 2. At said colliery there is a sump into which water from the underground workings gathers, and from which the water is taken to the surface by a suction pipe. 3. Owing to sludge or dirt accumulating in the bottom of the sump, tending to choke the suction pipe, the sump requires to be cleaned about once every three months, and it had been the practice so to clean it. 4. The deceased had for several years prior to his death been regularly employed to clean out the sump. 5. The work of cleaning out the sump was not part of the deceased's work as an underground fireman, but was extra work, which he voluntarily undertook, and for which he received pay equal to that for one and one-half shifts at his ordinary work. 6. It is not proved that specially qualified men were necessary for the work. 7. On March 24, 1933, the deceased, who had worked at his ordinary work on the morning shift from 6.30 a.m. to 2.30 p.m., was requested to clean the sump that afternoon. 8. He then went home, had his dinner, returned to the pit, and about 5 p.m. went down to the pump-room, which is above the sump, changed into old clothes and put on the oilskins which are supplied for this work, and then proceeded down a ladder on to a scaffolding above the water where he waited in accordance with the usual practice, along with another man who was employed on the job, until the water was pumped down to the level at which it should be when the sump is to be cleaned. 9. When the water reached the proper level, which was about 3½ ft. from the bottom of the sump, the deceased and the other man entered the water and proceeded to clear away the sludge in the usual way, which was by bending forward and pulling a pail along the bottom of the sump and scooping up the sludge in the pail. 10. To do this the men had usually to stand in water about waist-deep, and the deceased had to do so on this occasion. 11. The oilskins provided for the men do not protect them from getting wet when they are in the sump. 12. While working in the sump the deceased was wet through up to the waist. 13. The water felt cold to the men when they entered it, but that it is not proved that the water was unusually cold. 14. The pails, when filled, were attached to a rope, quickly hauled up, emptied, and returned by the rope, and there was very little waiting for the return of the empty pails. 15. The time during which the deceased was in the water cleaning the said sump was not less than thirty-five minutes. 16. The usual time during which the men required to be in the water for this purpose is between half-an-hour and an hour. 17. After cleaning the sump, the deceased returned to the pump-room, took off his wet clothes, washed himself in cold water, and put on his ordinary clothes, a proceeding which occupied about twenty minutes. 18. Thereafter he walked home with the other man who had been in the sump and an oversman, arriving home about 7 p.m. 19. While dressing in the pump-room the deceased had an appearance of being cold and shivering, but did not make any remark about it. 20. When walking home the deceased did not complain of cold. 21. When he arrived home the deceased told the appellant that the water in the sump had been cold and took a hot bath to warm him. 22. He then had some food, and after that sat in the house until he went to bed about ten o'clock. 23. Between two and four o'clock the next morning the deceased became unwell, suffering from rigor and shivering and vomiting, and during the day developed symptoms of broncho-pneumonia. 24. When a doctor was called in on the afternoon of that day (March 25), deceased explained to the doctor that he had been cleaning the sump at the pit on the previous day and had felt chilled after doing so. 25. On the following day the deceased had become worse and was definitely suffering from broncho-pneumonia, which became steadily worse until he died of broncho-pneumonia on March 30, 1933. 26. The appearance of coldness and shivering which the deceased had when he left the sump, was a symptom that he was suffering from a chill caused by the exposure to cold and water while he was cleaning the sump. 27. The rigor, shivering, and vomiting from which he suffered between two and four o'clock next morning were symptoms that he was suffering from a chill. 28. Broncho-pneumonia is an infection due to organisms causing the infection, which are commonly present in the nose and throat of an apparently healthy person, invading the lungs, the invasion being made possible either by the inhalation of foreign particles or by a chill, involving congestion of the lining membranes of the respiratory tract. 29. Broncho-pneumonia so caused by a chill may not develop immediately, but may appear in any time from three to forty-eight hours after the chill. 30. As an inference from the foregoing facts, the broncho-pneumonia from which the deceased died was caused by a chill which he contracted through exposure to cold and water while cleaning the sump. On these facts I found in law that the death of Walker was not caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and accordingly, on Jan. 10, 1934, I found the appellant liable to the respondents in expenses."

The Sheriff-Substitute added the following note to the case: "I felt that, on the facts, I was entitled to make the inference that the broncho-pneumonia, from which the deceased died, was due to a chill contracted while the deceased was working in the sump. It was argued for the defence that this was purely speculative, and that the deceased might have caught the chill on his way home, or as a result of the hot bath which he took after he got home. And some endeavour was made in the medical evidence for the defence to suggest that the hot bath was the cause of the whole trouble. I did not, however, find that evidence at all convincing, and much preferred the medical evidence for the pursuer which was very thorough. The incident of the bath did not come out in time to allow the pursuer's medical witnesses to be examined on it, but it did not appear to me that what evidence was led about it would materially affect the conclusions arrived at by them. On the other hand, I found very considerable difficulty in regard to the question whether the deceased's death was caused by accident. The puzzle to me was to find anything which could be described as the accident, unless the actual catching of a chill when working in cold water can be so described. The pursuer's agent founded on the nature of the work, maintaining that it was extraordinary work, that because the deceased held the position of underground fireman, extraordinary people were required to do it, and that an extraordinary price was paid for it. But I could not follow this. At any rate the only meaning in which the work can be described as extraordinary is that it was not the work which anyone ordinarily did, because it was only required at intervals. There was certainly nothing fortuitous or abnormal about it. And I could find no evidence to justify a finding that any particular qualifications were required for the work. No doubt it was well paid—as compared with the other work in the pit—but I do not know what inference to make from this, unless it is that the wage was to tempt people to do work which was wet and dirty. An attempt was made to show that it was risky work, but the witnesses other than the medical ones would not accept this. No doubt, however, it seemed to follow from the medical evidence that the work is of a kind that involves more than the ordinary risk of catching a chill. Does it follow from this that the catching of a chill in such an employment is an accident? On the contrary, the view would rather seem to be that, where a risk of some disease is a necessary incident of the occupation, the catching of that disease is not an accident, whereas if the disease were a rare one, it might be (Raeburn v. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. (1). I was referred to two cases (Treloar v. Falmouth Docks and Engineering Co. Ltd. (2), and Partridge Jones and John Paton Ltd. v. James (3), which illustrate how little is necessary nowadays to satisfy the requirement of an 'accident.' But these cases scarcely seem to me to be yet applicable to the case of a disease caught as the result of the nature of the work. I was also, of course, referred to the well-known cases of Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co. (4) and Brown v. John Watson Ltd. (5), but I have found nothing in the present case which would put it on a par with these. The cleaning of the sump seems to have been carried out in the usual way and nothing of any kind unusual or abnormal seems to have happened. It was a job that required to be done once every three months and so may be regarded as routine work. There was nothing fortuitous about it having to be done on the day in question by the deceased, because he has been regularly doing this work for years. Accordingly, I felt that, as the authorities do not appear to have yet gone the length of holding that the mere contracting a disease as a result of the nature of the work, is 'accident' within the meaning of the Act, I was bound to decide this question in the defenders' favour."

The question for the opinion of the court was: "On the foregoing facts was I entitled to hold that Walker's death was not caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment?"

The Second Division held, following Treloar v. Falmouth Docks and Engineering Co., Ltd. (2) and Partridge Jones and Paton, Ltd. v. James (3), that, since it was established that the chill which caused the disease had arisen out of and in the course of his employment, the workman's death from the disease was the result of an "injury by accident" within the meaning of s. 1 (1), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The employers appealed.

James Keith, K.C., and C. J. D. Shaw for the appellants.

W. D. Patrick, K.C., and John Cameron for the respondent were not called upon to argue.

The House took time for consideration.

June 3. LORD TOMLIN.—In this case your Lordships are invited by the appellants, the employers of a deceased workman named Walker, to reverse an interlocutor of the judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, pronounced in a stated Case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, from the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Ayr. The respondent before your Lordships is the pursuer claiming compensation in respect of the death of her husband the deceased workman.

The Sheriff-Substitute, on the facts found, held that Walker's death was not caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and in the stated Case raised for the opinion of the court the question of law whether upon the facts stated in the Case he was entitled to hold that the death of Walker was not caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Their Lordships of the Second Division answered the question of law stated in the Case in the negative, sustained the appeal, reversed the determination of the Sheriff-Substitute and made to him the necessary consequential remit of the case.

The facts found in the stated Case included in effect the following: In the afternoon of March 24, 1933, Walker, who was an underground fireman in the employment of the appellants, was engaged in cleaning out the sludge or dirt in a sump of water in the workings of the colliery. This was extra work which he voluntarily undertook for special pay and which he had done from time to time for several years. Walker put on oilskins supplied for the work. The oilskins did not protect their wearer from wet when he was standing in the water. Walker entered the sump and while working in the sump stood, as was usual in doing this work, waist-deep in water. He was in the water not less than thirty-five minutes. The water was not unusually cold. Between 2 and 4 o'clock next morning Walker became unwell, suffering from rigor and shivering and vomiting, and during the day developed symptoms of broncho-pneumonia, from which he died on March 30, 1933.

The five concluding paragraphs of the findings of fact in the stated Case were as follows:—

> "26. The appearance of coldness and shivering which the deceased had when he left the sump, was a symptom that he was suffering from a chill caused by the exposure to cold and water while he was cleaning the sump. 27. The rigor, shivering, and vomiting from which he suffered between two and four o'clock next morning were symptoms that he was suffering from a chill. 28. Broncho-pneumonia is an infection due to organisms causing the infection, which are commonly present in the nose and throat of an apparently healthy person, invading the lungs, the invasion being made possible either by the inhalation of foreign particles or by a chill, involving congestion of the lining membranes of the respiratory tract. 29. Broncho-pneumonia so caused by a chill may not develop immediately, but may appear in any time from three to forty-eight hours after the chill. 30. As an inference from the foregoing facts, that the broncho-pneumonia from which the deceased died was caused by a chill which he contracted through exposure to cold and water while cleaning the sump."

It may well be doubted whether when there first appeared upon the statute book the words "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment," the mind of that elusive personality sometimes called "the plain man" would have supposed that these words covered such a case as the present, but your Lordships have to-day to consider the words with the advantage and in the light of the expositions of their meaning which have from time to time been made in your Lordships' House. The ascertainment of that meaning has been a progressive process, certainly a broadening down from precedent to precedent. It may be that in this case the extreme frontier of the area covered by the words has been reached, but that the findings of fact bring the present case within that area, cannot, in my opinion, be open to serious question having regard to the previous decisions.

Some thirty-two years ago in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. (6) a workman employed to turn the wheel of a machine ruptured himself by an act of over-exertion and was held by your Lordships' House to be entitled to compensation. In the course of his speech in that case LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1903] A. C. at p. 448):

> "Now the expression 'injury by accident' seems to me to be a compound expression. The words 'by accident' are, I think, introduced parenthetically as it were to qualify the word 'injury' confining it to a certain class of injuries, and excluding other classes, as, for instance, injuries by disease or injuries self-inflicted by design."

Later on the noble Lord adds:

> "The truth is that in the Act," (he is referring to the Act of 1897) "which does not seem to have had the benefit of careful revision, 'accident' and 'injury,' that is, injury by accident, appear to be used as convertible terms . . ., I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the expression 'accident' is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an unlooked for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed."

Five years later, in Ismay, Imrie, & Co. v. Williamson (7), a claim was made in respect of the death of a workman who, when in a weak and emaciated condition, received a heat-stroke while raking out ashes from under the boiler in the stokehole of a steamship and died from the effects of it. Your Lordships' House (LORD MACNAGHTEN dissenting) held that the case fell within the Act. LORD LOREBURN said ([1908] A. C. at p. 439):

> "In my view the man died from an accident. What killed him was a heat-stroke coming suddenly and unexpectedly upon him while at work. Such a stroke is an unusual effect of a known cause, often, no doubt threatened, but generally averted by precautions which experience, in this instance, had not taught. It was an unlooked for mishap in the course of his employment. In common language, it was a case of accidental death."

LORD ASHBOURNE ([1908] A.C. at p. 441) observed:

> "Although a heat-stroke may be called a disease, it is in this case, in my opinion, a disease directly caused by an accident arising out of or in the course of an employment, particularly dangerous to Williamson, in consequence of his weak state of health. Its not being scheduled as an industrial disease in the Act of 1906 does not > affect the question, for the Act expressly provides that 'nothing shall affect the rights of a workman to recover compensation in respect of a disease to which the section does not apply, if the disease is a personal injury by accident within the meaning of the Act.' I do not at all say that all diseases arising out of or in the course of employment should be regarded as a personal injury by accident, but I am of opinion that under the circumstances of this case and its facts Williamson was killed by a personal injury by accident."

Lord Macnaghten ([1908] A.C. at p. 441) dissented, saying:

> "That the illness by which the deceased lost his life was one arising out of and in the course of his employment cannot be disputed. But I agree with Holmes, L.J., that it does not come under the description of a 'personal injury by accident.' That expression, as it seems to me, would be equally applicable or equally inapposite in the case of an attack of bronchitis or pneumonia brought on by a sudden and violent chill disregarded or neglected at the outset."

Lord Macnaghten, in the passage which I have last quoted, appears to have anticipated such a case of death by disease as is now before your Lordships, and it is not to be doubted that upon the basis of the principles enunciated by the majority of your Lordships' House on that occasion he would have accepted the view that such a case might fall within the Act, or, in other words, that a disease causing death may in certain circumstances be within the meaning of the Act "personal injury by accident."

At a later stage, in Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes (8), your Lordships' House held that where a workman suffering from a serious aneurism fell down dead from a rupture of the aneurism while tightening a nut with a spanner it was a case of "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment" within the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. In that case Lord Macnaghten said ([1910] A.C. at p. 249):

> "The real question, as it seems to me, is this, 'Did it arise out of his employment?' On this point the evidence before the county court judge was undoubtedly conflicting. But he has held that it did, and I think there was sufficient evidence to support that finding, though I do not say I should have come to the same conclusion myself. The death, the learned judge says, was caused by a strain arising out of the ordinary work of the deceased operating upon a condition of body which was such as to render the strain fatal. The fact that the man's condition predisposed him to such an accident seems to me to be immaterial. The work was ordinary work, but it was too heavy for him. It must be taken on the finding of the learned county court judge that the accident was unexpected by the workman. It can hardly be supposed that he intended to kill himself. The fact that the result would have been expected, or indeed contemplated as a certainty, by a medical man of ordinary skill if he had diagnosed the case is, I think, nothing to the purpose."

This case seems to me to establish that there may be personal injury by accident even though the employee's work has proceeded in the normal way and even though the injury is due to the presence of a special condition in the employee's body.

In Brown v. John Watson, Ltd. (5), where a miner died from pneumonia brought on by a chill due to exposure consequent on a wreck in one of the shafts of the mine, the finding of the arbitrator that the deceased sustained an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment was supported. In that case it is true that some emphasis seems to have been put on the fact that the exposure followed upon the accidental wreck in the shaft, but this element was not present in the next case which I shall mention.

In Welsh v. Glasgow Coal Co., Ltd. (9), a workman claimed compensation for incapacity from rheumatism occasioned by standing up to his chest in water for some hours doing work which was not his ordinary job. It was held in this House that the arbitrator was entitled to hold that the workman had met with a personal injury by accident within the meaning of the Act. Lord Haldane thought that Lord Macnaghten's definition of an accident in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. (6) of > "an unlooked for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed"

A covered the case. LORD KINNEAR explained that the argument that there must be some distinct event or occurrence which taken by itself can be recognised as an accident had been already rejected by your Lordships in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. (6). His Lordship also explained that there was no inconsistency between Brown v. John Watson, Ltd. (5) and Fenton v. Thorley & Co. (6).

The latest stage in the progression was reached in Treloar v. Falmouth Docks and B Engineering Co., Ltd. (2); and Partridge Jones and Paton, Ltd. v. James (3). In each of these cases a man with heart disease died at his work which he was or had been doing in the ordinary way, this work being found to have contributed to his death. There was in neither case any distinct event or occurrence which taken by itself could be recognised as an accident. Each case was held to be within the Act.

These decisions inescapably drive, or, perhaps, I should say lead, me to the conclusion C that upon the findings of fact in the present case the Sheriff-Substitute was bound to hold that Walker's death was caused by personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The disease resulted from the sudden and unexpected onset of a chill contracted in conditions normal in carrying out the workman's job in the accustomed manner and frequently experienced by him on previous occasions without ill results. The onset of the chill, the direct result of doing the work, was "an un- D toward event" and not "expected" or "designed."

In my view, based upon the previous pronouncements of your Lordships' House, the disease which was the injury was in these circumstances the result of accident, and it is not questioned that the injury by accident (if such it be within the meaning of the Act) arose out of and in the course of the employment. But it was said in argument that there are other decisions of your Lordships' House which are inconsistent with this E conclusion, and reference was made to Lyons (or Docherty) v. Woodilee Coal and Coke Co., Ltd. (10) and Dennis v. Midland Rail. Co. (11). It is, of course, obvious that, having regard to the nature of the principles which have been laid down by your Lordships' House and to the varied circumstances of particular cases, it may sometimes not be easy from a perusal of the report to appreciate why a case has fallen upon one side rather than upon the other side of the dividing line, but each of the cases to which I have F just referred seems to have been determined upon the basis that the injury did not arise out of or in the course of the employment. In the first case the matter was treated as concluded by the arbitrator's finding to that effect, and in the second case the majority of the House held that the real cause was the workman leaving his house without food or proper clothing, and, therefore, that the injury did not arise out of and in the course of the employment. LORD SUMNER's view that the element of accident could not be G present in such a case seems to me difficult to reconcile with the earlier decisions of your Lordships' House. Moreover, in the latter case there was something in the nature of an added peril though no reference to this element appears to have been made in the judgments. At any rate, I find nothing in those two cases to lead me to think that I have wrongly interpreted the views of your Lordships' House as exemplified in the other cases to which I have referred.

H The opinion expressed by LORD DUNEDIN when Lord President in M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Ltd. (12) is illustrative of a stage in the progressive process to which I have called attention. Notwithstanding LORD DUNEDIN's protests, your Lordships have, in my view, since advanced a further stage, and because of that advance I reach the conclusion that, having regard to the findings of fact in this case, there was personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment, and I accordingly that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD THANKERTON.—It appears from the facts stated by the arbitrator that the deceased workman died from broncho-pneumonia caused by a chill which he contracted through exposure to cold and water while cleaning the sump in the pit. This was part of his normal work, though paid for as extra work, and was being done by him in the normal way; there was nothing abnormal in the workman's health at the time, or in the conditions of cold and exposure under which he was working.

The learned arbitrator found in law that the death of Walker was not caused by accident, on the ground that the authorities had not yet gone the length of holding that the mere contracting of a disease as a result of the nature of the work is "accident" within the meaning of the Act. The Second Division felt bound to take a different view, because of certain decisions of this House. In view of the findings of the arbitrator in the present case, there can be little doubt that, if there was "personal injury by accident" caused to the workman, such injury arose out of and was in course of his employment.

The meaning of the words "injury by accident" have been the subject of consideration in this House in a series of cases which have been so fully reviewed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, that it is unnecessary for me to do so again. It is sometimes the case that the reasons expressed for dissent in a case provide a useful index for the effect of the principles approved of by the majority of the court, and such an index is to be found in the passage from the dissenting speech of Lord Macnaghten in Ismay, Imrie & Co. v. Williamson (7), which has been quoted by the noble and learned Lord. When that case was followed by the decision of this House in Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes (8) the subsequent decisions of this House appear to me to have been an inevitable sequel. In my opinion the present case necessarily falls within the principles laid down in Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes (8). I agree with the reasons and the conclusions expressed by my noble and learned friend.

LORD WRIGHT.—I also agree. I think the question raised in this appeal is clearly covered by the line of authorities in this House to which my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has referred.

LORD ALNESS.—I have considered and re-considered with care all the decisions which were cited to your Lordships in the course of the excellent argument which we were privileged to hear. In the result, I feel constrained to hold that the Second Division of the Court of Session were right in the conclusion at which they arrived. I must own that personally I feel much sympathy with the views expressed by Lord Dunedin in the case of M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Ltd. (12). But much water has flowed beneath the bridges since 1913, and many cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act have since been decided. In particular, the cases of the Falmouth Docks and Engineering Co., Ltd. v. Treloar (2), and Partridge Jones and Paton, Ltd. v. James (3) seem to me to leave no option but to hold that they cover the decision of this case. There appears to me to be no material distinction in the principle upon which these cases were decided and the principle upon which this case falls to be decided. The reasoning of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, regarding that matter, appears to me, if I may respectfully say so, to be irrefragable. I feel that I cannot usefully add to what he has said, and I therefore content myself by saying that I concur in the motion which he has moved.

LORD TOMLIN.—My Lords, I am asked to say that my noble and learned friend Lord Macmillan concurs in the opinion which I have delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

[Chancery Division (Farwell, J.), November 13, 1935]

Will—"Money"—National savings certificates—War stock—Extrinsic evidence—Admissibility of.

A testatrix by her will bequeathed "my money" to two named persons equally. At the date of her will and also at the date of her death her property consisted of (i) national savings certificates, (ii) war stock, and (iii) cash.

Held: the expression "my money" must, in the absence of any context to the contrary in the will, be given its primary meaning, namely, actual ready money, and money at call or on deposit at a bank, and, therefore, did not include the national savings certificates or the war stock, with regard to which there was an intestacy.

Observations as to the circumstances in which extrinsic evidence is permissible.

Construction Summons

The testatrix by her will dated July 19, 1934, bequeathed "my money to John Derek Fortescue Flannery and John Stewart Nowell equally divided." She died on July 21, 1934, without leaving any known relatives.

Her property was worth about £1,438 13s. 11d., consisting of National Savings Certificates of the value of £621 13s. 1d., £31 11s. 3½d. War Stock, and the remainder cash.

Letters of administration with will annexed were granted to the plaintiffs, of whom one was J. D. S. Nowell. The defendant was J. D. F. Flannery, who was an infant.

A summons was taken out by the plaintiffs to determine the question whether the National Savings Certificates and the War Stock passed under the will and were included in the expression "my money."

Raymond Jennings for the plaintiffs, the administrators.
J. F. Bowyer for the infant defendant.
Andrewes-Uthwatt for the Attorney-General.

FARWELL, J.—This summons raises a short point on a very short will. It is not without interest: and the conclusion at which I have arrived is one to which I confess I come with some little regret.

The facts are these. The testatrix was a lady who had been a nurse to two families. She had been the nurse of the infant defendant, and also of the plaintiff, John Douglas Stewart Nowell. She was removed to hospital in a very serious state of health: and she was asked by one of her friends whether she would make a will. She was not very willing to do so, but she was pressed to make one, because, as was pointed out to her, if she had no relations, as seemed to be the fact, on her death her property would go to the Crown. In those circumstances, she rather unwillingly did make a will. She apparently had at the hospital with her the whole of her worldly wealth. That consisted of certain National Savings Certificates, a certain amount of War Stock, and a certain amount of money. They were contained in an attaché case, which went with her to the hospital, and were looked after there by the authorities, and were there at the time of her death.

[His Lordship stated the date of the will and the death of the testatrix, and read the will, and continued:] I am entitled to know the surrounding circumstances at the time when the will was made, and at the time of the death. I have already stated how the lady came to be in the hospital; and her position at the time when she made her will. But further, I am entitled to know what her property consisted of at her death. It appears from the evidence before me that [His Lordship stated the facts relating to the estate set out above, and continued:] In construing this will, I have to start with this: that I am bound to give the word "money" its primary meaning, unless I can find something which justifies me in giving it a more extended meaning. What exactly is the meaning of the word "money" in its strict sense I will state in a moment. A B

I desire, however, to say what in my view is the way in which evidence is admissible in a case of this kind: and the use to which it can be put. VICE-CHANCELLOR WIGRAM in his invaluable book states the general conclusion on this matter in the third edition on p. 183 (1) (p. 198, 5th edit.) and I accept as accurate that statement of the law. I think that it comes to this: the duty of the court in the first place is to read the will itself. The court is bound in the first instance to read it, giving the words used their primary and proper meaning. The court is then entitled to look at the surrounding circumstances. If the surrounding circumstances are such that the words of the will, if construed in accordance with their primary meaning, are not apt to apply to any of the circumstances, then the court is entitled, having regard to the surrounding circumstances, to see whether the language used is capable of some meaning other than its ordinary meaning, not for the purpose of giving effect to what the court may think was the intention of the testator, but for the purpose of giving effect to what the intention of the testator is shown to be from the language used, having regard to the surrounding circumstances. In other words, the court is not entitled to disregard the language which the testator has used in order to give effect to what the court may think to have been the intention, but the court is entitled to say that the words which the testator has used were not intended to have their primary meaning if the surrounding circumstances are such as to lead inevitably to that conclusion. C D E

Here I am faced with this. There is nothing in the will but the words "my money." That, by itself, is clearly not sufficient to pass anything but cash, that is to say, actual ready money, money at a bank at call and, having regard to the decisions, money on deposit at a bank, and I have to look at the surrounding circumstances to see whether I ought to give to the word "money" any meaning other than its primary meaning. This lady did possess money, that is to say, cash, and the words "my money" are apt as applied to that—that is to say, she had cash, and the words "my money" are exactly apt to pass that. Am I, then, entitled to say that it was used in some wider meaning? In my judgment the answer to that must be in the negative. Can I, then, say that the National Savings Certificates are money in the strict meaning of that word? It is said that I can on the ground that those certificates are in the same category as money on deposit at a bank, which has been held to be included in the term "money." I regret I am bound to come to the conclusion that the word "money" is not apt to include securities of this nature. It is true that, by giving notice, the money which has been lent to the Government is repaid to the lender; but none the less in my judgment the certificates are not money in any proper sense of the word at all. National Savings Certificates are transferable inter vivos, and can be passed at death. It seems to me impossible to treat them on the same footing as money on deposit at the bank. F G H

On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that this lady died intestate as to the whole of her estate, except what was actually cash, and that neither the National Savings Certificates nor the War Stock pass under this will. I

[COURT OF APPEAL (Greer, Maugham and Roche, L.JJ.), March 8, 1935]

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 28; 104 L.J.K.B. 450; 153 L.T. 31; 51 T.L.R. 361; 79 Sol. Jo. 320; 40 Com. Cas. 193]

Shipping—Charter-party—Construction—Ship "expected to load about"—Future fixed date—Exceptions—Unavoidable hindrance beyond owners' control—Intermediate charter with other charterers—Delay in loading on second charter due to weather during period of intermediate charter—Consequent delay in proceeding to and arriving at loading port under first charter—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 & 15 Geo. 5. c. 22), p. 2, p. 5, Sched. art. IV.

By a charter-party dated Aug. 2, 1933, shipowners contracted with charterers, that the W. (or substitute at owners' option) "expected ready to load about Sept. 11, 1933," should with all convenient speed proceed to Hamburg and there load from the charterers a cargo. The charter-party provided, inter alia: "10. Charterers or owners not to incur liability for loss arising from frosts, floods, strikes . . . and any other unavoidable accident or hindrances of what kind soever, beyond charterers' or owners' control . . . 13. Should the steamer not be in Hamburg and ready to load within six days after [Sept. 11, 1933] charterers to have the option of cancelling this agreement." By cl. 3 the owners in all matters arising under the contract were to be entitled to the like privileges, rights, and immunities as are contained in ss. 2 and 5 of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and in art. IV of the Schedule thereto. On Aug. 31, 1933, the shipowners made an intermediate charter with other charterers that the W., then trading and expected ready to load on or about Sept. 6 or 7, should load a cargo of stone at Porthoustock, Cornwall, and deliver it at Felixstowe. The W. arrived at Porthoustock on Sept. 7, but by reason of gales was unable to commence loading until Sept. 11, and so did not reach Hamburg till Sept. 17. On a claim by the charterers under the charter-party of Aug. 2, for, inter alia, demurrage of barges at Hamburg.

Held: the shipowners were liable in damages for the late arrival of the W. at Hamburg because the exceptions in cl. 10 for unavoidable hindrances beyond owners' control, and also (per ROCHE, L.J.) the incorporated provisions of the Act of 1924, applied, not from Aug. 2, the date of the charter-party, but from the time the W. proceeded with all convenient speed to arrive at Hamburg.

Appeal from a decision of ATKINSON, J.

Monroe Brothers Limited, owners of the steamship Wythburn agreed with Messrs. A. Ryan and Son, charterers, by charter-party dated Aug. 2, 1933 ("Merseycon" form), that the Wythburn (or substitute at owners' option) "expected ready to load about Sept. 11, 1933," "being tight, staunch, strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed proceed to Hamburg or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the said charterers a full and complete cargo" of sugar and salt, and so loaded should proceed to Merchant's Quay, Kilrush, or so near thereto as she might safely get.

By cl. 3 of the charter-party:

> "The owners in all matters arising under this contract shall also be entitled to the like privileges and rights and immunities as are contained in ss. 2 and 5 of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and in Art. IV of the Schedule thereto."

By cl. 10:

> "Charterers or owners not to incur liability for loss arising from frosts, floods, strikes, lock-outs of seamen, workpeople, or other persons necessary for the performance of this charter-party, disputes between masters and men, and any other unavoidable accident or hindrances of what kind soever, beyond charterers' or owners' control."

By cl. 13:

> "Should the steamer not be in Hamburg and ready to load within six days after the date stated above, charterers to have the option of cancelling this agreement."

By another charter-party, dated Aug. 31, 1933, the shipowners agreed with other charterers that the Wythburn, then trading and expected ready to load on or about Sept. 6 or 7, but not before, should load a cargo of stone at Porthoustock (near Falmouth) for Felixstowe. There were exceptions in this charter-party (inter alia) of "perils of the sea" and "all other hindrances whatsoever beyond owners' control." The Wythburn arrived at Porthoustock on Sept. 7, 1933, but by reason of gales was unable to load till Sept. 11, so that after discharging her cargo of stone at Felixstowe she did not arrive at Hamburg till Sunday, Sept. 17. She commenced to load on Sept. 18. The shipowners' agent in Hamburg had given to the shippers of the salt and of the sugar notice of readiness to load on Sept. 14. All parties, as appeared from the correspondence, accepted the position that under the charter of Aug. 2 the ship would not be ready to load at Hamburg until about Sept. 14.

On a claim by the shipowners for the balance of freight, which was admitted, the charterers counter-claimed for (a) demurrage of barges at Hamburg, £45; (b) lighterage at Kilrush, £15 11s. 6d. (the vessel was late for the spring tides); and (c) loss on resale of sugar, £60. Atkinson, J., held that the shipowners, by making the second charter on Aug. 31, committed a breach of the warranty—"expected ready to load about Sept. 11"—in the charter of Aug. 2. The shipowners could not avail themselves of the exceptions in that charter, and he gave judgment for the charterers on the counter-claim in respect of claims (a) and (b), holding that claim (c) was too remote.

The shipowners appealed.

Le Quesne, K.C., and H. I. Nelson for the shipowners.

R. K. Chappell, K.C., and F. A. Sellers, K.C., for the charterers.

GREER, L.J.—In this appeal we are concerned only with the counter-claim. The action was brought by shipowners to recover a balance of freight of the sum of £61 1s. 6d. There was no defence to the claim, but a counter-claim was allowed by the learned judge for £60 11s. 6d. damages for breach by the shipowners of the charter-party. The charter-party was dated Aug. 2, 1933, and its provisions are in terms which I can quite understand might create considerable difficulties in the mind of a tribunal accustomed to the precision of statements in documents which are usually drawn up by conveyancers. It is, however, a matter of common knowledge among those who deal with commercial documents that difficulties often arise in their construction, because of the way in which such documents are prepared, and because those who use them fail to give sufficient consideration to the exact meaning of the words that are used. Many commercial contracts are done by the nod, that is to say, brokers meet in the market, one mentions a price and the other nods his head in assent, and both understand and believe that the usual form of contract will apply to the transaction. Very often it is a form of contract which is quite unsuited to the particular kind of transaction. One instance of that is the use of old mediæval forms at Lloyd's for insurance. It is quite common for the name of a ship to be inserted where there is no ship in the transaction at all, and although there is no voyage to be performed by any ship, and no insurance of any goods at sea. As a rule, they do not even strike out the exceptions to perils of the sea, but they leave them there to be applied, if they can be applied, to a voyage which has nothing to do with carriage by sea.

Here we are concerned with a charter-party, in which it has been found convenient to put, instead of a definite date, the words "expected ready to load," by a given date. The charter-party provided that it was mutually agreed between the shipowners, managers of the good steamship called the Wythburn (and then they describe her register) "expected ready to load about Sept. 11, 1933," and the charterers, and then followed the provisions of the charter-party. It has been found in the experience of shipowners that it is a little difficult for them to undertake an exact date when the vessel will be ready to load, and this clause was invented to meet that situation. The meaning of these words has been explained in one or two cases, especially in Samuel Sanday & Co. v. Keighley Maxted & Co. (1) by LORD STERNDALE, M.R., when he said (127 L.T. at p. 328):

> "I think that the second is the right view that it is to be interpreted as meaning that in view of the facts, as known to the seller at the time of his making the contract and making the statement 'expected ready to load' the expectation was one which was made, as BAILHACHE, J., says in one of the cases, honestly and upon reasonable grounds."

Now it has been said in that and other cases that this statement is not a mere representation, but is a contractual statement, part of the contract between the parties; but that it only means they contract that the statement is honestly made upon reasonable grounds. That does not help very much in determining what is the date on which the ship ought to be there ready to load. It is not the only relevant provision in the charter-party, because the charter-party also provides:

> "The said steamer being tight, staunch, strong, and every way fitted for the voyage shall, with all convenient speed, proceed to Hamburg or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the said charterers a full and complete cargo" of 330 tons of sugar and 140 tons of salt. That, I take it, means that the vessel will proceed at a time when it is reasonably certain that she will arrive at the loading port on or about the expected date, and the expected date in this case is on or about Sept. 11. In the absence of evidence it is difficult to determine what the exact effect of the word "about" is. The parties in this case, in the correspondence, have treated the 14th as within the area of the expected date, and I do not think we are entitled to differ from them in that respect. The charterers' complaint is: We do not say we suffered any damage by reason of a breach of contract because the vessel did not arrive before the 14th, but we do say we suffered damage by reason of a breach committed by the vessel arriving at a later date.

The dates are these: Aug. 31, the shipowners entered into another charter-party with the West of England Road-Metal Co. Ltd. to carry stone from a place called Porthoustock to Felixstowe, and it is said that by doing so they broke their contract. I do not accept that argument. It must have been within the contemplation of the parties that between Aug. 2 and Sept. 14 the shipowners would, in fact, be using their vessel for such remunerative purposes as they could. I also think that the taking of that charter did not in any way relieve, or, indeed, affect, the obligations of the shipowners under the charter of Aug. 2, and by entering into that second charter they took upon themselves the risk that by doing so they might be prevented from fulfilling the contract which they had made as early as Aug. 2. In this connection I refer to the observations of LORD PEARSON in Thomas Nelson & Sons v. The Dundee East Coast Shipping Co. Ltd. (2) which I think are correct. He said (1907 S.C. at p. 935):

> "The defenders dwell on the expression 'expected ready to load about March 3' as if it left everything open, with the result that the charter is absolutely indefinite as to time in the important matter of the commencement of loading. I do not say that the words amount to an undertaking that she will be ready to load on March 3, or even about March 3. But touching as they do a matter within the shipowners' own knowledge and control, they at least import, in my opinion, an assurance that the vessel was at the time in such a position that she might reasonably be expected to be in Leith ready to load by the day named. Now, although that assurance was well founded at the time it was made, and although the ship might with all convenient speed have proceeded to Leith in ample time, the defenders deliberately put it out of their power to fulfil the contract. If for any reason the Alice was not available, they had the option of substituting a sister ship. But as regards each of them it appears that the defenders interposed a new charter in such a way as to make it impossible for them to fulfil their contract with the pursuers with either ship. That of itself seems to me sufficient to infer liability in damages."

Although the shipowners in this case did not make a contract which by itself would bring about that result, they made a contract which did, in fact, bring about the result that the vessel could not proceed with due diligence to the port of loading so as to arrive on or about the expected date. The only question is whether or not the shipowners were excused, by reason of the exceptions in the charter-party, from performing that obligation.

I am satisfied that there is no authority which carries the area of the exceptions beyond the time when the ship starts on the agreed voyage. It is not confined to the time when she loads under the charter-party; it does include the period of time when she is steaming with all convenient speed to arrive at the loading port. I agree with the view expressed in Carver's Carriage by Sea (7th Edn.), s. 148, at p. 228, which is:

> "But it seems that the exceptions do not apply to matters which may happen before the ship has entered upon the voyage dealt with by the charter-party."

These are words used by Lord Blackburn in Harrison v. Garthorne (3) (26 L.T. at p. 509) which appear to support that proposition, although there is no actual decision to that effect, but it seems to me sound sense that when you make an agreement for a particular voyage the whole of the terms of that agreement relate to that voyage, and not to something which may happen before that voyage began. It is an unfortunate result that people who have to make engagements in advance necessarily run the risk of the engagements clashing with one another so as to prevent the performance of one or other of their contracts, and they have to take the consequences by paying damages to the party whose contract they have failed to perform.

For these reasons this appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will only add very few words. This action relates to a Chamber of Shipping Coasting Charter-party, dated Aug. 2, 1933, entered into with regard to the steamship Wythburn. The contract was in reference to a ship which was "expected ready to load about Sept. 11, 1933," and there was consequently a period of six weeks between the date of the charter-party and the date when the ship was to be or expected to be at Hamburg. It is perfectly clear that in the case of a contract such as this, it was open to the shipowners to enter into another charter-party, and they did, in fact, enter into another charter-party on Aug. 31, 1933, that being a Chamber of Shipping Stone Charter-party with reference to the loading of certain stone at a port called Porthoustock in Cornwall. I agree entirely with my Lord that the exception of losses arising from inter alia, unavoidable accidents or hindrances, namely, the exception in cl. 10 of the charter-party of Aug. 2, 1933, does not apply to accidents and preventions and so forth, incurred in the performance by the shipowners of the subsidiary or intermediate charter-party, that being a document and a contract which has nothing whatever to do with the charterers under the charter-party of Aug. 2, 1933, and one with regard to which they have no interest.

If that conclusion is arrived at, there remains nothing but the question of dates, and with regard to that I do not think it necessary to add anything to what my Lord has said. The conclusion I have arrived at seems to me to be supported by the decision in Barker v. M'Andrew (4), where there is a remarkably clear judgment of WILLES, J., and we find his view supported by BLACKBURN, J., and MELLOR, J., in the subsequent case of Harrison v. Garthorne (3) to which my Lord has referred. The vital part of the judgment of WILLES, J., in Barker v. M'Andrew (4), for the present purpose is where he said (18 C.B. (N.S.) at p. 772):

> "The commencement of the voyage is the commencing to do that for which the shipowner is to be paid freight," and there is no case contrary to that view. That accords with all the reported decisions except one, which I think has been doubted, and it applies to a case such as Harrison v. Garthorne (4), where there is no definition of the voyage, but where you have to collect from the terms of the charter-party what the voyage is contemplated as being. In all other respects, I agree entirely with what my Lord has said.

ROCHE, L.J.—I also agree. This case is for a small amount of money, but it raises some questions of nicety, which have been very well argued, as to the construction of this charter-party; as to the date on which this ship ought to have been ready to load; and as to the effect upon the contract of the intermediate charter-party which led to the result that the ship was not ready at the proper date. I agree so entirely with the reasoning of my Lord that I have nothing to add, except to make a few additional observations as to the scope and effect of the exceptions clause. I make these additional observations, but I desire that my judgment should not be understood to relate to any case but the present.

The question is this: The shipowners having very properly entered into intermediate engagements for their ship, and particularly the intermediate engagement which arose out of the charter-party of Aug. 31, did the fact that the voyaging of the vessel, in which I include the loading under that intermediate charter, was prolonged by reason of bad weather excuse the shipowners in respect of the non-arrival of their ship under the antecedent charter of Aug. 2, which is now in question? In my opinion, it did not, and for this reason. The argument for the shipowners is based upon the principle that the voyage in question, and the period in question under the exceptions, began from the time the charter of Aug. 2 was made, and from the time the vessel began to act upon and fulfil intermediate engagements. I have no doubt there are charter-parties in existence which do so provide, and I have no doubt there will be charter-parties in the future which will so provide, but I am satisfied that this charter-party did not so provide. The trouble arose because the parties applied a printed form of charter-party applicable to the case where the ship was about to enter upon the engagements covered by that charter-party, to a case where she was not going to enter upon them for six weeks, and was to perform an intermediate voyage. That charter-party required an alteration if it was to give the protection which was desired. I arrive at my conclusion from a brief examination of the clauses. As to cl. 1, it is apparent that the obligation to proceed with all convenient speed and the correlative obligation that the vessel should be tight, staunch and strong, that is to say, seaworthy for the voyage, arises at the same time, and, in my judgment, there was such an engagement with the charterers on the date, Aug. 2. The next clause that is material is cl. 3, which applies to this charter-party by reference certain provisions of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. Those provisions relate merely to the specific voyage which is to be made under the particular freight engagements in question; they do not refer to what I may call antecedent voyages. The next and last clause is cl. 10; that is what is called a mutual clause protecting both charterers and owners. I am satisfied that the charterers would not be protected under that clause if they could not prove that, by reason of the hindrances mentioned in the clause, they were hindered from bringing that vessel to the place of loading, and equally, in my opinion, the owners have a correlative and similar protection and no more; that is to say they are protected from that which may happen during the performance of the particular voyage which is stipulated for and regulated by that particular charter-party.

For those reasons I think this appeal fails as to liability, and I have nothing to add on the question of damages.

Appeal dismissed.

Highway—Negligence—Adjoining land unfenced—Reconstruction of highway making level of adjoining land lower than kerb—Dangerous drop—No liability on owner of adjoining land—Liability of highway authority.

When works have been done on a highway which render that highway dangerous, there is no obligation on the owner of adjoining land to fence his land or alter it in such a way as to remove the danger. His only obligation is not to allow his land to be used in such a manner as to constitute a nuisance to the highway or persons using it. A highway authority is liable for so altering the level of the highway in relation to the adjoining land as to create a danger to users of the highway.

Action tried before Branson, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff, Miss Nicholson, while walking along Station-road, Cheam, Surrey, at night, fell from the highway on to adjoining land belonging to the defendant landowner, the Southern Railway Company, which was unfenced, and broke her leg. She contended that the second defendants, the Sutton and Cheam Urban District Council, the highway authority, made up the road with the kerbing, and that thereafter the landowners, and (or) the highway authority negligently caused the level of the adjoining unfenced land to be and remain about 6 in. lower than the level of the edge or kerb of the highway. The landowners denied that they were guilty of any negligence. They did not admit that they were the owners of the land in question, but said that, if they were, they were not the occupiers of it, and were not responsible for its condition. They further denied that it was their duty to take care to see that there was fencing or lighting, or that warning was given to persons using the highway, or that they were responsible for the alleged or any danger or nuisance. The highway authority denied that they had committed any breach of duty to the plaintiff, or were guilty of any negligence, or that they had caused or permitted a nuisance. They pleaded that any injuries, loss, or damage sustained by the plaintiff were caused by the negligence of the landowners. Alternatively, they alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. [Since the date of the accident the urban district council has become a municipal borough.]

BRANSON, J.—This is an action in which the plaintiff, Miss Florence Mary Jane Nicholson, sues two defendants, the Southern Railway Company, the landowners, and the Sutton and Cheam Urban District Council, the highway authority, for damages for certain injuries which she sustained whilst walking along a road called Station-road, formerly Burdon-lane, at Cheam.

According to the evidence, which upon this point is undisputed, this particular bit of road consists of a pavement running outside and past a public-house called the Railway Hotel, and the pavement is a triangular piece, fairly wide, just by the public-house and running away to nothing where a privet hedge comes to meet the line of the outer kerb of the pavement. At that point there are, or there were at the time of the accident, three steps down to a steep path leading from the road down into a disused chalk pit; further on there was a kerb standing about 5½ in. above the soil on the path side of it and gradually coming nearer and nearer to the level of that soil until the levels became the same. The plaintiff was walking past the hotel, and continued on the pavement which gradually narrowed away to nothing; she stepped out into the road, but, assuming that the pavement continued on the other side of the privet bush which stood at the end of this little triangular bit of pavement, stepped back and fell down the slope and broke her leg. It is not, in my view, material to decide whether she fell actually on the steps, or whether she fell where there was a slope due to the kerb, which was set upon a haunching of concrete, which fell away down to the gravel of the path leading down into the pit. She herself cannot tell us whether she fell on the steps or just beyond. The gentleman who picked her up said she was lying just beyond. I think in all probability she must have missed the steps because there was nothing to make her turn so sharply round the privet hedge as to bring her to the top of the steps. I think it is much more probable that she had passed the 2 ft. or 2 ft. 6 in. of the width of the steps and come to the point where the kerb stood up upon its haunching some 5 in. or so above the beginning of the gravel path, and fell there. She suffered considerable injury, her leg was very badly broken, and she sustained severe bruising and shock. She was in a nursing home for some days, and had to have attention in her own house, which was given to her by a friend to save employing a nurse, and she had a variety of expenses to incur, as well as a considerable amount of pain to endure. As the result she puts in a claim for special damages amounting to £290. That includes a claim for loss of profits for taking guests in a guest-house, but it appeared quite plain from her own evidence that she was not to share the profits which might arise from the keeping of these guests, and therefore the £63 which she claims in respect of that loss of profit must come off her claim, which makes her special damages some £230. I think that, taking those damages and the pain and suffering and disability to which she has been put, the proper sum of compensation which she ought to receive from whomsover is liable is £500.

Now the question is whether she can recover from either or both of these defendants. The first defendants, the landowners, take up the position that they are not the owners of the land adjoining the highway at the point where the accident happened, and they say, secondly, that, if they are, they are still not liable to the plaintiff because they have done nothing, and nothing has been done, on their land to create a nuisance beside the highway, and consequently that, whatever may be the rights of the plaintiff against the urban district council, she has none against them.

The highway authority contend that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against them because of her contributory negligence, and they say that she ought to have seen that there was no pavement and that there was a hole down which she might fall; and they say, thirdly, that even if they are responsible, they are not solely responsible, but that the landowners are also responsible, because they have allowed their land adjoining the highway at this point to be in a condition which caused it to be a nuisance.

First of all, with regard to the defence of contributory negligence, I think that fails. Here was a place in which the plaintiff was invited by the presence of a properly made-up pavement to walk on that side of the road. It appears from the photographs and plans that to anyone coming along the road there would be presented the vista of a pavement continuing on the other side of the gap which went down to the pit, which was hidden by the privet hedge and the big privet bush at the point where the triangular piece terminated. It seems to me that a person might well consider in circumstances of this sort that it would be perfectly safe, having stepped out in the road to go round this bush, to ease in to the left expecting to find a continuance of the pavement upon that side. Therefore, the defence of contributory negligence fails, and it only remains to deal with the other defences raised.

I do not see that there is really any other defence for the highway authority. The history of the matter, so far as they are concerned, is this: Before 1930 this was a small country road with a tar-sprayed surface; the place where the pavement now is in the angle between the hedge and the hotel was rough gravel; the path down to the pit was rough gravel, and I have no doubt that the surface of the road fell away and joined the path which led down to the pit in a gradual slope without any kind of sudden drop, except perhaps where the steps are now. It is plain, I think, with regard to the steps that what is now the top step is a concrete kerb put in by the highway authority. The next step, which is of a similar concrete, was, I think, also either put in or replaced by them at the time when they made up the road and put in the kerb. The bottom step is obviously much older, and existed before 1930, though to what extent it was always apparent I am not clear. Some of the plans which have been produced to me show steps existing, others equally detailed do not show them, and Mr. Pinfold, who is the assistant estates agent to the landowners, and has many years of personal acquaintance with this position, says that he does not recollect their existence. I think that one of these steps was undoubtedly there and that at some time it was visible, though it may be at other times it was not. However, that does not appear to me to be material, because, until the work was done by the highway authority in 1930, I am satisfied that there was nothing which constituted a danger or a nuisance to the highway at this point. The highway joined the path down into the pit by an ordinary reasonable slope. I think that must have been so, because this was the only exit from the pit, and there is evidence that it was used by wheeled vehicles down at all events to quite recent times just before 1930.

In 1930 the highway authority was minded to turn the little country lane into a big thoroughfare, and plan No. 6 which has been produced shows what was done in that behalf. The road was widened to a very large extent and the level of it was raised by some 5 or 6 inches at about the point with which this case deals. The result was that the edge of the raised road where the road joins the path which went down into the pit stood up some 5½ in. Plan 12a, although its accuracy has been challenged in other respects, contains a section through the road and shows the drop. I have been told, and I accept it, that it shows with sufficient accuracy for the purpose of this case the nature of the drop. By doing that work the highway authority converted what was a perfectly safe bit of road into a road which was dangerous. This drop, coming as it did just behind this hedge and at the apex of the pavement, when that pavement was put in in 1933, made what appears to me to be a regular trap for pedestrians using that side of the road. I think it is not uninteresting to observe that down to 1930 there seems to have been no danger or difficulty at all. There is evidence on one side that wheeled vehicles used the road. At that time there was a footpath on the other side of the Burdon-lane, or Station-road, and no temptation for pedestrians to walk upon the pit side of the road. In 1933 the pavement was erected, and immediately accidents began to occur, through people doing just what the plaintiff in this case did, walking on the west side of the road past the public-house, expecting to find the condition of things which existed before the pavement came to a point to continue on the other side, and

A finding instead this sharp declivity, be it no more than 5 or 6 inches, which would be quite sufficient to cause an unsuspecting person to fall. That, in my opinion, gives a right to the plaintiff to claim against the highway authority. To make up a road like that without protection and to couple with it the invitation presented by this bit of triangular pavement was a misfeasance, which gives to the plaintiff, who has suffered injury by reason of it, a right to recover damages from the highway authority.

B That leaves the position of the landowners to be considered. I think that the case against the landowners may be summed up in the following way. It is said that they are the occupiers or owners of the land right up to the highway at this point, and that there is a common law obligation upon owners or occupiers of land adjoining a highway to prevent their land from ever becoming a nuisance, and that, therefore, as soon as the highway authority had raised the height of the highway so as to make a dangerous C drop between the highway and the landowners' land, it became the common law duty of the landowners either to fence their land, or to build it up so that this dangerous drop should cease to be. It seems to me that that is putting a new and intolerable burden upon the occupiers of land adjoining highways. No doubt the common law is very strict to ensure that land adjoining a highway should never be so used or allowed to get into such a condition as to make it a nuisance to the highway. It is not necessary to D refer in detail to a number of the well-known cases which have been cited in support of that proposition. I think it is enough to refer to Barnes v. Ward (1). Wherever one looks in order to see what is the obligation of an adjoining owner in respect of a highway, one finds this, that his obligation is not to allow his land to be used in such a way as to constitute a nuisance to the highway, or to those using the highway. What is sought to be said here is something entirely different, namely, that, when something has been E done, not upon the adjoining land at all, but upon a highway which makes that highway dangerous, some obligation is put upon the occupier of the adjoining land to alter his land, and to do away with the danger which has not been created by anything done upon his land at all, but by something which has been done on the highway. This is a completely new proposition of law so far as I am concerned, and one which does not seem to me to be supported by or to be deducible from any of the authorities which have F been cited. On the contrary, it seems to me that there are expressions in Fisher v. Prowse and Cooper v. Walker (2), which really tend in the opposite direction. It is true they are only dicta, but BLACKBURN, J., in delivering the judgment of the court (2 B. & S. at p. 780), deals with the presumption which arises where a nuisance and a highway are shown to have existed side by side beyond the memory of man, that the highway was dedicated subject to the nuisance. Having said that, he continues:

> G "If the use of the soil as a way is offered by the owner to the public under given conditions and subject to certain reservations, and the public accept the use under such circumstances, there can be no injustice in holding them to the terms on which the benefit was conferred. On the other hand, great injustice and hardship would often arise if, when a public right of way has been acquired under a given state of circumstances, the owner of the soil should be held bound to alter that state of H circumstances to his own disadvantage and loss, and to make further concessions to the public altogether beyond the scope of his original intention. More especially would this be the case when public rights of way have been acquired by mere user. For instance, the owner of the bank of a canal or sewer may, without considering the effect of what he is doing, permit passengers to pass along until the public have acquired a right of way there. It is often hard upon him that the public right I should have been thus acquired; it would be doubly so if the consequence were that he was bound to fill up or fence off his canal."

I am, of course, conscious that that is not dealing with the precise point with which I have to deal, but I think it is a fortiori a hardship if, as is suggested here, the authorities concerned with the maintenance of the highway can, by altering the highway in such a way as to constitute it dangerous, throw upon the owner of adjoining land or the occupier of adjoining land an obligation to make it safe. All the cases which have been cited, or of which I know, relating to the obligations of the occupier of adjoining land to prevent a nuisance to a highway from arising upon that land turn upon something which A has been done upon that land. Instances are A.-G. v. Tod-Heatley (3), Robbins v. Jones (4), and a number of other cases. To push that principle to the extent of saying that, if the highway is made unsafe by those who have charge of it, adjoining owners have got to take steps to do away with the danger by works done upon their own land would be to put a new and intolerable burden upon the occupiers of land adjoining highways.

The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover judgment against the highway B authority for £500 and that her action against the landowners fails. In the circumstances of this case, as she first of all applied to the highway authority, and they said they were not responsible, but the landowners were, and she then applied to the landowners, and they said it was nothing to do with them, but with the highway authority, she is entitled to the "Bullock" order in respect of the costs which she must pay to the landowners, in whose favour I propose to enter judgment in this case. C

It has been suggested that it may be material to decide whether or not the landowners are really the owners of this land up to the point where the accident took place, and it may be well that I should express my opinion upon it, though it is not material to my judgment. I think, having considered the maps and plans which have been produced, it is quite clear that this land was never conveyed to the landowners. I think, on the other hand, that they have used it, and that, at all events to the extent of claiming to D exercise a right of way themselves and to be in a position to grant a right of way to others, they have asserted an occupier's title over the land upon which the plaintiff fell off the edge of the kerb. I do not think the point is material to my judgment, because I hold that, even if they did own that land, they are not responsible.

R. v. PECKHAM

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Hewart, C.J., Lord Humphreys and Lord Singleton, L.JJ.), November 11, 1935]

Criminal Law—Indictment—Duty of prosecuting counsel—Character of accused—Prejudicial statement by witness—Application for trial to be started afresh—Duty of court.

It is the duty of prosecuting counsel, before opening the case, to acquaint himself with the terms of the indictment.

Where a prejudicial statement relating to a prisoner's antecedents has been made to the jury and defending counsel applies for the trial to be begun again, the court ought to begin the trial again before a fresh jury.

Where the accused is being tried on only one of two indictments, misreception of evidence which would be relevant only at a trial on the other indictment is a ground for quashing the conviction; it does not merely make the trial a nullity.

Notes. This case is to be contrasted with R. v. McDonnel (1928), 20 Cr. App. Rep. 163, in which it was held that the simultaneous trial of two indictments is a nullity. The principle laid down in this case as to prejudicial statements was re-affirmed in R. v. Firth, [1938] 3 All E.R. 783, and in R. v. Wattam, [1942] 1 All E.R. 178. In both these cases it was stated that it is essential for the objection to be made at the hearing and not reserved for an appeal against conviction. As to opening the case for the prosecution, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 416, para. 761, and for cases on the subject see 14 DIGEST (Repl.) 304, 2864–2871.

As to reasons for beginning a trial again before a fresh jury, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 426, para. 787, and for cases on the subject see 14 DIGEST (Repl.) 636–640, 6441–6508.

As to the admissibility of evidence of bad character, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 447, para. 823, and for cases on the subject see 14 DIGEST (Repl.) 410–412, 4008–4025.

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Wright (1934), 78 Sol. Jo. 879; 25 Cr. App. Rep. 35, C.C.A.; 14 Digest (Repl.) 670, 6785.

Appeal against conviction.

The appellant was convicted at Dorset Quarter Sessions on an indictment which charged him and another person with stealing, and alternatively with receiving, certain fowls, and was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labour. Owing to a general misunderstanding, evidence was admitted at the trial which was relevant not to the indictment being tried, but to another indictment, on which also the appellant had been arraigned at the same time, and to which also he had pleaded not guilty. During the trial a witness for the prosecution, in reply to a question put to him in cross-examination whether he had ever been into the appellant's house, said that he had been there while the appellant was away in prison. Defending counsel applied for the trial to be begun again before a fresh jury, but the application was refused. No warning with regard to the above statement was made in the summing up.

F. E. Hodgson, for the appellant.—At the trial evidence which was relevant only to the indictment on which the appellant was not being tried was wrongly admitted. Further, after the prejudicial statement with regard to the appellant's record had been made by the witness, the jury were never warned to disregard it. Application was made for the trial to be begun again with a fresh jury, and the court should have granted this.

W. Maitland Walker, for the Crown.—The irregularities complained of may have rendered the trial a nullity. It may have been the best course for the deputy-chairman to make no further reference to the unfortunate disclosure about the appellant's record, to avoid impressing it further on the jury. [He referred to R. v. Wright (1).]

The judgment of the court was delivered by

LORD HEWART, C.J.—It is clear from the transcript as well as from what has been said in this court that this trial proceeded when neither the deputy-chairman, nor the clerk of the peace, nor any of the three counsel who appeared from time to time on behalf of the Crown, nor counsel for the defence, knew with what the appellant was really charged. The appellant was first called upon to plead to both indictments, but he was given in charge to the jury on one indictment only. Nevertheless, the case was opened on behalf of the Crown, on all the materials of both indictments, and, as the trial on one indictment proceeded, evidence was given which was relevant only to the other indictment. Counsel for the Crown had not looked at the indictments. After the trial had gone a certain length on the footing that all the witnesses who could give evidence on one indictment only were available to give evidence on the other indictment, there was an adjournment, and then, the attention of the court being directed to the real state of affairs, the deputy-chairman told the jury to "wash out of their minds" the evidence which had been given before the adjournment.

Another matter which is complained of is that a certain witness for the prosecution, in reply to a question put to him in cross-examination whether he had been to the appellant's house, said that he had been in that house when the appellant was away in prison. The appellant's counsel raised an objection, and asked that the trial should be begun again with a new jury, but his objection was overruled. Moreover, no warning was afterwards given to the jury as to the admission of this statement. It may be that in particular cases and on particular facts it is not necessary for a reference to be made in the summing-up to a prejudicial statement of this kind inadvertently made by a witness. But there is a great difference between those cases and the present case in that here there was an application by counsel for the appellant that the trial should be started afresh. It was in those circumstances that the deputy-chairman refrained even from alluding to the topic when he came to sum up. In the opinion of this court, where a statement with regard to a prisoner's previous record is inadvertently made from the witness box to his prejudice, and his counsel applies for the trial to be begun again before another jury, the court ought to begin the trial again.

It is enough for the purposes of this appeal that there was misreception of evidence which was relevant only to the other indictment. Such misreception is fatal, and the effect is not merely to make the trial a nullity. But the irregularities in this case do not end there. The indictments are before the court. To one the appellant pleaded not guilty, and on that he was not tried; to the other he also pleaded not guilty, but on that he was tried and convicted. These indictments, however, are worth no more than waste paper. There is nothing on either of them to show that anything took place at all. Until the Evidence Act, 1851, the only evidence of the conviction of an accused person would have been the indictment itself, but by s. 13 of that Act it is provided that it is sufficient if it is certified under the hand of the clerk of the court or other officer having the custody of the records of the court where the conviction took place that the paper produced is a copy of the record of the indictment, trial, conviction and judgment, omitting the formal parts thereof. Here, if the indictment itself, or a true copy of it, were produced, it would have no more value than a piece of blank paper. There is no statement that the appellant has been convicted at all. Further, it may be observed that it was not necessary that there should have been two indictments: there need only have been one.

For the purposes of this appeal, however, it is enough to say that evidence was wrongly admitted, and the conviction must, therefore, be quashed and the appeal allowed.

Two things, however, clearly follow. First, counsel for the prosecution should always before opening acquaint themselves with the contents of the indictment; and secondly, where a prejudicial statement as to a prisoner's previous record is made to the jury, and counsel for the defence applies for the trial to be started afresh, the court should begin the trial afresh before another jury.

Conviction quashed

Master and Servant—Loss of service—Injury to servant through negligence of third person—Servant of Crown—Right of Crown to recover damages.

A master who, by the tortious act of a third person, has been deprived of the service of his servant is entitled to damages from the third person in respect of the deprivation.

Where, therefore, two men in the service of the Crown as members of the Royal Air Force sustained personal injuries through the negligent driving of a vehicle by the defendant's servant, and during the period of their incapacity the Crown continued to pay their wages and provided them with hospital treatment free of charge.

Held: the Crown were entitled to recover as damages from the defendant the amount of the wages and hospital expenses.

Notes. Latin informations were abolished by the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947: see Sched. I, para. 1. For civil proceedings by the Crown, see s. 23 of the Act.

In the present case the persons injured were persons in the service of the Crown. In A.-G. for New South Wales v. Perpetual Trustee Co., Ltd., [1955|) 1 All E.R. 846, the view was expressed that the relationship of master and servant did not exist between the Crown and a member of the armed forces, and, therefore, the present decision must be limited to cases where the person injured is a servant of the Crown in the ordinary sense of the relationship.

Latin Information by the Attorney-General, on behalf of His Majesty, claiming to recover from the defendant the sum of £306 16s. 8d. for (a) loss of services, and (b) hospital expenses incurred, as the result of injuries sustained by two airmen through the negligent driving of a lorry by the defendant's servant. The claim was based on the loss of the services of the injured men during their incapacity, whereby the Crown had lost the amount of their pay and allowances, and on the cost of their hospital treatment.

The defendant contended that the Crown could not recover payments which were unnecessary, or which could have been avoided. Payment of the wages could have been avoided by dismissing the injured men from the service, for they were employed at pleasure; and the hospital expenses were incurred voluntarily and not by reason of any contractual obligation.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Donald Somervell, K.C.) and Wilfrid Lewis for the Attorney-General.

J. Alan Bell for the defendant.

MACKINNON, J.—This case is a sequel to an accident on Dec. 5, 1930, when a motor lorry, driven by the servant of the present defendant, ran into two individuals who were riding a motor cycle. That collision caused injury to those two individuals, worse in the case of one than in the case of the other, and their condition was brought about owing to the negligence of the servant of the defendant. As the result of that, the two individuals would have a claim against the defendant for damages, and their claim in the ordinary course, as part of those damages, would include any loss of earning power, or loss of wages, during the period when the victims of the accident were incapacitated from working. The claim would include also any expenses for a nursing home or doctors which either of them had reasonably incurred. The two individuals did make a claim against the defendant, and did recover damages, but those damages cannot have included anything in respect of loss of earnings during the period of their incapacity, because, in fact, during their incapacity, they did not lose any earnings, but they were paid throughout the period of their incapacity by their employer, who is His Majesty, the two men being members of the Royal Air Force. Further they did not become liable to make payments to a nursing home, or a hospital, or medical attendants, because they did not incur expenses of that nature, and, therefore, they did not recover, and could not have recovered, damages in respect of such a liability from the defendant. They did not incur those expenses because those benefits were provided for them by their employers, His Majesty's Air Force.

This proceeding, which is by way of information, is now brought by the Attorney-General, on behalf of His Majesty, claiming damages against the defendant in respect of those two matters to which I have referred, namely, the wages paid to the two aircraftsmen during the period of their incapacity, and hospital and medical expenses provided for them by reason of this accident. It is a claim based upon the old common law principle that a master who has, by the tortious act of a third person, been deprived of the services of his servant, may claim damages in respect of that deprivation against the third person who has brought it about.

The information sets out the facts of the accident and goes on to say:

> "Whereby His Majesty lost the services of the said Jesse Donaldson Hull and the said Noel William Verney and all advantage which would otherwise have accrued to His Majesty from such services on and between the aforesaid respective dates, and His Majesty was put to other expense in and about the premises," and thereupon there is a claim for the wages paid during the men's incapacity, and for hospital and medical expenses.

There is not, I think, any doubt that a right of action by a master for the loss of the services of his servant exists, and has been recognised from quite early times. Curiously enough, it has been, perhaps, emphasised, and kept in activity more as a fictitious basis by which the seducer of a woman may be made to pay the penalty of his wrongdoing. It has been, and is, the only basis of a claim for seduction, and in that respect the fiction of service has been carried to extreme lengths, but in regard to the nature of the cause of action there is no doubt. The Solicitor-General referred me to several cases based upon that principle beginning with Hall v. Hollander (2) in 1825, which is most noticeably exemplified in Evans v. Walton (3). There is no doubt that when, by the tort of a third party, a master has lost the services of his servant he can recover damages in respect of that loss of service. The amount of those damages is, of course, dependent on the facts of the particular case. If he has got a substitute to do the work of the servant his damages may be the extra cost to which he has been put over and above the payment that he would otherwise be making to the servant who is incapacitated. If he has put an end to the services temporarily, and pays nothing to the injured servant, his damages would be the extra amount that he would have to pay to the substitute. The payment that he does make, if he makes it, to the injured servant by way of wages may be equivalent to, or more than, or less than, the actual damages, but in a case where the master does continue to pay the wages to the servant and does not employ a substitute, he has clearly lost any benefit arising from the payment of wages to the servant, because he is paying him wages and getting nothing in return for them. Therefore where he goes on paying the wages of the injured man, who is doing no work, primâ facie his damage is the wages that he has thus paid for nothing. In the present case that is the claim in regard to the wages that is made on behalf of His Majesty. There is nothing to show that any extra men were recruited to take the place of these men, or that any payment was made to anybody else when the men were, in fact, being paid during their incapacity, and they were, because of that incapacity, doing no work. Therefore, primâ facie, damage has been suffered to the extent of the wages thus paid to them for nothing. So much as regards the claim in respect of their wages.

In regard to medical expenses, or hospital treatment, the claim for damages is even more simple. It is put upon this ground: "I have, in fact, expended this amount, and, therefore, I have been put to that expense, which I ought to be compensated for," and that is the basis on which the claim for hospital and medical expenses is put in this case.

That being primâ facie the damages to which His Majesty would be entitled, the suggested answer in this case is: "This is simply a claim by a master for damages for the loss of his servant's services, and it must be treated, and decided on the common law principles applicable to that relationship. You cannot claim either of these types of expenses, because the incurring of them was not essential or necessary. They might have been avoided. The payment of wages to the men could have been avoided because they could have been dismissed the service directly they became incapable of doing their work, and that would have happened, because any servant of the Crown holds his office or employment solely at pleasure, and it can be determined at the will of the Crown at any moment. Therefore, by not retaining them in your service you could have avoided not merely any liability, because you were under no liability, but you could have avoided any expenditure in regard to payment of wages in fact. As regards the hospital and medical expenses, they were not incurred by reason of any obligation enforceable against the Royal Air Force, or His Majesty. They were incurred purely voluntarily. For those two reasons these pecuniary outlays have not been necessarily incurred, and therefore cannot be a ground of damage recoverable upon this cause of action."

It at once becomes apparent that this result, if the reasoning there suggested is sound, and if the action there suggested had been followed, namely, that these men had been dismissed, or their pay suspended during the period of their incapacity, would at once have increased the amount of damages which the men, as individuals, could have claimed against the defendant. As I have pointed out, if a man is incapacitated from doing any manual work owing to the negligent act of another person, his most obvious claim for damages is for loss of earnings by reason of the incapacity so created. In this case no such claim has been made by either of the aircraftsmen as an individual because, in fact, he has not lost his wages; they have been paid to him. It is now said, however, that the loss which has been sustained by His Majesty because the men, while doing no work, were paid their remuneration, cannot be recovered by His Majesty because he need not have paid them, although it is quite obvious that, if he had not paid them, the defendant would have been liable for exactly the same amount as an addition to the claim of the individual. The same reasoning applies, and the same result follows, as regards the hospital expenses. If the authorities of the Royal Air Force had refused, as I suppose that they could, to take the man into hospital, or insisted on his paying for being taken into hospital, a claim by the man as an individual would at once have arisen for the necessary expenses of providing himself with hospital accommodation and would have been added to his claim against the defendant.

In those circumstances I think that it is necessary to bear in mind that the real defence in this case is on a suggestion that the plaintiff cannot recover here because he has unnecessarily and unreasonably incurred, or inflated, his damages. It is really the point that was made in quite different circumstances in Admiralty Commissioners v. Owners of Steamship Amerika (1) ([1917] A.C. at p. 42), where Lord Parker said:

> "No person aggrieved by an injury is, by common law, entitled to increase his claim for damage by any voluntary act."

I think that that is perfectly sound. He is entitled only to those damages which he has incurred, acting reasonably, and if, acting reasonably, he could have avoided, or minimised, or reduced, the damage that he has sustained, it is only the smaller amount that he can recover, but I think that, in considering that proposition in regard to such a case as this, one must estimate the standard of reasonableness having regard to all the circumstances affecting the defendant. It is quite true to say that if by taking a reasonable course the officers of the Royal Air Force could have mitigated the amount of damages sustained by His Majesty in respect of this matter they ought to have done so, but I do not think that it is sound to suggest that it is, or that it must be, reasonable for them to take a course which would not, in truth, have diminished by a penny the real and ultimate liability of the defendant, because it would merely have transferred the claim of His Majesty to the alternative claim of the men themselves against the defendant. The fact that the Crown could have avoided the loss of the men's wages by not paying them would not have relieved the defendant of a liability for damages. It would have merely transferred the nature of that liability in the person who had to claim it. By the negligence of the defendant's servant these men were incapacitated from working for a certain amount of time. In respect of that incapacity, and the loss that it created, the defendant is liable. If the pecuniary loss fell upon the two men because they lost their wages, they would be the claimants. If, because the Crown has paid those wages, the loss falls upon the Crown, I think that the Crown can claim it, and that the defendant is not entitled to say, having regard to all the circumstances, that this is an unreasonable claim now put forward by the Crown. I think that that is a sufficient ground on which to decide this case in favour of the Attorney-General.

I ought, however, to say that reliance in the correspondence that passed before these proceedings was chiefly put by the defendant's advisers upon The Admiralty Commissioners v. Owners of Steamship Amerika (1). It seems to me that that was a totally different case. It was a claim against the owners of the steamer that had sunk a submarine to recover as part of the damages sustained the capitalised amount of pensions payable by the Admiralty to the relatives of the men who were drowned in the submarine after she sank. Some sentences from the opinion of Lord Sumner have been cited, and merely in their terms might seem to be in favour of the defendant in this case, but I think that it is sufficient to bear in mind the opening of his speech where Lord Sumner says:

> "It is clear that the action was not brought for the loss to a master of the services of his employees."

I think that that is perfectly true. It was not in respect of any loss of services, but it was in respect of suggested liability to his dependants by reason of the death of the employee.

In the present case the action, and the whole essence of the action, is a claim for the loss to a master of the services of the employee. These sums of money, unless it can be said that they were unnecessarily incurred, because they were only voluntarily incurred, clearly are damages to the master by reason, and by reason only, of the loss of the services of the servant. The only question is whether it can be said by the defendant that they were not reasonably incurred by the master. I think that, having regard to all the circumstances, and taking into account all the circumstances as judging the standard of reasonableness, they were reasonably incurred, and that, therefore, these damages are properly recoverable. The result is that there will be judgment for the Crown for the sum of £326 16s. 8d.

Re PEEL. TATTERSALL v. PEEL

[Chancery Division (Eve, J.), November 22, December 10, 1935]

[Reported [1936] Ch. 161; 105 L.J.Ch. 65; 154 L.T. 373; 80 Sol. Jo. 54]

Settlement—Marriage settlement—Trust—Construction—Annuity to widow and thereafter to pay or apply the same for or towards the maintenance, education, or benefit of any infant children as trustees thought fit—Whether a power or a trust—Whether trustees to retain and accumulate income or bound to apply it all for or towards maintenance, etc.—Meaning of "benefit."

A father, on the marriage of his son, covenanted by deed with trustees that if his son died in his lifetime he would pay them an annuity in trust for the wife so long as she should remain the widow of his son, and thereafter upon trust to pay or apply the same for or towards the maintenance, education, or benefit of any of the infant children of the marriage as the trustees might think fit. The marriage having been dissolved and the wife having re-married, the son subsequently died. His father being yet living, the annuity became payable. The only child of the marriage was an infant. The trustees contended that they had a power to accumulate income during the child's infancy and relied on the words "or benefit" in support of this contention.

Held: (i) the settlement created, not a mere power, but a trust, to apply the whole of the annuity for the maintenance, education, or benefit of the infant, and the trustees had no power to accumulate all or any part of the income for the benefit of the infant until he should attain the age of twenty-one years.

(ii) the word "benefit" covered expenditure not coming strictly under the heads of "maintenance" or "education."

Notes. Holding (i) applies only to cases in which the income must in any event be given to some of the infant beneficiaries: where an infant is not entitled to the income or some part of it on accumulation for a named infant may be "for his benefit." Re Vestey's Settlement, [1950] 2 All E.R. 891.

Construction Summons

The facts appear in the judgment of Eve, J.

J. L. Stone, for the trustees, stated the question.

H. A. Rose, for the widow, contended that there was an imperative trust to apply the income for or towards the infant's maintenance. He relied on Stocken v. Stocken (1), Meacher v. Young (2), Wilson v. Turner (3), and Lewin on Trusts, 13th edit., at p. 313.

J. L. Stone, for the trustees, contended that the deed conferred a power to apply the income for the purposes mentioned, and did not create a trust. [He referred to Ransome v. Burgess (4).]

S. M. Krusin, for the infant, contended that a part of the annuity sufficient for his maintenance and education, should be paid to the widow. Accumulation was not the same as application.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10. EVE, J.—On Nov. 17, 1919, on the occasion of the intermarriage on the day following of the late Lieutenant Owen Peel with the widow, Violet Margaret Florence Drummond, then Margaret Florence Jardine, Major Hugh Peel, the father of the bridegroom, as part of the arrangements entered into on the treaty for the said intended marriage, executed a deed of covenant with the widow that if the intended marriage should take place, and if the said Owen Peel should die in the lifetime of Hugh Peel, then and if and so long as any issue of the intended marriage should be living, but not otherwise, the said Hugh Peel would, during the remainder of his life pay to the trustees for the time being of the deed the clear yearly sum of £1,000 free of all deductions except income tax as from the day of the death of the said Owen Peel by equal quarterly payments on the usual quarter days. And it was thereby agreed and declared that the trustees should hold the said yearly sum payable under the covenant thereinbefore contained upon trust so long as the widow should remain the widow of the said Owen Peel, and should there be issue living of the intended marriage, to pay the same to the widow, and from and after her death or remarriage,

> "upon trust to pay or apply the same in manner thereinafter provided to or for the benefit of the children or child for the time being living of the said intended marriage, and the children or child for the time being living of any deceased child of the said intended marriage and if more than one in equal shares per stirpes."

And by cl. 3 of the deed it was provided that the share of any child or more remote issue of the said intended marriage who should for the time being be an infant, and in the case of a female, a spinster, should be applied by the trustees for or towards his or her maintenance, education, or benefit in such manner as the trustees should think fit, and so that the trustees might either themselves so apply the same or might pay the same to the parent or other the guardians or guardian for the time being of such infant for the purpose aforesaid without seeing to the application thereof.

The infant defendant is the only issue of the marriage. He was born on Oct. 7, 1920. The marriage was dissolved on the wife's petition in September, 1927, and in 1929, she married again, and is now the wife of Captain Drummond. Her former husband, Mr. Owen Peel, died on March 25, 1935, and as from that date, Major Hugh Peel's covenant has come into operation.

On the dissolution of the marriage of the infant's parents, the custody of the infant was remitted to the widow, his mother, and the cost of his maintenance and education, first at a preparatory school and, at the present time, at Stowe, has been wholly defrayed by her. The infant, in due course, will succeed to property, the income of which will be available for his enjoyment, but there may be delay in getting possession, and duties will have to be provided for.

The trustees maintain that, according to the true construction of the deed of covenant, they are at liberty in the circumstances to accumulate the whole or any part of the said yearly sum, and to hold such accumulations for the benefit of the infant after he has come of age. The widow takes a different view, and contends that the deed is not to be construed as a mere power but as creating a trust under which the trustees are bound to apply the fund for the purposes therein named. She admits that the manner in which the money is to be divided between the several purposes is left to the discretion of the trustees, and that the court will not control that discretion so long as it is exercised in good faith and in accordance with the trust.

In my opinion, this latter view is the correct one. I think the trust is a compulsory one to apply the whole fund for the maintenance, education, and benefit of the infant or for any one or more of such purposes, and that the trustees have no power to retain any part of the fund for the purposes they suggest. Such a procedure would involve retention, not application, and be a breach of trust. I am not overlooking the words "or benefit" to which attention was directed in the argument in support of the construction for which the trustees contended. I do not see that they carry the weight attributed to them in support of that contention. In the bringing up of the infant there must occasionally arise doubts whether any particular expenditure comes under "maintenance" or "education," and the words in question relieve the trustees from the burden of solving such a question if they are satisfied that the expenditure is for his benefit.

Shipping—Charterparty—Construction—Charter not a demise—Charterers to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer, including . . . decks, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and (or) stores)—Right of shipowners to carry passengers.

A charterparty, which was not a demise of the ship, provided that a steamer should carry a cargo of grain from the River Plate to ports in Europe. By cl. 6 thereof: "The charterers are to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer, including the 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poops, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and (or) stores)." The charterers claimed that the shipowners were not entitled to carry passengers.

Held: cl. 6 did not exclude the right of the shipowners to carry passengers on the voyage from the River Plate to Europe, in so far as to do so was not inconsistent with the other obligations they had undertaken towards the charterers.

Action claiming a declaration that under the terms of two charterparties in the form known as "Centrocon," the defendant shipowners were not entitled to carry passengers in either of the chartered ships. The two ships, the Harpasa and the Harcalo, had been chartered by the plaintiff charterers to load and carry cargoes of grain from the River Plate to European ports. One of the ships was lying in that river loaded and ready to sail when the action was heard, and the owners proposed to carry passengers in her on the voyage to Europe.

The charterparties, which were not demises of the ships, each contained the following clause (cl. 6):

> "The charterers are to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer, including the 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poops, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and (or) stores)."

The other material parts of the charterparty are set out in his Lordship's judgment.

The charterers contended that the shipowners were not entitled to carry passengers. The charterparty was silent on the point, but it placed at the disposal of the charterers the whole of the vessel for the carriage of their goods, and that, it was submitted, was inconsistent with the owners using any part of her to carry passengers. The point was novel, but in Shaw, Savill & Co. v. Aitken, Lilburn & Co. (1) it had been held conversely that, under a similar charter, the charterers might not carry passengers. The presence on board of passengers might be injurious to the plaintiffs, since the ship might be detained in quarantine.

The shipowners contended that, as the charters were not demises, the owners remained in possession and control of the ships and were entitled to use them as they pleased, provided that such use did not prevent them from fulfilling their obligations to the charterers. The carriage of passengers would not interfere with the fulfilment of those obligations.

Cyril Miller for the charterers.
W. L. McNair for the shipowners.

BRANSON, J.—This action raises a short point in the following way. The plaintiffs are the charterers of two steamships, the Harpasa and the Harcalo. The charterparties are, mutatis mutandis, identical, the one having been entered into on April 11, 1935, and the other on the next day. The Harpasa is now loading in the River Plate, and a dispute has arisen between the plaintiffs, the charterers, and the defendants, the owners, whether the owners are entitled or not entitled to take on board certain passengers for the homeward voyage. The way in which the case is put for the charterers is this: it is said that the charterparty is on the face of it the ordinary charterparty for the carriage of goods, as distinguished from passengers, from the River Plate to European ports, and that, if it be held that the owners are entitled to carry passengers, that will so alter the original intention of the parties to the contract as to amount to a deviation such as was discussed in Glynn v. Margetson & Co. (2) and A.-G. v. Benjamin Smith & Co. (3). On the other hand, it is said on behalf of the shipowners: This is our ship and, in so far as we have not parted with our right to use it or any portion of it by our contract with the plaintiffs, we are entitled to do with it whatsoever we like. Counsel for the shipowners then goes on to say: If one looks at the charterparty it will be found that the carriage of passengers is not prohibited, because that is not inconsistent with any of the obligations which the shipowners have undertaken to the charterers.

That being the position, I look at the charterparty, by which it is agreed between the owners and the charterers that the steamer shall proceed as ordered by the charterers to one of the under-mentioned ports, and there receive for them a full and complete cargo, except as qualified by cl. 19, of wheat and (or) maize and (or) rye. Then it provides for the ports at which the ship shall load, and cl. 4 states:

> "Being so loaded the steamer shall with all reasonable speed therewith proceed to St. Vincent (Cape Verde) or Las Palmas or Teneriffe (Canary Islands) or Madeira or Dakar, at the master's option, for orders (unless these be given to him by charterers on signing bills of lading) to discharge at Liverpool, Birkenhead, Manchester, Cardiff, Barry, Avonmouth, Swansea, London, Hull, Antwerp, Rotterdam, or Amsterdam (one port)."

Cl. 6 gives an option to the charterers to ship other lawful merchandise instead of wheat, or maize, or rye, which was provided for by cl. 2, and an argument is raised on that clause to which I shall have to refer later. Cl. 19 is a clause which expands the provisions of cl. 2 with regard to the obligation to load a full and complete cargo, and it provides that the ship need not load more than 7,480 tons and is not to load less than 6,120 tons, and, provided that she has loaded her cargo within the above-mentioned limits, it is not incumbent on the master to sail with a full and complete cargo. Cl. 21 provides for the signing of the bills of lading on the form printed on the back of the charterparty, cl. 22 provides for orders as to the port of discharge, and cl. 23 gives the charterers an option of ordering the steamer from the port of call to go to Falmouth for final orders to discharge. Cl. 29 is an exceptions clause which provides among other things, that the steamer is not to be liable for loss or damage caused by quarantine restrictions, and an argument is based on that. It is also provided:

> "The steamer shall have the liberty to call at any port or ports in any order for the purpose of taking bunker coal or other supplies, to sail without pilots, to tow and be towed, to assist vessels in distress and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property."

That being the charterparty, one thing is perfectly plain—that it does not amount to a demise of the ship. That being so, I must begin the consideration of this case by bearing in mind that the defendants are the owners of the ship, and, in so far as they have not restrained their full rights of ownership by the charterparty, those rights remain in them. Counsel for the charterers contends that the shipowners have restricted their rights by entering into a charterparty which is one for the conveyance of grain from the River Plate to European ports, and which says nothing expressly about passengers. He says that, when one considers the possible effects of carrying passengers, it will be found that to do so is inconsistent with the obligations undertaken. I think that if it could be said that to carry passengers was inconsistent with the obligations undertaken, then the charterers would be right. The question is whether that can be said.

The first way in which it is suggested that the carriage of passengers is inconsistent with those obligations is that to take on passengers increases the risk of the ship being detained in quarantine. The next way in which it is put is that, if the taking on of passengers did lead to delays of the ship, the c.i.f. buyer of the grain which has been shipped might claim to reject for the delay. The third contention is that the c.i.f. buyer, when he got the bill of lading, would expect it to be a bill of lading given by the shippers of one cargo which was to be delivered at one port, and that if he found that there were passengers whose presence had necessitated one of them having to be landed, in order to save his life, because he was ill, that might give rise to a claim arising from delays on the voyage.

Dealing with these points, I think the answer to them is as follows. If the contract contains nothing to prevent the ship from carrying passengers, then neither the charterer nor any holder of a bill of lading given by the charterer could have any claim or right of rejection arising out of any delay which the carriage of the passengers might cause, because ex hypothesi to carry passengers would be one of the rights of the ship which had not been defeated by contract. Unless, therefore, it can be said that the matters which are put forward under this head are such that by reason of them the shipowner must be taken by implication to have agreed not to carry passengers, there is no force in that argument at all. With regard to terms to be implied, in order to imply a term in a contract between two commercial men who are sitting down to make a contract in writing one must be able to conclude that, if the point had been raised when they were discussing the contract, they would both have said: Well, that goes without saying, we need not put it in. If one cannot find that amount of certainty about the matter the court will not imply a term into a written contract. It cannot possibly be said that the rather far-drawn possibilities of trouble which might arise from the carriage of passengers could ever have been treated, if it had occurred to anybody to think of them at all, in the way in which they would have had to be treated before one could imply a term into this charterparty that the shipowners would not carry passengers.

The last way in which it is said that the charterparty has disentitled the shipowners from the carrying of passengers is that under cl. 6 of the charter

> "The charterers are to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer including the 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and (or) stores)."

Counsel for the charterers quite fairly and frankly admits that in a charterparty the words "full reach and burthen of the steamer" apply primâ facie to cargo spaces only. That was decided by Weir v. Union S.S. Co. Ltd. (4), and no question can arise on that. It is said, however, that this clause expands the meaning of those earlier words by going on to include the 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc., and it is argued that the passenger accommodation which this ship possesses may be held to come within that description so that the right to use that accommodation has been taken from the shipowners and handed over to the charterers. Dealing with the matter first apart from authority, I should hold that, when one looks at this sentence as a whole, one does not get any such extension of the ordinary primâ facie meaning attached to the words "full reach and burthen of the steamer." I cannot think that it was ever intended that any part of the accommodation of the ship which was not cargo space in the ordinary acceptance of that term could be included, in view of the provision "provided the same are not occupied by bunker coals and (or) stores." In other words, the generality of the earlier words has to be controlled by the proviso which indicates that the spaces which are intended to be dealt with in the earlier words are to be spaces which might in the ordinary course be used for bunker coals and (or) stores. I do not think that anybody considering the passenger accommodation which we know that this ship possessed would, with that language before him, conceive the possibility of filling the state rooms or the dining-room with either bunker coals or stores, any more than he would think of filling the captain's cabin or the officers' rooms or the accommodation of the crew. Therefore I think that the argument for the charterers that the shipowners have disentitled themselves from carrying passengers by having entered into this charterparty fails.

I have come to that conclusion apart from authority, but I think that Shaw, Savill & Co. v. Aitken, Lilburn & Co. (1), properly looked at, is an authority for the view which I am taking of this charterparty. In that case an action was brought by charterers against the shipowners in the following circumstances. The vessel was chartered to go to Wellington, in New Zealand, and there to receive a full and complete cargo in consideration of a lump sum freight. The vessel went to Wellington and there loaded a full and complete cargo of lawful merchandise, the cabin spaces being left unoccupied. The charterers then desired to fill those cabin spaces by carrying passengers to England, and their right to do so was disputed by the shipowners. The charterers and the shipowners thereupon agreed that the space should be used and that the passengers should be carried for the benefit of whom it might concern. This was done, and then both parties sought to adduce evidence to prove a custom, the charterers to prove a custom that in some circumstances they should have the use of the cabins, the shipowners to prove a custom that they should have the use of the cabins. The case came before DENMAN, J., who found that both parties failed altogether to prove any custom at all. He therefore proceeded to decide the case on the construction of the charterparty. The judgment, which is quite short, proceeds as follows (Cab. & El. at p. 196):

> "The attempt to prove a custom utterly failed on both sides; nothing of the sort exists. The matter must therefore be decided on the construction of the charterparty and the authorities bearing on the point. Mr. Cohen contended that the authorities show there is no right to use the cabin space for cargo. Mr. Bigham, while admitting that there was no demise of the ship, contended that, when the whole charterparty was looked at, it amounted to an undertaking that the plaintiffs should have the use of the whole ship, and that although passengers were not cargo, yet the plaintiffs, having the use of the ship, might use the ship for passengers."

Then the learned judge refers to the argument with regard to the tonnage and goes on:

> "Reliance was also placed on the words 'use and hire of the ship.' In my opinion, however, these words are used indifferently; and the meaning is that the charterer should have the use or hire of the ship for the purpose of carrying lawful produce and merchandise only, and not passengers. The ship is at their disposal for a particular purpose only. The defendants are therefore entitled to the freight earned by the carrying of the passengers."

That judgment is not expressly put on the grounds on which I am basing my judgment, but I think that those are the grounds on which that case was decided.

Starting, therefore, from the fact that, unless they have precluded themselves from carrying passengers in their ship, the shipowners are entitled to do so, and holding, as I do hold, that there is nothing in the charterparty which does so preclude them, the net result is that the declaration asked for by the plaintiffs cannot be made, nor can the injunction for which they ask be granted.

Judgment for the shipowners.

ALEXANDER v. RAYSON

[Court of Appeal (Greer, Romer, and Scott, L.JJ.), October 21, 22, 23, November 25, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 169; 105 L.J.K.B. 148; 154 L.T. 205; 52 T.L.R. 131; 80 Sol. Jo. 15]

Contract—Illegality—Lease of flat and agreement for services—Intention of landlord fraudulently to use documents to reduce rateable value of flat.

In an action by a landlord against the tenant of a flat for rent under the lease and for payments under a contract for services, evidence was given that the annual rent was £450, and the annual payment under the contract £750—£1,200 in all; that with slight exception the services provided for under the contract were provided for under the lease; and that the execution of the two documents was obtained by the landlord for the purpose of defrauding the rating authority, by deceiving them as to the true rateable value of the flat, inducing them to believe that the only payment received by the landlord in respect of the premises was £450, and concealing from them the terms of the contract. It was also proved that the landlord produced the lease, but not the agreement, to the assessment committee who reduced the valuation of the flat but restored their original assessment when the facts were brought to their notice.

Held: the landlord, by his intention to use the lease and the agreement, though not the flat itself, for an illegal purpose, had placed himself in the same position in law as though he had let the flat intending that it should be used for such a purpose; the fact that he had failed in his attempted fraud and could no longer use the documents for an illegal purpose did not afford him a locus penitentiae, for his illegal purpose had been partially effected; and, therefore, he was not entitled to enforce either the lease or the agreement.

Scott v. Brown, Doering, McNabb & Co. (1) [1892] 2 Q.B. 724 applied.

Per curiam: In an action tried by a judge without a jury it is highly inconvenient, at the end of the case of the party having the onus of proof, for the opposing party to ask for the ruling of the judge whether there is any case for him to answer, for in such a case the judge is the judge of fact and it is not right that he should be asked to express any opinion on the evidence until it is completed.

Appeal from DU PARCQ, J.

The plaintiff, Mr. Alexander, the leaseholder, let a flat to the defendant, Mrs. Rayson, by an underlease at the rate of £450 a year. By an agreement in writing the plaintiff agreed to render the defendant the usual services for an annual payment of £750 a year. Except for the provision and maintenance under the agreement of a frigidaire, the services to be provided by the underlease and under the agreement were substantially the same. Both the underlease and the agreement were dated Oct. 29, 1929, and the defendant entered into possession of the flat. The defendant paid the plaintiff £1,200 a year up to and including Midsummer, 1934. On Sept. 29, 1934, the defendant tendered to the plaintiff £112 10s., a quarter's rent under the underlease, but refused to pay the £187 10s. claimed under the agreement, alleging that the plaintiff had failed to perform his obligations thereunder. The plaintiff refused the tender and issued his writ for £300. By her defence the defendant pleaded that: (i) there was no consideration for the agreement, and (ii) there was failure by the plaintiff to perform his obligations under both instruments, which he had thereby repudiated. She also pleaded the tender, paying £112 10s. into court, and counter-claimed for damages for failure by the plaintiff to fulfil his obligations under both documents. Later she amended her defence by adding this statement:

> "The defendant will object that the said agreement is void for illegality and that its enforcement would be contrary to public policy in that its execution was obtained by the plaintiff for the purposes of defrauding the Westminster City Council by deceiving them as to the true rateable value of the said premises and by inducing them to believe that the true rent received by the plaintiff in respect of the said premises was £450 and by concealing from them the terms of the said agreement."

At the trial, DU PARCQ, J., holding that the onus was on the defendant, her case was opened on the two issues that the agreement was unenforceable, as (i) there was no consideration for it and (ii) it was void for illegality. Evidence was given for the defendant that the plaintiff had objected to £720, the gross assessment of the flat, and, appearing before the assessment committee, had produced the underlease, but not the agreement, and stated that £450 was the only amount he received for rent, services, and rates; that the gross valuation was reduced to £270; that on inquiry of the defendant the existence of the agreement was discovered and, after hearing the plaintiff, the assessment committee restored the gross assessment of £720.

At the conclusion of the defendant's case, the plaintiff submitted that there was "no evidence in law," and DU PARCQ, J., held (i) that there was consideration for the agreement, and (ii) that, on the assumption the above-mentioned evidence was true, the agreement was not unenforceable for illegality. The defendant appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25. ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. Mr. Alexander, the respondent to this appeal, is the owner of a leasehold block of flats at 142, Piccadilly, in the city of Westminster. In July, 1929, the appellant, Mrs. Rayson, approached the respondent with a view to taking an underlease of the flat on the second floor of these premises at a rent of £1,200 a year, such rent to cover the provision by the respondent of the services that are usual in such cases. The respondent, accordingly, forwarded to the appellant two documents, one being a draft sub-lease of the flat at a rent of £450 a year, the other being a draft agreement for the rendering by the respondent during the term of the sub-lease of various services in connection with the flat in consideration of the payment by her of the additional sum of £750 a year. It is by no means unusual in the case of a lease of a flat to have the actual lease of the premises in one document and to provide for the rendering of the customary services in another. The strange thing in this case was that the draft lease itself provided for the rendering of such services, or, at any rate, the greater part of them, without any payment by the appellant other than the rent of £450, and that the agreement provided for the rendering of practically the same services with some small additions in consideration of the extra £750 a year. In a later part of this judgment we shall have to compare the services to be provided under the lease with those to be provided under the agreement. For the moment it is sufficient to state that, except for the provision and maintenance under the agreement of a frigidaire, they were substantially the same. In due course the two drafts were approved on behalf of the appellant, and the engrossments were prepared, executed, and exchanged without any suspicion on her part, or on the part of her advisers, that there was anything sinister about the form of the two documents, or that any improper use of them could or was intended to be made. The instruments were both dated Oct. 29, 1929, and the appellant in due course entered into possession of the flat.

The annual sum of £1,200 was paid by the appellant quarterly up to and including the instalment falling due at Midsummer, 1934; but, holding the view somewhat strongly that the respondent had failed to comply with his obligations in respect of the services to be rendered by him under the sub-lease and agreement, she refused to pay him the quarterly instalment of the £750 falling due on Sept. 29 of that year. She tendered to him, however, the sum of £112 10s., being the quarter's rent payable on that day under the sub-lease. This tender was refused by the respondent, and on Oct. 12, 1934, he issued the writ in this action claiming the full sum of £300, being the quarter's instalment payable under the two documents. By her defence as originally delivered, the appellant contended: (i) That there was no consideration for her agreement to pay the £750 a year; and (ii) that the respondent had not performed his obligations under the lease or the agreement and had thereby repudiated them both and was not entitled to maintain the action. In addition she counterclaimed for damages in respect of the respondent's alleged failure to observe the covenants and agreements on his part contained in the two documents. She also pleaded the tender of the £112 10s. and brought that sum into court. The action was in due course set down for trial, but shortly before it came on for hearing the appellant, by leave, amended her defence by adding the following paragraph:

> "2 (a). The defendant will object that the said agreement is void for illegality, and that its enforcement would be contrary to public policy in that its execution was obtained by the plaintiff for the purposes of defrauding the Westminster City Council by deceiving them as to the true rateable value of the said premises and by inducing them to believe that the true rent received by the plaintiff in respect of the said premises was £450 and by concealing from them the terms of the said agreement."

If the facts alleged in this paragraph are true, it obviously raises a question of law of both difficulty and importance. Demurrers have been abolished, but had both parties been willing or had the court or a judge on the application of either party so directed, such question of law could have been decided before the trial of the action under R.S.C. Order XXV, r. 2. Had the decision upon it been adverse to the appellant, that is to say had it been decided that, even assuming the facts alleged in the new paragraph to be true, such facts afforded no defence in law, the expense of calling witnesses as to those facts at the trial would have been avoided. This course was not, however, pursued, and the whole action came on for trial before du Parcq, J., on May 17, 1935. At the hearing it was contended on behalf of the appellant, that is to say, the defendant, that, as the onus was upon her of establishing one or more of her defences, she had the right of opening. This contention was acceded to by the learned judge, and the appellant's counsel thereupon opened her case upon the issues (i) of absence of consideration for the agreement of Oct. 29, 1929, and (ii) of illegal purpose, and then called witnesses upon these two points. Her defence and counterclaim, based upon the alleged repudiation by the respondent of both lease and agreement, was not for the moment embarked upon. These witnesses deposed to the following effect: that in the valuation list for the parish of the city of Westminster, made in or about Jan. 16, 1930, the flat in question had been assessed at £720 gross and £597 net; that on the 9th August following the respondent gave notice of objection to such valuation and assessment; that in support of such notice of objection the respondent appeared before the assessment committee on Oct. 6, 1930; that he then said that the rent of the flat was £450 a year inclusive of rent, taxes and services, and that £450 was the only amount he received in respect of rents, services and rates; that the lease was then produced, but the agreement was not; that thereupon the gross valuation of the flat was reduced in the provisional list from £720 to £270; that inquiry was thereafter made of the appellant on behalf of the valuation authority as to the terms of her tenancy, and that the existence of the agreement of Oct. 29, 1929, was thereupon disclosed by her; that the respondent, accordingly, attended again before the assessment committee on Nov. 12, 1930, when, in response to a request for an explanation, he gave a "rather evasive reply"; that on this occasion he contended that the agreement was confidential and that the committee could not alter their previous decision; and that the committee did, however, alter their previous decision and restored the original figures of £720 gross and £597 net.

If this evidence is to be accepted it is obvious that the respondent attempted to perpetrate a gross fraud upon the rating authorities, and through them upon the Inland Revenue. The attempt, indeed, failed, but only by reason of the disclosure by the appellant, at the instance of the assessment committee of the agreement of Oct. 29, 1929, the existence of which had been concealed by the respondent. The inference is that the respondent, in causing the appellant's tenancy to be created and constituted, by the unusual method that he adopted, intended by means of that device to perpetrate the fraud. In these circumstances one would have expected the respondent to take the earliest opportunity of going into the witness box to repel, if he could, the serious charge that had been made against him. This course was not adopted. At the conclusion of the appellant's evidence the respondent's counsel submitted that there was no case to answer upon the two issues which at that stage had alone been presented to the court, that is to say the issues of no consideration and of illegality. Where an action is being heard by a jury it is, of course, quite usual and often very convenient at the end of the case of the plaintiff, or of the party having onus of proof, as the appellant, the defendant, had here, for the opposing party to ask for the ruling of the judge whether there is any case to go to the jury who are the only judges of fact. It also seems to be not unusual in the King's Bench Division to ask for a similar ruling in actions tried by a judge alone. We think, however, that this is highly inconvenient. For the judge in such cases is also the judge of fact, and we cannot think it right that the judge of fact should be asked to express any opinion upon the evidence until the evidence is completed. Certainly no one would ever dream of asking a jury at the end of a plaintiff's case to say what verdict they would be prepared to give if the defendant called no evidence, and we fail to see why a judge should be asked such a question in cases where he and not a jury is the judge that has to determine the facts. In such cases we venture to think that the responsibility for not calling rebutting evidence should be upon the other party's counsel and upon no one else.

This, however, is by the way; for no one can suggest that, when the appellant's case upon the two issues has been concluded, she did not establish a primâ facie case as to the facts on the second issue. Nor, of course, did the respondent's counsel make any such suggestion. What he did ask the learned judge to rule was that, accepting the evidence given on the appellant's behalf, there was no case to answer in law. We cannot help regarding this as not only an irregular but also as a most inconvenient procedure. The witnesses of the respondent were presumably in court, and the expense of their attendance had already been incurred. We gather that the learned judge had not or might not have had sufficient time at his disposal to proceed with the issue of repudiation; but we cannot find that there would have been any difficulty in completing the evidence upon the other two issues. The learned judge, however, acceded to the request of the respondent's counsel and gave a ruling of law upon the evidence as it then stood, deciding the two issues of want of consideration and want of legality in favour of the respondent. As the appellant's counsel desired to challenge this decision or ruling in the Court of Appeal, and considered that such an appeal would be one from an interlocutory order, he asked for and obtained from the learned judge leave to appeal.

The question not unnaturally arose as to the procedure to be followed after the appeal had been disposed of, and, as we understand, both parties agreed that, if the appeal should succeed, the hearing of the action should be resumed before the learned judge himself in order that the respondent's evidence upon the two issues might be given. It seems also to have been agreed that the hearing of the counterclaim should be postponed until after the decision of the Court of Appeal, and that matter will presumably have to be dealt with by the learned judge whatever may be the decision of this court. A formal order was drawn up in due course and, so far as is material, is in these terms:

> "The judge having held that the evidence before the court discloses no defence on the issue of true consideration for the supplemental agreement made between the parties and dated Oct. 29, 1929, or on the issue raised by the defendant in par.

> 2A of the amended defence and counterclaim hereon, it is ordered that the costs of such issues be taxed and paid by the defendant to the plaintiff. And it is further ordered that there be liberty to appeal and in that event the costs when taxed are to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff's solicitor within fourteen days of the Taxing Master's certificate on the personal undertaking to return the same if the appeal be successful. And it is further ordered that the trial of the counterclaim do stand over and that if notice of appeal be given and entered then there be liberty to apply after the hearing of such appeal." A B

The money in court was by the order directed to be paid out to the respondent or his solicitor. The order, appropriately enough, is headed by the words "New Procedure." So new, indeed, and so irregular did the procedure seem to us that when the appeal came on for hearing we thought at first that we ought not to deal with it unless and until the evidence relating to the second of the two issues had been completed. Both parties, however, urged us to hear and dispose of the appeal upon the material before us in order to save expense, and this we ultimately consented to do. The consequences may, however, be unfortunate for the respondent. If we allow the appeal, he will of course be given the opportunity of proving himself innocent; on the other hand, should we dismiss the appeal, he will be in the position of having been proved in a court of justice by uncontradicted evidence to be a fraudulent rascal. It is in such circumstances—and we sincerely trust that the like may never occur again—that we proceed to deal with the two issues that are before us. C D

The first of these is the question whether there was any consideration for the agreement of Oct. 29, 1929. The appellant contends that there was not, inasmuch as the agreement merely provided for services to be rendered by the respondent that he was already bound to render under the sub-lease of the same date, such sub-lease having in fact been executed before the execution of the agreement. Turning to the agreement it will be found that the respondent thereby expressly agreed: (i) To provide the appellant with a sufficient continuous supply of hot water; (ii) to cause the flat to be sufficiently heated from a central heating plant installed in the building by means of radiators installed in the flat from approximately Sept. 1 until about May 1, dependent upon the outside temperature; (iii) to provide a resident porter on the premises for the convenience of the appellant in common with other tenants, the duties of such porter to include removal of all refuse from the flat and the delivery of coal to the flat from the cellar; (iv) to install in the flat and during the tenancy to maintain a frigidaire for the use of the tenant. The respondent also impliedly agreed to pay all rates, taxes, assessments, water, tithes, and other payments in respect of the flat, to maintain and keep up the said building and the working of the electric passenger and trade lifts, and the lighting of the halls, corridors, and staircases of the respondent's premises. E F G

By the sub-lease the respondent covenanted expressly (i) to pay the ground rent and all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever imposed or charged on the demised premises; (ii) to maintain and keep the roof, drains, sewers, main walls, timbers and structure of the building and the entrance hall, passenger lifts, staircases and landings and other parts of the premises intended for the common use of all tenants and occupiers of the said building in good repair and condition and to keep the said entrance hall and staircase and landings well lighted and cleaned; (iii) to provide an adequate supply of hot water for the use of the appellant, her family, guests, and servants at all reasonable times, and also to keep the demised premises suitably and properly heated by means of the central heating apparatus installed therein, and to keep the hot water and central heating apparatus in good and sufficient repair. The respondent also impliedly covenanted to employ a porter (though possibly not a resident porter), inasmuch as one of the appellant's covenants required her to have H I

> "all coals required brought up from the cellars and all refuse taken down to the dustbin by the porter employed by the lessor."

It will be observed that in some respects the obligations undertaken by the lessor under the agreement differed slightly from those undertaken by him under the sub-lease.

A Why this should have been so we do not know. The respondent may have had some reason for it, but he has not yet been into the witness box to explain the mystery. But it is plain that, except for the provision and maintenance of the frigidaire, the services to be rendered under the agreement are substantially the same as those to be rendered under the sub-lease. If it were not for the frigidaire, therefore, it might well be contended that there was no consideration for the agreement by the appellant to pay the B £750 a year in addition to the £450 payable under the sub-lease. The provision and maintenance of the frigidaire does, however, constitute some consideration for the agreement. It certainly would seem to be a somewhat inadequate one, but the court is not concerned with the adequacy of consideration, if consideration there be. In our opinion, the learned judge was plainly right in deciding the first of the two issues in favour of the respondent.

C The second issue raises a question of much greater difficulty. It is settled law that an agreement to do an act that is illegal or immoral or contrary to public policy, or to do any act for a consideration that is illegal, immoral, or contrary to public policy, is unlawful and therefore void. But it often happens that an agreement which, in itself, is not unlawful, is made with the intention of one or both parties to make use of the subject-matter for an unlawful purpose, that is to say, a purpose that is illegal, im-D moral, or contrary to public policy. The most common instance of this is an agreement for the sale or letting of an object, where the agreement is unobjectionable on the face of it, but where the intention of both or one of the parties is that the object shall be used by the purchaser or hirer for an unlawful purpose. In such a case any party to the agreement who had the unlawful intention is precluded from suing upon it. Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. The action does not lie because the court will not lend its help E to such a plaintiff. Many instances of this are to be found in the books.

In Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Turner (2), affirmed, the plaintiffs had demised certain premises to the defendant to be used by him for an unlawful purpose. It was held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue the defendant upon the covenant for rent in the lease. We shall have to refer to this case later upon another point. In Pearce v. Brooks (3), a coach-builder had let out a brougham on hire to a prostitute for the purpose F of enabling her (to use the words of Pollock, C.B.), "to make a display favourable to her immoral purposes." The coach-builder subsequently sued the prostitute for moneys payable under the agreement. It was held by the Court of Exchequer that he could not recover. The Chief Baron said (L.R. 1 Exch. at p. 217):

> "I have always considered it as settled law that any person who contributes to the performance of an illegal act by supplying a thing with the knowledge that it is going G to be used for that purpose cannot recover the price of the thing so supplied."

He added

> "nor can any distinction be made between an illegal and an immoral purpose; the rule which is applicable to the matter is, ex turpi causa non oritur actio, and whether it is an immoral or an illegal purpose in which the plaintiff has participated, H it comes equally within the terms of that maxim, and the effect is the same; no cause of action can arise out of either the one or the other."

In Cowan v. Milbourn (4), the defendant, who had agreed to let rooms to the plaintiff, discovered subsequently that the plaintiff intended to use them for an unlawful purpose. The defendant thereupon refused to carry out the agreement, and it was held that he I was justified in so doing. It was further stated by Bramwell, B., that if the defendant had carried out the agreement with knowledge of the plaintiff's unlawful intention and let the plaintiff into possession of the rooms, he could not have recovered the price for their letting. This dictum of the learned baron was, of course, abundantly justified by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the Gas Light and Coke Co. case (2), and by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Pearce v. Brooks (3), where the brougham had been delivered to the defendant. To the same effect was a decision of the King's Bench Division in Upfill v. Wright (5). The plaintiff in that case had let a flat to the defendant, whose intention was to use it for an immoral purpose, and this intention was known to the plaintiff. The plaintiff sued for the rent, and it was held that he could not A maintain the action.

It will be observed that in all these cases the plaintiff was endeavouring to enforce by action an agreement, or a clause in an agreement, which was tainted by the unlawful intention of the plaintiff, or the unlawful intention of the defendant known to the plaintiff, as to the purpose for which the subject-matter of the agreement was to be used. To such an action the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio applies. But B the maxim does not require, nor does the language of it suggest, that a completely executed transfer of property, or of an interest in property, made in pursuance of such an agreement must be regarded as being invalid. This is laid down in clear terms in the well-known case of Feret v. Hill (6). In that case, A. procured B. to grant him a lease of premises by means of a false representation that he intended to carry on a certain lawful trade therein. Having obtained possession, A. converted the premises C into a brothel, whereupon B. forcibly expelled him. It was held that A. might maintain ejectment—the fraudulent misrepresentation and the subsequent illegal use of the premises not being sufficient at law to avoid the lease. As the lease had been obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation, it could have been set aside in equity, and since the Judicature Act, in any Division of the High Court. With that aspect of the matter we are not now concerned. The importance of the case lies in the fact that the lease was D held to be a valid one, notwithstanding the intention of A. to use the demised premises for an unlawful purpose. On this question, MAULE, J., expressed himself as follows (15 C.B. at p. 224):

> "The plaintiff is not calling upon the court to enforce any agreement at all. The agreement was an agreement on the part of the defendant to demise certain premises E to the plaintiff for a given term. When the instrument was executed, and possession was given under it, it received its full effect; no aid of a court of justice was required to enforce it. This action of ejectment is brought, not for the purpose of enforcing the agreement, but the plaintiff asks the court to afford him a remedy against one who has extruded him from a lawful possession. There is, therefore, a manifest distinction between this case and those where the court was called upon F to assist the plaintiff in enforcing an agreement the object of which was to do an illegal act, as in Ritchie v. Smith (7). In that case both plaintiff and defendant were parties to an agreement, the very object and intention of which was to enable one of them to commit an infraction of the law. If the court there had refused to listen to the defence, they would have been helping the plaintiff to enforce something which lay in contract, namely, the payment of rent, when both parties to the G agreement were intending to apply the premises to an illegal purpose; the plaintiff was seeking to enforce the performance of an illegal agreement. Such, also was Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Turner (2)."

CROWDER, J., said much the same thing (15 C.B. at p. 227):

> "He"—(that is the plaintiff)—"is not calling upon the court to aid him in en- H forcing or carrying into effect an illegal agreement; all he seeks is to recover the possession of premises to which he is lawfully entitled."

This distinction between an action brought to enforce an unlawful agreement and one brought to assert a right of property already acquired under such an agreement is further illustrated by Taylor v. Chester (8). The defendant in that case was the keeper of a brothel, and as such had supplied wine and supper to the plaintiff "for the purpose I of being consumed there by the plaintiff and divers prostitutes in a debauch to incite them to riotous disorderly and immoral conduct." When the debauch was over there followed in due course the reckoning. Being unable, or unwilling, to pay it at once, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant the half of a £50 note as security. He subsequently repented of this action and instituted proceedings against the defendant for the purpose of obtaining the return of the half bank-note. It was held that he was not entitled to recover. The property in the half note had passed to the defendant, and in spite of the illegality of the agreement under which it had passed, the defendant was entitled to keep it. As was said by Parke, B., in Scarfe v. Morgan (9) (4 M. & W. at p. 281), in a passage quoted by Hannen, J., in the course of the argument:

> "If an illegal contract is executed, and a property either special or general has passed thereby, the property must remain."

The plaintiff, on the other hand, could not maintain his action without asserting and relying upon the unlawful agreement. He could not, to use the language of Mellor, J., in delivering the judgment of the court (L.R. 4 Q.B. at p. 315), recover without showing the true character of the deposit; and, that being upon an illegal consideration, to which he himself was a party, he was precluded from obtaining "the assistance of the law" to recover it back. Much to the same effect is Gordon v. Chief Commissioner of Police (10). The money that the plaintiff was claiming in that action had been earned by him in carrying on an illegal business. But the money had become his property, and he was held entitled to recover it. He was not asking the court to enforce any illegal contract or to grant relief dependent in any way on any illegal transaction on his part, but solely on the unjustifiable detention of his money by the defendant.

In view of these various authorities it seems plain that, if the respondent had let the flat to the appellant to be used by her for an illegal purpose, he could not have successfully sued her for the rent, but the leasehold interest in the flat purporting to be granted by the sub-lease would nevertheless have been legally vested in her. The result would have been that the appellant would be entitled to remain in possession of the flat without payment of rent until and unless the respondent could eject her without having to rely upon the lease or agreement. This curious aspect of the matter was alluded to by Tindal, C.J., in Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Turner (2) (5 Bing. N.C. at p. 677):

> "It was observed in the course of argument for the plaintiffs, that, as they had granted a lease for twenty-one years, such term was vested in the defendant, and that he would be able to hold himself in for the remainder of it without payment of any rent. That point is not now before us; but without giving any opinion how far the position is maintainable, it is obvious that, if an ejectment should be brought upon the breach of any condition in the lease, the action of ejectment would at all events be free from the objection that the court was lending its aid to enforce a contract in violation of law."

In the present case the appellant does not, as a matter of fact, desire to remain in possession of the flat. She is, and has for some time been, anxious to leave it. But if the respondent has, by his conduct, placed himself in the same position in law as though he had let the flat with the intention of its being used for an illegal purpose, he has no one but himself to thank for any loss that he may suffer in consequence.

That brings us to the real crux of this case. Has the respondent placed himself in that position? Now in the cases to which we have referred there was an intention to use the subject-matter of the agreement for an unlawful purpose. In the present case, on the other hand, the respondent's intention was merely to make use of the lease and agreement—that is, the documents themselves—for an unlawful purpose. Does that make any difference? In our opinion, it does not. It seems to us, and it is here that we respectfully disagree with du Parcq, J., that the principles applicable to the two cases are identical. That this is so seems to be established by the decision of this court in Scott v. Brown, Doering, McNabb & Co. (1). In that case the plaintiff brought an action against some stockbrokers, through whom he had purchased shares in a certain company, to obtain rescission of the purchase contract and repayment of the purchase money on the ground that the defendants, while acting as the plaintiff's brokers, had delivered their own shares to him instead of purchasing them upon the Stock Exchange. At the trial it appeared from the plaintiff's own evidence that the money sought to be recovered had been paid by the plaintiff in pursuance of an agreement between him and one of the defendants by which such defendant was, with the money, to purchase upon the Stock Exchange a number of shares in the company at a premium with the sole object of inducing the public to believe that there was a real market for the shares and that they were at a real premium. The object, in other words, was "to rig the market." It was held by this court, applying the principle ex turpi causa non oritur actio, that the action was based upon an illegal contract and that the money could not be recovered. It will be observed that there was no intention on the part of the plaintiff in that case to use the shares in an unlawful way. The intention was merely to make use of the existence of the share contract in order to defraud the public by inducing them to believe that it recorded a genuine transaction. In delivering judgment, LINDLEY, L.J., as he then was, said ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 729):

> " The plaintiff's purchase was an actual purchase, not a sham purchase; that is true, but it is also true that the sole object of the purchase was to cheat and mislead the public. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff must look elsewhere than to a court of justice for such assistance as he may require against the persons he employed to assist him in his fraud, if the claim to such assistance is based on his illegal contract. Any rights which he may have irrespective of his illegal contract will, of course, be recognised and enforced. But his illegal contract confers no rights on him: (see Pearce v. Brooks (3))."

It was the transaction of purchase on the market at a particular price and not the thing purchased of which an illegal use was to be made. So in the present case it was the formulation of the transaction in a particular way by means of the sub-lease and agreement and not the subject-matter of the transaction of which an illegal use was to be made. In one sense, no doubt, it may be said that the plaintiff intended to use only the sub-lease for an unlawful purpose, and not to use, but to conceal, the agreement; in reality there was only one transaction between the parties. The splitting up of it into two documents was a device essential for the success of the plaintiff's fraud and both documents must be regarded as equally fraudulent in purpose.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the respondent is not entitled to seek the assistance of a court of justice in enforcing either the lease or the agreement. DU PARCQ, J. (who came to a different conclusion) considered that the present case was much the same as one in which a party to an agreement enters into it with the intention of altering it at a later date, and using the document so altered for his own fraudulent purposes. The learned judge said:

> " I cannot think that if a man says, ' when I have got this agreement I am going by forgery to alter it,' he is thereby precluded from getting his rights against the other party to the agreement under the agreement in fact made."

He thought that in such a case it was something altogether too remote from the contract itself to say that the contract was illegal. In that we respectfully agree with him. But, with all deference, it seems to us that the case he supposed is fundamentally different from the case now before us. In the former case the document is a harmless one, and can only be rendered dangerous by a subsequent act. We see no reason why before the commission of that act the document should not be used for an innocent purpose. The intention was mental only and no overt step in carrying out the fraudulent intention was taken in the transaction itself. In the present case, however, the documents themselves were dangerous in the sense that they could be and were intended to be used for a fraudulent purpose, without alteration, and the splitting of the transaction into the two documents was an overt step in carrying out the fraud. We cannot think that the respondent is entitled to bring these documents into a court of justice and ask the court to assist him in carrying them into effect. The respondent's counsel contended that this view is inconsistent with the decision in Re Thomas (11). But there is no such inconsistency. In that case one Jaquess had handed over money to Thomas, who was a solicitor, to be used by Thomas in conducting certain litigation. Jaquess subsequently sought to obtain from Thomas an account of the money so handed over to him and a taxation of his bill of costs. Thomas sought to resist the claim on the ground that the money in question had been subscribed by various persons under a champertous, and, therefore, illegal agreement. It is not surprising that he failed in his defence, for, apart altogether from the fact that Thomas was an officer of the court, a fact upon which the court commented with some vigour, Thomas could not justify misappropriating the money of Jaquess merely because it had come to Jaquess from a tainted source.

Nor, of course, was Jaquess in any way asking the court to enforce the champertous agreement. In these respects the case is not unlike that of Gordon v. Chief Commissioner of Police (10).

The respondent's counsel further contended that, inasmuch as the respondent had failed in his attempted fraud, and could, therefore, no longer use the documents for an illegal purpose, he was now entitled to sue upon them. The law, it was said, would allow to the respondent a locus penitentiæ. So, perhaps, it would have done, had the respondent repented before attempting to carry his fraud into effect: (see Taylor v. Bowers (12)). But, as it is, the respondent's repentance came too late, namely, after he had been found out. Where the illegal purpose has been wholly or partially effected, the law allows no locus penitentiæ: (see Salmond and Winfield's Law of Contracts at p. 152). It will not be any the readier to do so when the repentance, as in the present case, is merely due to the frustration by others of the respondent's fraudulent purpose.

In our opinion, the appeal as to the second issue must be allowed and the order directing payment by the appellant of the costs of that issue should be discharged. It is true that this issue (being the issue raised in par. 2a of the defence) goes only to the validity of the agreement. But this, in our opinion, is immaterial. The moment that the attention of the court is drawn to the illegality attending the execution of the sub-lease, it is bound to take notice of it, whether such illegality be pleaded or not. It had not been pleaded in Scott v. Brown, Doering, McNabb & Co. (1). See, too, the observations of Vaughan Williams, L.J., in Gordon v. Chief Commissioner of Police (10); ([1910] 2 K.B. at p. 1086).

If, therefore, when the trial is resumed before du Parcq, J., the respondent should fail to disprove the charge of fraud made against him, his action, so far as it is based on the lease and the agreement, should be dismissed. It will, however, apparently still be open to the respondent to ask for leave to amend his statement of claim by alleging an oral agreement and claiming relief based upon it. His application for this purpose was ordered by du Parcq, J., to stand over until after the hearing of this appeal. But we do not intend to suggest that if and when the application is made it should be granted. It should be added that the appellant seems not unwilling to pay the rent accrued due under the lease. Should she do so, the respondent is, of course, entitled to retain it. But if he seeks the assistance of the court to recover it, such assistance must be refused. On the other hand, if the respondent succeeds in clearing himself, the issue of repudiation raised in the defence will have to be decided. In either case the counterclaim will have to be proceeded with. The order of du Parcq, J., as to the costs of the issue of want of consideration will, of course, stand. All the other costs of the action and the costs of the counterclaim will be dealt with as the learned judge may direct when the trial is resumed. As to the appeal, the appellant has succeeded upon the more important of the two issues and failed upon the other. In these circumstances we think that the right order to make is that the respondent shall pay the appellant three-quarters of the costs of the appeal.

Appeal allowed upon one issue.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Hailsham, L.C., Lord Blanesburgh, and Lord Wright), July 25, 26, 29, 30, August 1, October 24, 1935]

Negligence—Gas—Escape from main—Damage to property—Damage caused by adjacent works of third party—Duty of undertakers to know of operations of third party.

Gas is a dangerous thing within the rules applicable to things dangerous in themselves. The rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (1) (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 330, is not limited to cases where the defendant has been carrying or accumulating a dangerous thing on his land. It applies equally where, in exercise of a franchise to do so, an undertaker has been carrying gas in mains laid in the soil of another person, and, therefore, he is liable to pay for damage caused by the gas if it escapes, even though there is no negligence on his part. The rule has, however, been modified by the admission of the defence (among others) that the mischief which happened was brought about, not by any negligence on the part of the undertaker, but by the negligence of a third party. The undertaker may still be liable in negligence if he fails to foresee and guard against the consequences to his works of the third party's act.

Under a franchise granted to the appellants' predecessors in title by the city of Edmonton, the appellants laid gas-pipes under the streets of the city for the purpose of supplying natural gas to consumers. In 1923 the appellants laid a 12-in. intermediate pressure gas-main at a depth of 3 ft. 6 in. In the pipe were three welded joints. In 1931 the local authority constructed a storm sewer system beneath the appellants' main. In 1932 gas from the appellants' system escaped into an hotel. It ignited, and the hotel was burned down. It was ascertained that the cause of the escape was a break in a welded joint in the gas main through which the gas percolated into the hotel basement, and that that break was caused by the operations of the local authority which had resulted in a general subsidence of the ground. In an action brought by the respondents as owners of the hotel and their insurers,

Held: the appellants were put on inquiry as to the operations which the local authority were conducting in the vicinity of their mains, and their failure to know of them was not consistent with due care on their part in the interests of members of the public likely to be affected, and, therefore, they were liable to the respondents for the damage suffered by them.

Appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta (Appellate Division).

The action was brought by the respondents, as representing owners of property in the city of Edmonton, Alberta, and their insurers, against the appellants, who were a public utility company incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act, claiming $320,278.64 as damages which they alleged they had suffered as the result of a fire which occurred on the night of Feb. 21, 1932, and burnt down the Corona Hotel in Jasper-avenue, Edmonton, causing damage to adjoining property. The question was whether the appellants, who distributed natural gas to the inhabitants of Edmonton, were responsible for damage resulting from a fire due to an escape of natural gas from their gas-main. The main defence of the appellants was that the breaking of the pipe was solely due to the ground beneath it being let down by new sewerage works constructed by the city in 1931. The respondents contended that the original construction of the pipe was improper, and that the damage was solely caused thereby. The trial judge found that the cause of the break in a welded joint through which the gas leaked were the operations of the city of Edmonton, and gave judgment dismissing the respondents' action. That judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court of Alberta (Appellate Division) (HARVEY, C.J.A., CLARKE and McGILLIVRAY, JJ.A., MITCHELL and LUNNEY, JJ.A. dissenting). The appellants appealed.

Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and G. H. Steer, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the appellants.

W. N. Tilley, K.C., S. B. Woods, K.C. (both of the Canadian Bar), and Frank Gahan for the respondents.

Oct. 24. LORD WRIGHT.—The action out of which this appeal arises was brought by the respondents as owners of property in the city of Edmonton in Alberta and their insurers; they claimed that the property had been destroyed or damaged by a fire due to an escape of gas from the gas-main of the appellants for which the appellants are liable. The damages claimed amounted to $320,278.64, but all questions of amount were reserved. On the question of liability before FORD, J., the appellants succeeded, but his decision was reversed by a judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta (Appellate Division) by a majority (LUNNEY, J.A., and MITCHELL, J.A., dissenting), who ordered judgment to be entered for damages to be assessed. From that judgment, the present appeal is brought.

The appellants are a public utility company incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act; they distribute natural gas under a franchise granted to their predecessors in title the Northern Alberta Natural Gas Development Company Limited (hereinafter called "the company") by the city of Edmonton (hereinafter called "the city") in November, 1915, and confirmed by statute (Alberta Statutes, 1916, c. 29). The franchise was assigned to the appellants by deed, dated May 29, 1923.

Under this franchise, the city granted to the company the full power to pull down, take up, repair, maintain, or operate its gas-pipe lines along, through, or under the streets and other public places within the city for the purpose of supplying natural gas to consumers, with power to break up the surface and make necessary excavations for that purpose. By cl. 11 it was provided that the company should indemnify the city against any damage arising out of the construction and operation of its works owing to the negligence of the company, its servants, and employees, and that the city should be liable for all damage to the plant of the company caused by the negligence of the city, its workmen, and employees. The company was bound to supply natural gas as required to consumers within the city limits at the property line when their land or premises were situated along the company's main line. The franchise was subject to the provisions of the Water, Gas, Electric, and Telephone Companies Act of Alberta, which, by amendment made in 1924, was applied to companies incorporated or licensed under any statute of the Dominion or of Alberta. It is convenient to recite here ss. 11 and 13 of that act. Section 11 was in these terms:

> "The company shall make satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of any building or other property or to the municipality or minister of public works as the case may be for all damage caused in or by the execution of all or any of the said powers."

By s. 13 it was provided as follows:

> "The company shall locate and construct its gas or water works or electric or telephone system and all apparatus and appurtenances thereto belonging or appertaining or therewith connected and wheresoever situated so as not to endanger the public health or safety."

The appellants, in August, 1923, laid a 12-in. intermediate pressure gas-main along a lane in Edmonton south of Jasper-avenue, and running at right angles into 107th-street. The lane was unpaved, but where the main went across and under the street an open trench could not be cut; the width of the street was 77 ft., and three excavations were made, one at each end about 7 ft. from the side pavement and one in the middle, spaces of about 11 ft. being left in the street for the traffic, the two intervening spaces being tunnelled. Each excavation was about 15 ft. wide. The main was laid at a depth of 3 ft. 6 in.; in the pipe were three welded joints, the one in the centre being in the space of the middle excavation; the pipe was pushed or pulled through the length of the tunnelled and excavated spaces, the earth being back-filled. Not far from this main and about the same level below the ground the appellants also laid a low pressure 10-in. main. There was also a wooden conduit laid by the city to contain the cables for the street railway. In 1907, the city built, as part of its sewerage system in 107th-street, a manhole called manhole A; the manhole was 16 ft. deep and was close to the appellants' two mains. Later, between February and April, 1931, the city proceeded to construct a storm sewer system in the same region. For this purpose they excavated a manhole called manhole B to the north-east of manhole A, and about 20 ft. away, and they dug a trench further to the north or north-east, and there they laid a 15-in. storm sewer; in addition they drove a tunnel underground for the 20 ft. from manhole B to manhole A, and laid a storm sewer in the tunnel; in order to join that sewer with manhole A they built a weir chamber roughly about 4 ft. cube, at the bottom of manhole A, the wall of which at the bottom they had broken, so as to build the chamber and join up the storm sewer. These underground building operations were immediately beneath the appellants' main and in the way of the centre welded joint. They were carried out from manhole A. In February, 1932, it was discovered that gas from the appellants' system was escaping into the Corona Hotel, which belonged to one of the respondents; the gas ignited and the hotel was burned down and adjoining property was damaged. It was ascertained on examination that the centre welded joint of the pipe-line of the appellants' 12-in. main had given way; the pipe in that vicinity had sagged 6½ in. Hence the escape of gas which had percolated through the soil and penetrated into the hotel basement.

The claim was in respect of the loss and damage through the fire. The claim against the appellants was based in the pleadings on various causes of action: (i) for permitting gas, a dangerous substance, to escape; (ii) for breach of s. 13 of the Water, Gas, &c., Act; (iii) for nuisance, public or private; (iv) for negligence in construction and maintenance of the system, or in failing to have an inspection system, or in failing to odorise their gas, or in failing to locate their pipes below the frost line, or to repair and maintain their pipes. The main defence of the appellants was that the breaking of the joint in the pipe was solely due to the action of the city in letting down the soil under the pipe by the negligent and improper way in which they excavated the weir chamber and tunnel under the appellants' main, without providing adequate support. The respondents' case originally was that the city's work had been properly designed and carried out, so that there could be no reason at any time, either while it was being carried on or at any subsequent period, to anticipate that it could cause any mischief, but in the course of the trial there was alleged, as a new and alternative ground of negligence or breach of absolute duty against the appellants, that the appellants either knew or ought to have known what work the city was doing, and failed to take, as they could and should have done, all proper precautions to prevent the escape of the dangerous gas which they were carrying in their mains. No amendment has ever been made of the pleadings, nor have any precise particulars been given of this head of claim. Their Lordships must observe that it is pessimi exempli to admit a new head of claim without a proper amendment of the pleadings. But this ground of claim has been considered by the trial judge and by the Appellate Division and must now be regarded as a relevant issue in the case. The trial judge decided against the contentions of the respondents, but the Appellate Division allowed the appeal solely on the new ground of claim.

Before discussing the facts in the case, it is desirable to explain the principles of law which in their Lordships' judgment are applicable.

That gas is a dangerous thing within the rules applicable to things dangerous in themselves is beyond question. Thus the appellants, who are carrying in their mains the inflammable and explosive gas, are primâ facie within the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (1); that is to say, that, though they are doing nothing wrongful in carrying the dangerous thing so long as they keep it in their pipes, they come primâ facie within the rule of strict liability if the gas escapes; the gas constitutes an extraordinary danger created by the appellants for their own purposes, and the rule established by Rylands v. Fletcher (1) requires that they act at their peril and must pay for damage caused by the gas if it escapes, even without any negligence on their part. The rule is not limited to cases where the defendant has been carrying or accumulating the dangerous thing on his own land; it applies equally in a case like the present where the appellants were carrying the gas in mains laid in the property of the city—that is, in the subsoil—in exercise of a franchise to do so: Charing Cross, West End, and City Electricity Supply Co., Ltd. v. London Hydraulic Power Co. (2).

This form of liability is in many ways analogous to a liability for nuisance, though nuisance is not only different in its historical origin, but in its legal character and many of its incidents and applications. But the two causes of action often overlap, and in respect of each of these causes of action the rule of strict liability has been modified by admitting as a defence that what was being done was properly done in pursuance of statutory powers, and the mischief that has happened has not been brought about by any negligence on the part of the undertakers. As an illustration of this well-known doctrine, reference may be made to Green v. The Chelsea Waterworks Co. (3) (70 L.T. at p. 549), where Lindley, L.J., said of Rylands v. Fletcher:

> "That case is not to be extended beyond the legitimate principle on which the House of Lords decided it. If it were extended as far as strict logic might require, it would be a very oppressive decision."

By the same reasoning the rule has been held inapplicable where the casualty is due to the act of God; or to the independent or conscious volition of a third party, as in Box v. Jubb (4), which was approved by the Judicial Committee in Rickards v. Lothian (5), and not to any negligence of the defendants. In Box v. Jubb (4) the act which caused the escape of the water from the reservoir was a malicious—which their Lordships think means no more than conscious or deliberate—act of a third person. It was said by Kelly, C.B. (4 Ex. D. at p. 79):

> "I think the defendants could not possibly have been expected to anticipate that which happened here, and the law does not require them to construct their reservoir > and the sluices and gates leading to it to meet any amount of pressure which the wrongful act of a third party may impose."

Lord Moulton in Rickards' Case (5) states the matter in these words ([1913] A.C. at p. 278):

> " A defendant cannot, in their Lordships' opinion, be properly said to have caused or allowed the water to escape, if the malicious act of a third person was the real cause of its escaping without any fault on the part of the defendant."

And in Dominion Natural Gas Co. v. Collins (6) ([1909] A.C. at p. 647), in a case for this purpose not dissimilar, the question was put:

> " Have the defendants been able to show affirmatively that the true cause of the accident was the conscious act of another volition, i.e., the tampering with the machines by the railway company's workmen? "

It is not here intended to enumerate all the defences which might be available to a defendant in this class of action; but the two defences mentioned are both material in this case. Reference was made to a further possible defence based on the contention that the appellants and the owners of the properties destroyed had a common interest in maintaining the potentially dangerous installation, or that these owners had consented to the danger. It is true that in proper cases such may be good defences, but they do not seem to have any application to a case like the present, where the appellants are a commercial undertaking, though, no doubt, they are acting under statutory powers, while those whose property has been destroyed are merely individual consumers who avail themselves of the supply of gas which is offered. These facts do not constitute a common interest or consent in any relevant sense.

Where undertakers are acting under statutory powers it is a question of construction, depending on the language of the statute, whether they are only liable for negligence, or whether they remain subject to the strict and unqualified rule of Rylands v. Fletcher (1). Thus in the Charing Cross Electricity Supply case (2) cited above it was held—following the previous decision in Midwood v. Manchester Corpn. (7)—that the defence of statutory authority was limited by a clause in the statutory order providing that nothing therein should exonerate the corporation from liability for nuisance. In Hammond v. St. Pancras Vestry (8), where the Act imposed on the vestry the duty of properly cleansing their sewers, it was held that, as these words were susceptible of meaning either that an absolute duty was imposed or that the duty was only to exercise due and reasonable care, the latter meaning was to be preferred, since the absolute duty could not be held to be imposed save by clear words. That case was followed in Stretton's Derby Brewery v. Mayor of Derby (9).

It, accordingly, now becomes necessary to consider the meaning of ss. 11 and 13 of the Alberta Water, Gas, Electric, and Telephone Companies Act, cited above. Section 13 of the Act—which was then numbered s. 11—was considered by the Supreme Court of Canada in Raffan v. Canadian Western Natural Gas Light Heat and Power Co. (10), affirming a decision of the Appellate Division in Alberta (7 Alb. L.R. 459), where it was held that the section imposed an absolute duty on the company not only during the location and construction of the works but also during their operation. Their Lordships cannot agree with that decision in so far as it is sought to read into s. 13 some such words as " maintain " in addition to the words actually expressed which are " locate and construct." Nor does it seem legitimate to read " locate and construct " as including something entirely different—that is, " maintain ": " locate and construct " are words apt only to refer to the initial location or construction or to some new works: once the works are located and constructed, the process of maintaining or keeping and repairing seems to involve a new and different idea and to involve different considerations. Their Lordships, accordingly, think that, so far as s. 13 goes, the appellants are in regard to maintenance not within the section, and are entitled to the benefit of the statutory authority, and are subject only to the obligation to use reasonable care in the same way as in Farnworth v. Manchester Corpn. (11). It is, accordingly, not necessary for their Lordships to decide whether s. 13 imposes in matters to which it applies

A an absolute duty. But, in any case, the question is not eventually material in this case. For, even if the section applies to maintenance, and is absolute in its terms, the duty it imposes is still no more than the duty under the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (1), according to which the appellants would not be liable for damage caused, without default on their part, by the independent act of a third party. Then, whether or not s. 13 applies to maintenance, and whether or not it imposes, where it does apply, a B liability unqualified in terms, the position is the same for purposes of this case. The appellants' real defence was that the damage was caused by the act of the city, for which they were not responsible and which they could not control, and that they were guilty of no negligence in the matter. That defence could be equally good on any view of the effect of s. 13: and the same reasoning applies to s. 11, if, indeed, that section is open at all to the respondents in this case.

C It, accordingly, becomes necessary to consider the issues of fact which have occupied the greater part of the hearing of this appeal, as they seem to have done in the courts below. The respondents have contended that the original construction of the pipe line was improper, and that the damage was solely caused thereby: the appellants have contended that not only was their original construction proper, but the breaking of the pipe was solely due to the ground beneath it being let down by the new sewerage works D constructed by the city in 1931. The further issue which was raised if that were established, namely, whether the appellants were still in default because they ought to have foreseen and provided against the risk of damage through the city's underground work, will be dealt with later.

Counsel for the appellants and counsel for the respondents have most exhaustively and ably laid before their Lordships the arguments on the one side and the other as E to what caused the breaking of the 12-in. pipe from which the gas escaped. In the result their Lordships are in agreement with the finding of the trial judge that > "the cause of the break in the welded joint through which the gas leaked were the operations of the city of Edmonton in constructing the 15-in. tile overflow sewer between manhole A and manhole B and the weir chamber at manhole A in the year F 1931."

It is only necessary here very briefly to summarise why their Lordships so decide.

On the side of 107th Street in close proximity were three mains, all about 3 ft. below the pavement; they were the 12-in. pipe and the 10-in. pipe belonging to the appellants, and a wooden conduit which the city had laid for their electric cables serving the street railway. Close to that position was manhole A, the bottom of which was about 16 ft. G below the surface; through manhole A and under the three mains went a 12-in. sewer, constructed in 1907, and similarly there ran into manhole A a 6-in. tile sewer constructed in 1913 and leading to a catch basin. In February and March, 1931, the city built manhole B in a position about 20 ft. north of manhole A. It was excavated from the ground and an open trench was made to the north from manhole B in which a sewer was laid. But also from manhole B, a new 15-in. overflow sewer was laid to manhole A, H into which it was opened by way of a well chamber, which was built for that purpose by opening up the side of manhole A. All this work was underground; the tunnel for the new overflow sewer was dug from manhole B, but the new weir chamber, which was built of brick, with a concrete filling on top, was constructed from manhole A. In building the weir chamber, earth was excavated apart from the excavation to make the tunnel to a width of about 52 in., a height of about 5 ft. 6 in., and a depth of about 3 ft. I This excavation for the weir chamber was almost directly beneath the three mains. The work was finished early in April, 1931; it was in February, 1932, that the 12-in. pipe broke and leaked. When the place was opened up, it was found that the pipe had sagged at the spot above the weir chamber about 6½ in.; the 10-in. pipe and the wooden conduit had also sagged very considerably. These coincidences of time and place would point very strongly to the conclusion that the excavation was the cause, the ground beneath having in consequence been disturbed and having then subsided. This inference is strengthened by the observations made when the ground by the weir chamber was opened up after the accident. Examinations were made on two successive days, July 7 and 8, 1932; experts on both sides were present. There was much conflict of evidence, but the trial judge on a pure question of fact as to what was seen, must have accepted the evidence given on behalf of the appellants, which was that when a hole was broken in the wall of manhole A above the weir chamber, a cavity in the earth, extending 12 in. long by 12 in. wide and 2 in. deep, was found above the roof of the chamber, which the appellants' experts stated indicated a failure to give proper support and involved some disturbance of the adjacent soil. On the other hand, the evidence given on behalf of the respondents to show that there was original imperfect construction of the appellants' 12-in. main seems quite unsatisfactory. The 12-in. pipe was about 77 ft. long and was made into a single length by means of three welded joints, the centre one of which gave way. It was said that the welding was not properly done, but that allegation failed; it was said that the pipe was not properly laid because it must have been laid on loose earth composed of backfilling material; when it was opened up it was 6½ in. out of line, and the settlement was ascribed to backfilling being squeezed out by the effects of freezing in the winter, the pipe having in fact been laid within the frost area. But that was all inference based on the view that the bottom of the tunnel had not been properly levelled off, and it was assumed that the whole 77 ft. had been tunnelled. In fact, the part in which the centre welded joint was laid was in an open excavation; only two portions of the width of the street of about 12 ft. each had been tunnelled, between the three portions of about 15 ft. each which had been excavated from the street level. The settlement of the 12-in. main and of the two adjacent pipes was much more consistent with a general subsidence of the ground than with any defect in the manner the pipe was laid; there was no substantial evidence to justify the conclusion that the laying was defective.

Their Lordships, accordingly, agree with the finding of the trial judge on this point, which is not expressly dissented from, though not affirmatively accepted, by the majority in the Appellate Division, who did not feel it necessary to give any opinion.

There remains the further point, which is, that, assuming that the city in fact let down the ground and caused the pipe to break, still the appellants should have foreseen and guarded against the risk of their pipes being affected. This alternative plea of negligence was, as has been said, not pleaded, but it was dealt with by the trial judge and by the Appellate Division without the pleadings being amended and without any demand by the appellants for leave to adduce further evidence. As it has been dealt with in the court below, their Lordships do not feel able to exclude it. But it certainly calls for most critical consideration, and the respondents are not relieved, by failing to plead properly, from proving their case properly.

The authorities already cited herein show that, though the act of a third party may be relied on by way of defence in cases of this type, the defendant may still be held liable in negligence if he failed in foreseeing and guarding against the consequences to his works of that third party's act. The trial judge on this issue found that > "in the absence of notice, the defendant ought to have known, even if he did not, that the operations were going on, because of the length of time they were carried on, and the conspicuous and public nature thereof":

the trial judge, however, went on to hold

> "that the defendant had the right to rely upon the city engineer, with whose department it had been in close contact when it constructed its distribution system in 1923, seeing that the work was done in such a way that such a result as has happened would not occur."

Harvey, C.J.A., came to a different conclusion, and on that ground allowed the appeal and gave judgment against the appellants. He said ((1934) 3 W.W.R. at p. 647):

> "What we are concerned with here is not the city's obligation to the defendant, but the defendant's obligation to the public who may be affected by its operations. I cannot think that the defendant performed its full duty to them when it failed to inspect city operations which might affect the security of its pipes, and to take such steps as might be necessary to protect them. It would have meant extra trouble and expense no doubt, but there would have been no difficulty in ascertaining from the city where such operations were taking place and seeing that all proper safeguards were taken as provided."

The question here is between the respondents and the appellants. It may be that the respondents, treating them all as property owners, have or had a claim against the city on the facts as found by their Lordships: such a claim would primâ facie be within the principle of such a case as Hardaker v. Idle District Council (12), where a district council in making, by their contractors, a sewer, negligently broke a gas main, the gas from which escaped into the plaintiff's house and caused damage: it was held that the defendants were liable in tort to the plaintiff. This is not a matter on which their Lordships can properly express an opinion, since it is a question between parties who are not before them. It may also be that the city are liable to the appellants if they have let down the ground in which the appellants' pipes were laid; primâ facie they are not entitled to derogate from the franchise they have granted, and in addition they may be liable under the provision quoted above contained in the agreement granting the franchise. Their Lordships here again have no desire to pass on matters not before them. The question in these proceedings is between the respondents as or representing property owners and the appellants as undertakers, who are carrying an element, gas, in their mains close to the owners' premises; the gas is carried at high pressure, is very dangerous if it escapes, and calculated if it does escape to damage, as it did, the owners' property. The appellants accordingly owe a duty to the respondents, even though the case falls outside the rule of strict or absolute liability, to exercise all care and skill that these owners should not be damaged. The degree of care which that duty involves must be proportioned to the degree of risk involved if the duty should not be fulfilled. It has been found, both by the trial judge and by the Appellate Division, that the appellants were put on inquiry, at least, as to the operations which the city were conducting in the vicinity of their mains, in particular of the 12-in. intermediate pressure main, where the pressure of the gas was 40 lb. to the inch. Even if the operations at manhole B were, so far as above ground, in a direction opposite to manhole A and even though the tunnel from manhole B to manhole A was underground, still manhole B was only 20 ft. from manhole A: but of particular moment was the fact that the building of the weir chamber, which involved men working on it and carrying down bricks and cement, cannot but have been obvious to the appellants' employees if they were taking any interest in what the city did in the vicinity of the appellants' mains. In ordinary course, the city might at any time be conducting operations in connection with their sewers in the vicinity of the appellants' mains, and it was the appellants' duty to watch such operations. This particular operation was, as both courts have held, from its public nature and conspicuous character and from the time during which it went on, such that a failure by the appellants to know of it as is plainly not consistent with due care on their part in the interests of members of the public likely to be affected. The appellants have strenuously contended that they are embarrassed because they have had no particulars of what is complained of and no opportunity of calling evidence in answer. But if that were a grievance, it might have been, but was not, availed of in the courts below.

In truth the gravamen of the charge against the appellants in this matter is that though they had the tremendous responsibility of carrying this highly inflammable gas under the streets of a city, they did nothing at all in all the facts of this case. If they did not know of the city works, their system of inspection must have been very deficient. If they did know, they should have been on their guard: they might have ascertained what work was being done and carefully investigated the position, or they might have examined the pipes likely to be affected so as to satisfy themselves that the bed on which they lay was not being disturbed. Their duty to the respondents was, at the lowest, to be on the watch and to be vigilant: they do not even pretend to have done as much as that. In fact, so far as appears, they gave no thought to the matter. They left it all to chance. It is, in their Lordships' judgment, impossible now for them to protest that they could have done nothing effective to prevent the accident: and in any case their Lordships cannot accept that as the true view.

In the result, their Lordships agree with the decision on this point of the Appellate Division, and are of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. The respondents, however, have failed on the issue which has bulked so largely, whether the breaking of the pipe was due to the fault of the city or of the appellants, and succeed on an issue not raised in the pleadings, and the costs to be paid by the appellants ought to be reduced accordingly. The order of the Appellate Division ought therefore to be varied by reducing by one-third the amount of costs payable under that order by the appellants to the respondents, and the appellants ought to pay to the respondents two-thirds only of their costs of this appeal.

Their Lordships will humbly so advise His Majesty.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law—Killing—Pigeon—Killing in mistaken, but honest, belief bird wild—Apprehension of possible future danger to crops—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96), s. 23.

The defendant shot at and killed a house pigeon, honestly believing that it was a wild bird and under a genuine apprehension that it might damage his crops.

Held: he was guilty of "unlawfully and wilfully" killing a pigeon, contrary to s. 23 of the Larceny Act, 1861, as he had shot at the particular bird which he killed, intending to kill it, and a mere apprehension of possible future danger which the bird might cause to his crops was insufficient to afford a lawful excuse.

Taylor v. Newman (2) (1863), 8 L.T. 424, and Farey v. Welch (3), [1929] 1 K.B. 388, distinguished.

Notes. In a civil action (and apparently in a prosecution under s. 23 too) a defendant who intentionally shoots another person's pigeon must, in order to escape liability, show either (a) that there was no other practicable means of protecting the defendant's property or (b) that the defendant reasonably thought there were no such means: see Hamps v. Darby, [1948] 2 All E.R. 474. Section 23 does not apply in the case of pigeons destroyed in certain circumstances by a sanitary authority in London: see the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 121.

Case Stated by Worcestershire justices.

An information was preferred before the Worcestershire justices by Cotterill (the prosecutor), under s. 23 of the Larceny Act, 1861, against Penn (the defendant) charging him that he on June 11, 1934, at Pedmore, Worcestershire, unlawfully and wilfully killed a pigeon in such circumstances as did not amount to larceny at common law.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted: On June 11, 1934, about 6 p.m., Mr. Stanley Millward released a number of homing pigeons in a road near the defendant's garden attached to his private house. The pigeon which was the subject of the charge was released some seconds before the remaining pigeons. Almost immediately after it had been released it was shot by the defendant, who was in his garden for the purpose of shooting wood pigeons and magpies, which had materially damaged his crops. The defendant was not able to see Mr. Millward, and did not know that he was in the road releasing pigeons. There was brilliant sunshine at the time. The pigeon flew between the defendant and the sun, so that he had but little opportunity of judging what kind of pigeon was there. He did not see the pigeon for more than about five yards.

The pigeon was different both in size and colour from a wood pigeon. Owing to the defendant being partly dazzled by the sun and the short space for which he saw the bird he could not have distinguished between a wood pigeon and this homing pigeon. The defendant honestly thought that he was shooting a wood pigeon. He picked up the bird and handed it to Mr. Millward very soon after it was shot, and said to him that he was very sorry, and that he had mistaken it for a wood pigeon. He then and there offered to pay its value, but the offer was not accepted.

It was contended for the prosecutor that the honest belief that the pigeon was a wild pigeon was no defence to the information, and that the defendant would be justified in shooting the pigeon only if it was actually doing damage to his crops; and that there was no obligation on the prosecutor to prove felonious intent on a charge of shooting a pigeon, but only where the charge was one of taking, reliance being placed on Horton v. Gwynne (1).

It was contended for the defendant that it was necessary for the prosecutor to prove that the pigeon was taken or killed with felonious intent, and that the defendant was entitled to kill the pigeon if he thought that it was a wood pigeon which might damage his crops.

The justices held that the defendant, momentarily seeing one bird by itself flying low, honestly believed that it was a wild bird, and was therefore exempt from liability, and that he killed it really and honestly thinking he was exercising his right of protecting his crops. They accordingly dismissed the information.

The prosecutor appealed to the Divisional Court.

Wilfrid Lewis, for the prosecutor.—On the facts found the justices should have held that the offence charged was proved. To establish the offence, it was only necessary to prove that the defendant shot at the bird which he killed intending to kill, and it was not necessary further to prove that he knew it to be a tame pigeon: Horton v. Gwynne (1). Tame pigeons have long been specially protected by law as a valuable species of property. At first sight some difficulty appears to be created by the fact that in Farey v. Welch (3) it seems to have been held that on a charge of taking a pigeon under the said section a felonious intention of stealing must be proved, but it is to be observed that in that case the charge was one of taking, not one of killing. Section 23 is one of a group (ss. 17–24) dealing with the taking of birds, beasts and fishes, and s. 21 made the stealing of a pigeon away from its dovecot an offence, the stealing of a pigeon in its dovecot being already larceny at common law. If s. 23 was intended to deal with the stealing of pigeons, its enactment appears to have been unnecessary. "Take" in that section must mean "catch" not "take steal and carry away" and some light is thrown on the matter by R. v. Glover (4), a decision under s. 17 which deals with the taking of rabbits, in which it was held that taking meant not stealing but catching, and by Hudson v. MacRae (5), a decision under s. 24, dealing with the taking of fish, in which it was held that it was not necessary to prove mens rea.

Theodore Turner, for the defendant.—To establish the offence charged, it was necessary to prove a felonious intention: Taylor v. Newman (2) and Farey v. Welch (3). Even, however, if s. 23 contains the absolute prohibition which is contended for on behalf of the defendant, a reasonable apprehension of damage to the defendant's crops constituted a good defence.

By the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 23:

> "Whosoever shall unlawfully and wilfully kill, wound, or take any house dove or pigeon under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law shall, on conviction before a justice of the peace, forfeit and pay, over and above the value of the bird, any sum not exceeding £2."

LORD HEWART, C.J., stated the facts and continued: In my opinion, although s. 23 uses the words "unlawfully and wilfully," the element of mens rea is not required beyond the point that the facts must show an intention on the part of the person accused to do the act forbidden—in the present case the shooting. It seems to me quite immaterial that he thought that he was shooting a bird different from the kind which he in fact did shoot. If the section had used the word "maliciously," which is found in so many statutes, the frame of mind of the person accused would have been relevant to the issue, but this section says "unlawfully and wilfully." It seems to me that those words mean that the person accused intended to shoot and that he was shooting without lawful excuse. It appears an undue straining of the authorities to hold that an apprehension of danger, which may or may not turn out to be real, is enough to provide a lawful excuse. The contention on the part of the defendant was that he was entitled to kill the pigeon if he thought that it might damage his crops—an event which was quite conditional and hypothetical. If that kind of extension were to be permitted, one wonders where it would end. Here the defendant was shooting the pigeon not because of something which was happening but because of something which he thought might or would happen.

On the main point of the case our attention has been directed to passages in decided cases in which there appears to be some dissonance of view, but all those cases were not dealing with the same subject-matter.

It may be said, first, that this case is sufficiently covered by Horton v. Gwynne (1) and in particular, by the judgment of AVORY, J., therein. Secondly, with regard to Taylor v. Newman (2), it is fairly obvious that the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., has been misreported. Both in that case and in another reported in the same volume and dealing with much the same subject-matter there are manifest errors. I am more disposed to think that the passage in the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., which has been referred to was misreported than to think that he contradicted himself.

I am by no means sure, when I look again at the terms of s. 23, that it means what has so often been thought. The three words "kill, wound, or take" are followed by the words "under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law." Those words are obviously ungrammatical. Circumstances cannot amount to larceny. The words must mean that the act done does not amount to larceny. The words "under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law" are apt in reference to the word "take," which is ambiguous and sometimes means "snare" and sometimes "carry away," but they do not aptly refer to the words "kill" or "wound."

It is hard to understand how wounding could be done in circumstances which would cause the act not to amount to larceny any more than to forgery or uttering. If the words are read as qualifying words after the word "take," the meaning is obvious enough.

However that may be, I am satisfied, in view of the cases as they are reported, and particularly in view of Horton v. Gwynne (1), that the appeal ought to succeed, that the justices were wrong in point of law in each of the two limbs of their opinion, and that the case must be remitted to them with a direction to find that the offence which was charged was proved.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that in this case we ought to follow the decision in Horton v. Gwynne (1) where DARLING, J., said, with reference to the circumstances of that case, which was concerned with the shooting of a pigeon in the belief that it was a wild pigeon ([1921] 2 K.B. at p. 662):

> "In those circumstances I think that his act was both wilful and unlawful. It was not accidental. It was not as if he had shot at a crow and killed a pigeon unintentionally. The pigeon was not his property, and it was not in fact a wild one. From a very early date house pigeons were specially protected by law, as being valuable species of property. In my opinion, s. 23 was intended to protect house pigeons against being killed, not only by persons who killed them knowing them to be house pigeons, but also by persons who did not know that. A person who shoots a pigeon which turns out to be a house pigeon must take the consequences of his act."

In my opinion, none of the other cases which have been referred to are really inconsistent with that decision. I myself pointed out in Horton v. Gwynne (1) that, in my view, Taylor v. Newman (2) was not inconsistent, but that, on the contrary, had it not been for the fact that in Taylor v. Newman (2) the appellant was found to have been acting in defence of his own property, the court would have held that the mere act of killing a house pigeon was an offence if the defendant had killed the bird at which he was shooting. In Taylor v. Newman (2), quite apart from one other point to which I will call attention, the birds were actually at the time feeding on the defendant's crops. It was not a case like the present, where the defendant acted under a mere apprehension of possible future danger to his crops. If such apprehension were held to be a sufficient excuse under this section for killing a house pigeon, a man might be justified in going on to somebody else's land and killing his pigeons because he feared that they might come on to his own property and damage his crops. The mere apprehension of such a danger is not, in my opinion, a sufficient excuse, and Taylor v. Newman (2) certainly does not decide that it is.

Quite apart from that matter, the report of the case is most unsatisfactory. The defendant was charged, as appears from the report, with unlawfully and wilfully killing a pigeon. BLACKBURN, J., is reported to have said (4 B. & S. at p. 94):

> "In the present case the appellant did nothing in the nature of taking property belonging to his neighbour so as to make his act a larceny."

I cannot believe that that is a correct report of what he said. On the other hand, MELLOR, J., said (4 B. & S. at p. 94):

> "There may be cases of pigeons being killed without any claim of right or colour of justification, though under circumstances not amounting to larceny; and s. 2 (sic) was probably introduced to make such an unlawful and wanton act punishable."

Because of that last passage I said in Horton v. Gwynne (1) that I thought the decision in Taylor v. Newman (2) supported the view which we were then taking.

I wish to add a few words about Farey v. Welch (3), which it has been suggested is inconsistent with Horton v. Gwynne (1). It must be observed that Farey v. Welch (3) was a case where the charge was that of unlawfully and wilfully taking a pigeon, not that of killing a pigeon, and, speaking for myself, I think that the real ground of the decision was that there was no taking within the meaning of s. 23, and my judgment was expressly based on that ground. If the facts are looked at, it appears that the defendant and prosecutors concerned were in the habit of keeping pigeons on neighbouring premises, that they had been from time to time on each other's premises to recover straying pigeons, that on a certain day the defendant was admitted by the prosecutors to their premises, that he claimed that the pigeon, the subject-matter of the charge, was his property, that it was handed to him for examination, that, in spite of repeated asseverations of ownership by the prosecutors, he attempted to take it away, and that a constable was then called and the defendant given into custody. The case was, in my opinion, one where there was in fact no taking, and it is not in any sense inconsistent with the view which we are now adopting. We have not to determine what may be the true view where a person is charged with taking a pigeon which does not belong to him. A B

Miles v. Hutchings (6) clearly has no application to the present case. That was a case which turned on the meaning of "unlawfully and maliciously" killing a dog, and it was held that the justices had not directed their minds properly to the question whether there was a malicious intention. It is worthy of notice that WILLS, J., said ([1903] 2 K.B. at p. 716): C

> "It is, in my judgment, not enough that he should be under the impression, right or wrong, that he is justified in protecting his premises from trespass or (as in the present case) his master's property from injury; if he knows that much less violent measures would attain his object, he is not justified in resorting to such means as killing or wounding the animal." D

It is quite clear that in the present case much less violent measures would have attained the defendant's object, because the defendant instead of shooting had only to walk into his garden to prevent the bird alighting on his crops. E

For these reasons I agree that the case ought to be remitted to the justices with the direction that the offence charged was proved.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that Horton v. Gwynne (1) is a direct authority in favour of the contention of the prosecutor, and I agree with the views already expressed that Taylor v. Newman (2) is not inconsistent with that decision. I have greater difficulty in deciding that Horton v. Gwynne (1) is not inconsistent with Farey v. Welch (3), but I think that the distinction already referred to by AVORY, J., is sufficient to enable this court to say, without expressing any further opinion on Farey v. Welch (3) that it follows Horton v. Gwynne (1), which is directly in point. Farey v. Welch (3) was a decision on the meaning of the word "take," whereas the present case and Horton v. Gwynne (1) deal with the expression "unlawfully and wilfully kill." Having regard to those last two cases, decided under s. 23, I think that this court is at liberty to construe the section for itself and, in my view, looking at the matter without reference to previous decisions, its meaning is clear. Considerable assistance is to be derived from s. 21, which brought under the law of larceny the stealing of F G

> "any bird, beast, or other animal ordinarily kept in a state of confinement or for any domestic purpose, not being the subject of larceny at common law." H

Therefore, if any person is found stealing or attempting to steal a house pigeon, that case is dealt with under s. 21. In s. 23 the Legislature, for some reason or other, deals specifically with pigeons as distinct from all other birds. In my view, the words "under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law," are an indication that the unlawful and wilful killing, &c., of a pigeon is to be an offence, although the act does not contain the elements necessary to constitute larceny at common law. I

I think that the probable explanation of the words which, as they appear in the section, are very inapt, is that suggested by LORD HEWART, C.J., namely, that the words "under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law" were really intended to apply only to the word "take" and have no reference to the words "kill" or "wound." I think that there was no need for the introduction of s. 23 unless it was intended to make any unlawful interference with a pigeon an offence

A without any consideration of what is necessary to constitute the offence of larceny. I think that that was the meaning given to the section in Horton v. Gwynne (1) which I am glad to follow. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Case remitted with direction to find offence proved.

GRANT v. AUSTRALIAN KNITTING MILLS, LTD.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Hailsham, L.C., Lord Blanesburgh, Lord Macmillan, Lord D Wright, and Sir Lancelot Sanderson), July 1, 2, 4, 5, 8, 9, 11, 12, 15, October 21, 1935]

Dangerous goods—Liability of manufacturer and retailer—Underwear—Sale in retail E shop—Dermatitis causing illness to customer—Presence of free sulphite—South Australia Sale of Goods Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict., No. 630), s. 14 (1), (2).

The appellant contracted dermatitis by reason of the defective condition of woollen underwear which the retailers sold to him at their shop and the manufacturers put forth for retail and indiscriminate sale. In an action for damages brought by him against both the retailers and the manufacturers,

F Held: (i) the retailers were liable to the appellant in contract under s. 14 of the South Australia Sale of Goods Act, 1895 (which was in the same terms as s. 14 of the English Act of 1893)—under s. 14 (1) because in such a transaction as took place between the appellant, as customer, and the retailers the appellant made known the purpose for which the goods were required so as to show that he relied on the retailers' skill and judgment, and under s. 14 (2) because there was a sale by G description even though the appellant was buying something displayed before him on the counter, that article not being sold merely as a specific thing, but as a thing corresponding to a description, i.e., woollen underwear, and the article sold was not "merchantable" since it was not fit for the purpose for which it was required.

(ii) the manufacturers had made the underwear in a negligent and improper way, the defective condition of the underwear was due to a latent defect which could not H be discovered by any reasonable examination, and the underwear reached the appellant in the same defective condition as that in which it was when it left the manufacturers, and, therefore, the manufacturers were liable to the appellant in tort.

Appeal by special leave from a judgment of the High Court of Australia.

The plaintiff, Dr. Richard Thorold Grant, of Adelaide, South Australia, claimed damages on the ground that he had contracted dermatitis by reason of the improper condition of some underpants bought by him from the defendants, John Martin and Co., Ltd., and manufactured by the defendants, Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd.

The appellant bought the underwear on June 3, 1931. He put on one suit on the morning of June 28, 1931. By the evening of that date he felt itching, but no objective symptoms appeared until the next day, when a redness appeared in front of each ankle over an area of about 2½ in. by 1½ in. His condition got worse, the rash became generalised and very acute, and he was confined to bed for seventeen weeks. In November he became convalescent and went to New Zealand to recuperate. He returned in the following February, but soon had a relapse, and by March his condition was so serious that in April he went into hospital where he remained until July. In April he began this action.

The Supreme Court of South Australia (Murray, C.J.) gave judgment against both defendants, against the retailers on the contract of sale, and against the manufacturers in tort, following the decision of the House of Lords in Donoghue (or McAlister) v. Stevenson (1), but the decision of the Supreme Court was reversed by the High Court of Australia by a majority. The plaintiff appealed.

Oct. 21. LORD WRIGHT.—The appellant is a fully qualified medical man practising at Adelaide in South Australia. He brought his action against the respondents claiming damages on the ground that he had contracted dermatitis by reason of the improper condition of underwear purchased by him from the respondents, John Martin & Co., Ltd., and manufactured by the respondents, the Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. The case was tried by Sir George Murray, Chief Justice of South Australia, who after a trial lasting for twenty days gave judgment against both respondents for the appellant for £2,450 and costs. On appeal the High Court of Australia set aside that judgment by a majority. Evatt, J., dissented, and agreed with the Chief Justice. Of the majority, the reasoning of Dixon, J., with whom McTiernan, J., concurred, was in effect that the evidence was not sufficient to make it safe to find for the appellant. Starke, J., who accepted substantially all the detailed findings of the Chief Justice, differed from him on his general conclusions of liability based on these findings.

The appellant's claim was that the disease was caused by the presence in the cuffs or ankle ends of the underpants which he purchased and wore, of an irritating chemical, namely, free sulphite, the presence of which was due to negligence in manufacture, and also involved on the part of the respondents, John Martin & Co., Ltd., a breach of the relevant implied conditions under the Sale of Goods Act.

The underwear, consisting of two pairs of underpants and two singlets, was bought by the appellant at the shop of the respondents, John Martin & Co., Ltd., who dealt in such goods and who will hereafter be referred to as the retailers, on June 3, 1931; the retailers had in ordinary course at some previous date purchased them with other stock from the respondents, the Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd., who will be referred to as the manufacturers. The garments were of that class of the manufacturers' make known as Golden Fleece. The appellant put on one suit on the morning of Sunday, June 28, 1931; by the evening of that day he felt itching on the ankles, but no objective symptoms appeared until the next day, when a redness appeared on each ankle in front over an area of about 2½ in. by 1½ in. The appellant treated himself with calomine lotion, but the irritation was such that he scratched the places till he bled. On Sunday, July 5, he changed his underwear and put on the other set which he had purchased from the retailers; the first set was washed and when the appellant changed his garments again on the following Sunday he put on the washed set and sent the others to the wash; he changed again on July 12. Though his skin trouble was getting worse he did not attribute it to the underwear, but on July 13 he consulted a dermatologist, Dr. Upton, who advised him to discard the underwear, which he did, returning the garments to the retailers with the intimation that they had given him dermatitis. By that time one set had been washed twice and the other set once. The appellant's condition got worse and worse; he was confined to bed from July 21 for seventeen weeks; the rash became generalised and very acute. In November he became convalescent and went to New Zealand to recuperate. He returned in the following February and felt sufficiently recovered to resume his practice, but soon had a relapse and by March his condition was so serious that in April he went into hospital, where he remained until July. Meantime, in April, 1932, he commenced this action, which was tried in and after November of that year. Dr. Upton was his medical attendant throughout and explained in detail at the trial the course of the illness and the treatment he adopted. Dr. de Crespigny also attended the appellant from and after July 22, 1931, and gave evidence at the trial. The illness was most severe, involving acute suffering, and at times Dr. Upton feared that his patient might die.

It is impossible here to examine in detail the minute and conflicting evidence of fact and of expert opinion given at the trial: all that evidence was meticulously discussed at the hearing of the appeal before the board. It is only possible to state briefly the conclusions at which their Lordships after careful consideration have arrived.

In the first place, their Lordships are of opinion that the disease was of external origin. Much of the medical evidence was directed to supporting or refuting the contention strenuously advanced on behalf of the respondents that the dermatitis was internally produced and was of the type described as herpetiformis, which is generally regarded as of internal origin. That contention may now be taken to have failed; it has been rejected by the Chief Justice at the trial and in the High Court, by STARKE and EVATT, JJ., and, in effect also, by DIXON and MCTIERNAN, JJ. The evidence as to the symptoms and course of the disease given by the two doctors who attended the appellant is decisive: dermatitis herpetiformis is an uncommon disease of a type generally not so severe as that suffered by the appellant, and presenting in general certain characteristic features, in particular, bullae or blisters and symmetrical grouping of the inflammatory features, which were never present in the appellant. Dr. Wigley, a very eminent dermatologist, who examined the appellant, and as an expert gave evidence in support of the doctors who actually attended him, expressed his opinion that all dermatitis had an external origin, but whether he was right in this or not, he was confident that in the appellant's case the origin of the disease was external, and on all the evidence their Lordships accept this view.

But then it was said that the disease may have been contracted by the appellant from some external irritant the presence of which argued no imperfection in the garments, but which only did harm because of the appellant's peculiar susceptibility. Thus the disease might have been initiated by the mechanical irritation of the wool itself, or, if it was due to some chemical ingredient in the garments, that might have been something in itself harmless, either because of its character or because of the actual quantity in which it was present, so that the mischief was attributable to the appellant's own physical defect and not to any defect in the garments; the respondents, it was said, could not be held responsible for anything in the garments which would not be harmful in normal use. Two issues were thus involved: (i) was the appellant's skin normal, and (ii) was there in the garments or any part of them a detrimental quantity of any mischievous chemical?

The Chief Justice held that the appellant's skin was normal. He had habitually up to the material time worn woollen undergarments without inconvenience; that he was not sensitive to the mechanical effects of wool seemed to be proved by an experiment of his doctors who placed a piece of scoured wool on a clear area of his skin and found after a sufficient interval no trace of irritation being produced. It was said that he had suffered from tuberculosis some years before and that the disease had merely been arrested, not eliminated, and it was then said that tuberculosis made the patient more susceptible to skin disease, because it weakens the resistance of the skin and lowers the patient's vitality. But this contention did not appear to be established. It was admitted that the appellant's skin had by reason of his illness become what is denominated "allergic," that is, unduly sensitised to the particular irritant from which he had suffered; but that could throw no light on the original skin condition. A point was made that skin ordinarily normal might transiently and unexpectedly show a peculiar sensitivity, but that remained a mere possibility which was not developed and may be ignored. In the result, there does not seem any reason to differ from the Chief Justice's finding that the appellant's skin was normal.

What, then, caused this terrible outbreak of dermatitis? The place and time of the original infection would seem to point to the cause being something in the garments, and, in particular, to something in the ankle ends of the underpants, because the inflammation began at the front of the shins where the skin is drawn tight over the bone, and where the cuff of the pants presses tightly under the socks against the skin, and began about nine or ten hours after the pants were first put on: the subsequent virulence and extension of the disease may be explained by the toxins produced by the inflammation getting into the blood stream. But the coincidence, it was pointed out, was not sufficient proof in itself that the pants were the cause. The appellant then relied on the fact that it was admitted in the respondents' answers to interrogatories that the garments when delivered to the retailer by the manufacturers contained sulphur dioxide, and on the fact that the presence of sulphur dioxide indicated the presence of free sulphites in the garment. If there were in a garment worn continuously all day next the skin free sulphites in sufficient quantities, a powerful irritant would be set in operation. Sweat is being slowly and continuously secreted by the skin, and combines with the free sulphites to form successively sulphur dioxide, sulphurous acid, and sulphuric acid: sulphuric acid is an irritant which would produce dermatitis in a normal skin if applied in garments under the conditions existing when the appellant wore the underpants. It is a fair deduction from the answers and from the evidence that free sulphites were present in quantities not to be described as small, but that still left the question whether they were present in quantities sufficient to account for the disease.

It is impossible now, and was impossible at any time after the garments were washed, to prove what quantities were present when the garments were sold. That can only be inferred from various considerations. The garments were in July, 1931, handed back to the retailers and by them sent back to the manufacturers. In November, 1931, Mr. Anderson, of Victoria, an analytical chemist, on the instructions of the manufacturers, analysed one-half of one of the pants to ascertain what quantity of water soluble salts they contained and found certain quantities of sulphates, but sulphates would not irritate the skin. In the following May, Mr. Anderson made a further analysis of the other three garments and of the remaining half of the pair of pants: he was testing for sulphites, which he expressed in terms of sulphur dioxide percentage by weight. In one singlet he found a nil return, in the other ·0070; in the pants he found ·0082 in one and ·0201 in the other. There was some debate whether these figures were of free sulphites, or of sulphites adherent to the wool molecule, and not soluble by sweat. Their Lordships, after careful consideration and for a variety of reasons, do not differ from the conclusion of the Chief Justice that these results proved the presence of free sulphite. But the results were not such as to show quantities likely to cause irritation. On the other hand, a very eminent scientist, Professor Hicks, called by the appellant, gave his opinion that the garments before washing must have had sulphites in considerably greater quantity: and these tests of Mr. Anderson were of each garment as a whole, whereas it was clear that the relevant parts in each pair of pants were the ankle ends since the disease was initiated at that point in each leg. It is clear that no further light could be thrown by fresh analysis of the actual garments.

Evidence was given on behalf of the manufacturers as to the processes used in the manufacture of these garments. The webs of wool were put through six different processes: of these the second, third, and fourth were the most significant for this case. The second was for shrinking and involved treatment of the web with a solution of calcium hypochloride and hydrochloric acid. The third process was to remove these chemicals by a solution of bisulphite of soda, and the fourth process was to neutralise the bisulphite by means of bicarbonate of soda; the fifth process was for washing and the sixth was a drying and finishing process. If the fourth process did not neutralise the added bisulphite, free sulphites would remain, which the subsequent washing might not entirely remove. The manufacturers' evidence was that the process was properly applied to the wool from which these garments were made, and if properly applied was bound to be effective. The foreman scourer, Smith, was not called at the trial, where his absence was made matter of comment, but Ashworth, one of the scourers, gave evidence and among other things said that they had to be very careful that there was no excess of one chemical or the other. If there were an excess of some sort or the other it would be bound to be somebody's fault. The washing-off was to clear out as much of the traces of the previous process as possible. But something might go wrong, someone might be negligent, and as a result some bisulphite of soda which had been introduced might not have been got rid of. The cuffs of the pants were ribbed and were made of a different web separately treated. The appellant's advisers had, at the trial, no independent information as to the actual process adopted in respect of these garments or even when they were made, and, by petition, they asked for leave to adduce further evidence which would go to show, as they suggested, that the process deposed to was not adopted by the manufacturers until after June 3, 1931. Their Lordships, however, feel themselves in a position to dispose of the appeal on the evidence as it stands, taking due account of the fact that the manufacturers' secretary was called and deposed that in the previous six years the manufacturers had treated by a similar process 4,737,600 of these garments, which they had sold to drapers throughout Australia and he had no recollection of any complaints which, if made, would in ordinary course have come under his notice. Dr. Hargreaves, an analytical chemist, on the instructions of the manufacturers, analysed specimen garments, subjecting them to tests which would extract any sulphur adherent to the wool as well as free sulphites, if any were present, and found only negligible quantities. Against this evidence was that of Professor Hicks, who agitated in unheated water for two minutes a singlet of the manufacturers' Golden Fleece make, purchased in Nov., 1932, and found that the aqueous extract contained a percentage by weight of sulphite of ·11, which, in his opinion, was free in the fabric and readily soluble in cold water. The significance of this experiment seems to be that, however well designed the manufacturers' proved system may be to eliminate deleterious substances, it may not invariably work according to plan. Some employee may blunder.

Counsel for the respondents quite rightly emphasised how crucial it would have been for the appellant's case to prove by positive evidence that in fact the garments which the appellant wore contained an excess of free sulphites. He contended that the appellant's case involved arguing in a circle; his argument, he said, was that the garments must have caused the dermatitis because they contained excess sulphites, and must have contained excess sulphites because they caused the disease; but nought, he said, added to nought still is no more than nought. This, however, does not do justice either to the process of reasoning by way of probable inference which has to do so much in human affairs or to the nature of circumstantial evidence in law courts. Mathematical, or strict logical, demonstration is generally impossible: juries are in practice told that they must act on such reasonable balance of probabilities as would suffice to determine a reasonable man to take a decision in the grave affairs of life. Pieces of evidence, each by itself insufficient, may together constitute a significant whole, and justify by their combined effect a conclusion. Dixon, J., in the judgment in which he dissented from that of the Chief Justice, does not seem to suggest that there was no evidence for a decision in the appellant's favour, but merely that it was not safe so to decide. But the coincidences of time and place and the absence of any other explanation than the presence of free sulphite in the garments, point strongly in favour of the appellant's case: it is admitted as has been said above that some sulphites were present in the garments, and there is nothing to exclude the possibility of a quantity sufficient to do the harm. On the whole there does not seem adequate reason to upset the judgment on the facts of the Chief Justice. No doubt, this case depends in the last resort on inferences to be drawn from the evidence, though on much of the detailed evidence the trial judge had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses. The plaintiff must prove his case, but there is an onus on a defendant who, on appeal, contends that a judgment should be upset: he has to show that it is wrong. Their Lordships are not satisfied in this case that the Chief Justice was wrong.

That conclusion means that the disease contracted and the damage suffered by the appellant were caused by the defective condition of the garments which the retailers sold to him and which the manufacturers made and put forth for retail and indiscriminate sale. The Chief Justice gave judgment against both respondents, against the retailers on the contract of sale, and against the manufacturers in tort, on the basis of the decision in the House of Lords in Donoghue (or McAlister) v. Stevenson (1). The liability of each respondent depends on a different cause of action, though it is for the same damage. It is not claimed that the appellant should recover his damage twice over; no objection is raised on the part of the respondents to the form of the judgment which was against both respondents for a single amount.

So far as concerns the retailers, counsel for the respondents conceded that, if it were held that the garments contained improper chemicals and caused the disease, the retailers were liable for breach of implied warranty, or rather condition, under s. 14 of the South Australia Sale of Goods Act, 1895, which is identical with s. 14 of the English Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The section is in the following terms:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows: (1) Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose: (2) Where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality: provided that if the buyer has examined the goods, there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed: (3) An implied warranty or condition as to quality or fitness for a particular purpose may be annexed by the usage of trade: (4) An express warranty or condition does not negative a warranty or condition implied by this Act unless inconsistent therewith.

He limited his admission to liability under exception (2), but their Lordships are of opinion that liability is made out under both exception (1) and exception (2) to s. 14, and feel that they should so state out of deference to the views expressed in the court below.

Section 14 begins by a general enunciation of the old rule of caveat emptor, and proceeds to state by way of exception the two implied conditions by which it has been said the old rule has been changed to the rule of caveat vendor: the change has been rendered necessary by the conditions of modern commerce and trade. The section has been recently twice discussed by the House of Lords, once in Medway Oil and Storage Co., Ltd. v. Silica Gel Corpn. (2) and again in Cammell, Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (3). There are numerous cases on the section, but as these were cited below it is not necessary to detail them again. The first exception, if its terms are satisfied, entitles the buyer to the benefit of an implied condition that the goods are reasonably fit for the purpose for which the goods are supplied, but only if that purpose is made known to the seller "so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment." It is clear that the reliance must be brought home to the mind of the seller, expressly or by implication. The reliance will seldom be express; it will usually arise by implication from the circumstances; thus to take a case like that in question of a purchase from a retailer the reliance will be in general inferred from the fact that a buyer goes to the shop in the confidence that the tradesman has selected his stock with skill and judgment; the retailer need know nothing about the process of manufacture; it is immaterial whether he be manufacturer or not; the main inducement to deal with a good retail shop is the expectation that the tradesman will have bought the right goods of a good make; the goods sold must be, as they were in the present case, goods of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply; there is no need to specify in terms the particular purpose for which the buyer requires the goods; which is none the less the particular purpose within the meaning of the section because it is the only purpose for which anyone would ordinarily want the goods. In this case the garments were naturally intended and only intended to be worn next the skin. The proviso does not apply to a case like the sale of Golden Fleece make such as is here in question, because Golden Fleece is rather a patent or trade name within the meaning of the proviso to exception (1). With great deference to DIXON, J., their Lordships think that the requirements of exception (1) were complied with. The conversation at the shop in which the appellant discussed questions of price and of the different makes did not affect the fact that he was substantially relying on the retailers to supply him with a correct article.

The second exception in a case like this in truth overlaps in its application the first exception; whatever else "merchantable" may mean, it does mean that the article sold, if only meant for one particular use in the ordinary course, is fit for that use. "Merchantable" does not mean that the thing is saleable in the market simply because it looks all right; it is not merchantable in that event if it has defects unfitting it for its only proper use but not apparent on ordinary examination; that is clear from the proviso, which shows that the implied condition only applies to defects not reasonably discoverable to the buyer on such examination as he made or could make. The appellant was satisfied by the appearance of the underpants; he could not detect and had no reason to suspect the hidden presence of the sulphites; the garments were saleable in the sense that the appellant or anyone similarly situated and who did not know of their defect, would readily buy them; but they were not merchantable in the statutory sense because their defect rendered them unfit to be worn next the skin. It may be that after sufficient washing that defect would have disappeared; but the statute requires the goods to be merchantable in the state in which they were sold and delivered; in this connection a defect which could easily be cured is as serious as a defect that would not yield to treatment. The proviso to exception (2) does not apply where, as in this case, no examination that the buyer could or would normally have made would have revealed the defect. In effect, the implied condition of being fit for the particular purpose for which they are required and the implied condition of being merchantable produce in cases of this type the same result. It may also be pointed out that there is a sale by description even though the buyer is buying something displayed before him on the counter; a thing is sold by description, though it is specific, so long as it is sold not merely as the specific thing but as a thing corresponding to a description, e.g., woollen under-garments, a hot water bottle, a secondhand reaping machine, to select a few obvious illustrations.

The retailers, accordingly, in their Lordships' judgment are liable in contract; so far as they are concerned, no question of negligence is relevant to the liability in contract. But when the position of the manufacturers is considered, different questions arise; there is no privity of contract between the appellant and the manufacturers; between them the liability, if any, must be in tort, and the gist of the cause of action is negligence. The facts set out in the foregoing show in their Lordships' judgment negligence in manufacture. According to the evidence, the method of manufacture was correct; the danger of excess sulphites being left was recognised and was guarded against; the process was intended to be foolproof. If excess sulphites were left in the garment, that could only be because someone was at fault. The appellant is not required to lay his finger on the exact person in all the chain who was responsible or to specify what he did wrong. Negligence is found as a matter of inference from the existence of the defects taken in connection with all the known circumstances; even if the manufacturers could by apt evidence have rebutted that inference they have not done so.

On this basis, the damage suffered by the appellant was caused in fact (because the interposition of the retailers may for this purpose in the circumstances of the case be disregarded) by the negligent or improper way in which the manufacturers made the garments. But this mere sequence of cause and effect is not enough in law to constitute a cause of action in negligence, which is a complex concept, involving a duty as between the parties to take care, as well as a breach of that duty and resulting damage. It might be said that here was no relationship between the parties at all; the manufacturers, it might be said, parted once and for all with the garments when they sold them to the retailers and were, therefore, not concerned with their future history, except in so far as under their contract with the retailers they might come under some liability; at no time, it might be said, had they any knowledge of the existence of the appellant; the only peg on which it might be sought to support a relationship of duty was the fact that the appellant had actually worn the garments, but he had done so because he had acquired them by a purchase from the retailers, who were at that time the owners of the goods, by a sale which had vested the property in the retailers and divested both property and control from the manufacturers. It was said there could be no legal relationship in the matter save those under the two contracts between the respective parties to those contracts, the one between the manufacturers and the retailers and the other between the retailers and the appellant. These contractual relationships (it might be said) covered the whole field and excluded any question of tort liability; there was no duty other than the contractual duties.

This argument was based on the contention that the present case fell outside the decision of the House of Lords in Donoghue (or McAlister) v. Stevenson (1). Their Lordships, like the judges in the courts in Australia, will follow that decision, and the only question here can be what that authority decides and whether this case comes within its principles. In Donoghue's Case (1) the defendants were manufacturers of ginger beer which they bottled; the pursuer had been given one of their bottles by a friend who had purchased it from a retailer, who, in turn, had purchased from the defenders. There was no relationship between pursuer and defenders except that arising from the fact that she consumed the ginger beer they had made and bottled. The bottle was opaque so that it was impossible to see that it contained the decomposed remains of a snail; it was sealed and stoppered so that it could not be tampered with until it was opened in order to be drunk. The House of Lords held these facts established in law a duty to take care as between the defenders and the pursuer.

Their Lordships think that the principle of the decision is summed up in the words of Lord Atkin ([1932] A.C. at p. 599):

> "A manufacturer of products, which he sells in such a form as to show that he intends them to reach the ultimate consumer in the form in which they left him with no reasonable possibility of intermediate examination, and with the knowledge that the absence of reasonable care in the preparation of putting up of the products will result in an injury to the consumer's life or property, owes a duty to the consumer to take that reasonable care."

This statement is in accord with the opinions expressed by Lord Thankerton and Lord Macmillan, who in principle agreed with Lord Atkin.

In order to ascertain whether the principle applies to the present case, it is necessary to define what the decision involves and consider the points of distinction relied upon before their Lordships.

It is clear that the decision treats negligence, where there is a duty to take care, as a specific tort in itself, and not simply as an element in some more complex relationship or in some specialised breach of duty, and still less as having any dependence on contract. All that is necessary as a step to establish the tort of actionable negligence is to define the precise relationship from which the duty to take care is to be deduced. It is, however, essential in English law that the duty should be established; the mere fact that a man is injured by another's act gives in itself no cause of action; if the act is deliberate, the party injured will have no claim in law even though the injury is intentional, so long as the other party is merely exercising a legal right; if the act involves lack of due care, again no case of actionable negligence will arise unless the duty to be careful exists. In Donoghue's Case (1), the duty was deduced simply from the facts relied on, namely, that the injured party was one of a class for whose use, in the contemplation and intention of the makers, the article was issued to the world, and the article was used by that party in the state in which it was prepared and issued without it being changed in any way and without there being any warning of, or means of detecting, the hidden danger; there was, it is true, no personal intercourse between the maker and the user; but though the duty is personal, because it is inter partes, it needs no interchange of words, spoken or written, or signs of offer or assent; it is thus different in character from any contractual relationship; no question of consideration between the parties is relevant; for these reasons the use of the word "privity" in this connection is apt to mislead because of the suggestion of some overt relationship like that in contract, and the word "proximity" is open to the same objection; if the term proximity is to be applied at all, it can only be in the sense that the want of care and the injury are in essence directly and intimately connected; though there may be intervening transactions of sale and purchase and intervening handling between these two events, the events are themselves unaffected by what happened between them: proximity can only properly be used to exclude any element of remoteness, or of some interfering complication between the want of care and the injury, and, like "privity" may mislead by introducing alien ideas. Equally also may the word "control" embarrass, though it is conveniently used in the opinions in Donoghue's Case (1) to emphasise the essential factor that the consumer must use the article exactly as it left the maker, that is in all material features, and use it as it was intended to be used. In that sense the maker may be said to control the thing until it is used. But that again is an artificial use, because, in the natural sense of the word, the makers parted with all control when they sold the article and divested themselves of possession and property. An argument used in the present case based on the word "control" will be noticed later.

It is obvious that the principles thus laid down involve a duty based on the simple facts detailed above, a duty quite unaffected by any contracts dealing with the thing, for instance, of sale by maker to retailer, and again by retailer to consumer or to the consumer's friend.

It may be said that the duty is difficult to define, because when the act of negligence in manufacture occurs there was no specific person towards whom the duty could be said to exist: the thing might never be used: it might be destroyed by accident or it might be scrapped, or in many ways fail to come into use in the normal way: in other words, the duty cannot at the time of manufacture be other than potential or contingent, and only can become vested by the fact of actual use by a particular person. But the same theoretical difficulty has been disregarded in cases like Heaven v. Pender (4), or in the case of things dangerous per se or known to be dangerous, where third parties have been held entitled to recover on the principles explained in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins (5). In Donoghue's Case (1), the thing was dangerous in fact, though the danger was hidden, and the thing was dangerous only because of want of care in making it; as Lord Atkin points out in Donoghue's Case (1) ([1932] A.C. at p. 595), the distinction between things inherently dangerous and things only dangerous because of negligent manufacture cannot be regarded as significant for the purpose of the questions here involved.

One further point may be noted. The principle of Donoghue's Case (1) can only be applied where the defect is hidden and unknown to the consumer, otherwise the directness of cause and effect is absent: the man who consumes or uses a thing which he knows to be noxious cannot complain in respect of whatever mischief follows because it follows from his own conscious volition in choosing to incur the risk or certainty of mischance.

If the foregoing are the essential features of Donoghue's Case (1) they are also to be found, in their Lordships' judgment, in the present case. The presence of the deleterious chemical in the pants, due to negligence in manufacture, was a hidden and latent defect, just as much as were the remains of the snail in the opaque bottle: it could not be detected by any examination that could reasonably be made. Nothing happened between the making of the garments and their being worn to change their condition. The garments were made by the manufacturers for the purpose of being worn exactly as they were worn in fact by the appellant: it was not contemplated that they should be first washed. It is immaterial that the appellant has a claim in contract against the retailers, because that is a quite independent cause of action, based on different considerations, even though the damage may be the same. Equally irrelevant is any question of liability between the retailers and the manufacturers on the contract of sale between them. The tort liability is independent of any question of contract.

It was argued, but not perhaps very strongly, that Donoghue's Case (1) was a case of food or drink to be consumed internally, whereas the pants here were to be worn externally. No distinction, however, can be logically drawn for this purpose between a noxious thing taken internally and a noxious thing applied externally: the garments were made to be worn next the skin: indeed LORD ATKIN ([1932] A.C. at p. 583) specifically puts as examples of what is covered by the principle he is enunciating things operating externally, such as "an ointment, a soap, a cleaning fluid, or cleaning powder."

Counsel for the respondents, however, sought to distinguish Donoghue's Case (1) from the present on the ground that in the former the makers of the ginger beer had retained 'control" over it in the sense that they had placed it in stoppered and sealed bottles, so that it would not be tampered with until it was opened to be drunk, whereas the garments in question were merely put into paper packets, each containing six sets, which in ordinary course would be taken down by the shopkeeper and opened and the contents handled and disposed of separately so that they would be exposed to the air. He contended that, though there was no reason to think that the garments, when sold to the appellant were in any other condition, least of all as regards sulphur contents, than when sold to the retailers by the manufacturers, still the mere possibility and not the fact of their condition having been changed was sufficient to distinguish Donoghue's Case (1): there was no "control" because nothing was done by the manufacturers to exclude the possibility of any tampering while the goods were on their way to the user. Their Lordships do not accept that contention. The decision in Donoghue's Case (1) did not depend on the bottle being stoppered and sealed; the essential point in this regard was that the article should reach the consumer or user subject to the same defect as it had when it left the manufacturer. That this was true of the garment is in their Lordships' opinion beyond question. At most there might in other cases be a greater difficulty of proof of the fact.

Counsel further contended on behalf of the manufacturers that, if the decision in Donoghue's Case (1) were extended even a hairsbreadth, no line could be drawn and a manufacturer's liability would be extended indefinitely. He put as an illustration the case of a foundry which had cast a rudder to be fitted on a liner: he assumed that it was fitted and the steamer sailed the seas for some years: but the rudder had a latent defect due to faulty and negligent casting and one day it broke, with the result that the vessel was wrecked, with great loss of life and damage to property. He argued that, if Donoghue's Case (1) were extended beyond its precise facts, the maker of the rudder would be held liable for damages of an indefinite amount, after an indefinite time and to claimants indeterminate until the event. But it is clear that such a state of things would involve many considerations far removed from the simple facts of this case. So many contingencies must have intervened between the lack of care on the part of the makers and the casualty that it may be that the law would apply, as it does in proper cases, not always according to strict logic, the rule, that cause and effect must not be too remote. In any case the element of directness would obviously be lacking. LORD ATKIN deals with that sort of question in Donoghue's Case (1) ([1932] A.C. at p. 591) where he refers to Earl v. Lubbock (6): he quotes the common sense opinion of MATHEW, L.J.:

> "It is impossible to accept such a wide proposition, and, indeed, it is difficult to see how, if it were the law, trade could be carried on."

In their Lordships' opinion it is enough for them to decide this case on its actual facts. No doubt, many difficult problems will arise before the precise limits of the principle are defined: many qualifying conditions and many complications of fact may in the future come before the Courts for decision. It is enough now to say that their Lordships hold the present case to come within the principle of Donoghue's Case (1) and they think that the judgment of the Chief Justice was right and should be restored as against both respondents, and that the appeal should be allowed with costs here and in the courts below, and that the appellant's petition for leave to adduce further evidence should be dismissed without costs. They will humbly so advise His Majesty.

Appeal allowed.

Estate Duty—Passing—Cesser of annuity on death of life tenant—Annuitant becoming entitled to whole income—Allowance for annuity—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 1.

Estate Duty—Determination of life interest—Sums raisable out of capital at death of life tenant—Sums raised under order of court within three years before death of life tenant —Liability to duty of sums raised—Finance Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict., c. 7), s. 11 (1) (as amended by Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. 7 & 1 Geo. 5, c. 8), s. 59 (1)).

By virtue of the will of H. T. who died on May 4, 1886, and a re-settlement dated July 30, 1886, estates stood limited for the benefit of H. F. T. for his life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. H. F. T. had power to charge the settled estates with portions for his younger children of £90,000. By a Private Act, the De Trafford Estate Act, 1904, the trustees were authorised to purchase H. F. T.'s life interest, and the annual income arising during his life was to be applied in the manner therein specified including a discretionary application of a maximum annual sum for H. F. T., his wife and issue. In 1907 H. F. T. exercised his power of charging portions and charged the estate with £90,000 for that purpose, but not to be raised or paid in his lifetime. In 1912 H. E. T., the eldest son of H. F. T., attained the age of twenty-one years, and shortly afterwards he disentailed, and in 1914 re-settled, the estates. By the re-settlement of 1914 H. E. T. assured the estates to the trustees in fee simple to uses for raising further portions for the younger children of H. F. T. to the amount of £160,000 in addition to the £90,000 already charged, and subject thereto for H. E. T. for life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. The said re-settlement further provided that, notwithstanding anything in the Act of 1904, the annual income of the estates should, during the life of H. F. T., be held and applied by the trustees in making the payments therein mentioned which included the payment, during the joint lives of H. F. T. and H. E. T., of an annual sum to H. E. T. amounting to £8,000 as from his attaining the age of thirty-five years until he should attain the age of forty years. The said re-settlement also authorised H. E. T. to charge the estates with the payment to himself of capital sums not exceeding £50,000 with a proviso that no sum appointed under that power should be payable or raisable during the life of H. F. T. The re-settlement was ratified by a Private Act of Parliament. H. F. T. exercised his power of appointing portions to the full amount of the additional sum of £160,000, to be raised and paid after his death. H. E. T. from time to time borrowed moneys from the trustees amounting in all to £50,000 and on each occasion as part of the security for repayment he (in exercise of the power conferred by the re-settlement of 1914) charged a part of the estates with payment to the trustees of a sum equal to the loan. By an order dated July 28, 1928, the court approved a scheme pursuant to which by a deed dated Aug. 15, 1928, the trustees surrendered and released investments or cash of the amount or value of £300,000 to be raised forthwith by the trustees out of capital to the intent that the portions amounting to £250,000 and the said sum of £50,000 might be brought into immediate possession discharged from all trusts affecting the same during the life of H. F. T. The £250,000 for portions was, accordingly, raised and paid, and the £50,000 (then owed by H. E. T. to the trustees) was appropriated by the trustees. Shortly afterwards, on Jan. 10, 1929, H. F. T. died. Immediately prior to the death of H. F. T. the annual sum of £8,000 was being paid to H. E. T., who had attained the age of thirty-five years on Nov. 30, 1926. On the question of what claims for estate duty then arose.

Held: (i) estate duty was exigible under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, in respect of the whole of the estates remaining settled at the date of H. F. T.'s death, without any allowance for the annuity of £8,000 per annum payable to H. E. T. (Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), [1899] A.C. 198, followed); (ii) the capital sums amounting to £300,000 were liable to estate duty by virtue of the Finance Act, 1900, s. 11 (1).

Notes. The Finance Act, 1900, s. 11, was repealed by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 65. The Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, deals with the determination of life interests where the relevant death occurs after June 26, 1940. Section 43 of the Act of 1940 was modified by the Finance Act, 1950, s. 43.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Lawrence and Slesser, L.JJ.) on an information dated Nov. 27, 1931. The information set out as follows:

1. The object of the information was to establish the right to and rate of estate duty and succession duty upon the death of Sir Humphrey Francis de Trafford (hereinafter called "the deceased") in respect of the property below mentioned.

2. By his will dated May 5, 1883, Sir Humphrey de Trafford (the father of the deceased) appointed the trustees thereof to be trustees also for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and devised his residuary real estate to the use of the deceased for life with remainder to the use of the deceased's first and other sons successively in tail male, and gave the deceased power to charge the same with portions not exceeding (in the events which happened) £90,000 for the benefit of his younger children, and to appoint a term of years in the same for securing such portions, and the said Sir Humphrey de Trafford thereby settled his residuary leasehold estates upon trusts correspondingly with the said limitations of his residuary real estate. The said Sir Humphrey de Trafford died on May 4, 1886, and his said will was duly proved on July 28, 1886.

3. By an indenture of re-settlement dated July 30, 1886 (which was executed in order to comply with a condition contained in the said will), the deceased granted and assigned certain estates known as the Barton Estates and investments held therewith upon the like uses as those contained in the said will of Sir Humphrey de Trafford with respect to his residuary real estate or upon trusts corresponding therewith, but so as not to multiply charges. The said residuary real estate and leaseholds and the said Barton Estates and the capital moneys, policies of insurance, and other property for the time being subject to the uses or trusts of the said will and indenture are hereinafter together referred to as "the settled estate."

4. The deceased had four children and no more, namely, his eldest son, Humphrey Edmund de Trafford (now Sir Humphrey Edmund de Trafford and hereinafter called "the present baronet"), who was born on Dec. 1, 1891, and three younger children, Rudolph Edgar Francis de Trafford, Raymund Vincent de Trafford, and Violet Mary de Trafford (now Violet Mary Menzies), all of whom are still living.

5. In pursuance of a provisional agreement made April 16, 1904, between the deceased and the trustees at that date of the said will of Sir Humphrey de Trafford (which said trustees and the trustees for the time being of the said will are hereinafter called "the trustees") and of a private Act of Parliament confirming the said provisional agreement (namely, the De Trafford Estate Act, 1904) the trustees in or about the year 1904 purchased the life interest of the deceased in the settled estate for the sum of £46,156, subject to certain paramount charges on the settled estate, and to divers charges created by the deceased on his life estate.

6. By s. 22 of the De Trafford Estate Act, 1904, it was provided that the trustees should apply the net annual income of the settled estate to be received by them during the lifetime of the deceased in making a number of payments not now material and subject thereto (a) in appropriating year by year so much of the said income (but not exceeding £6,000) as should in the opinion of the trustees be adequate for the benefit of the deceased and his wife and children, and (b) in paying year by year to or for the benefit of the present baronet (on his attaining the age of twenty-one years), a sum not exceeding £1,000 until marriage and not exceeding £2,000 after marriage, and should accumulate the surplus in manner therein specified for the primary purpose of replacing capital of the settled estate expended in pursuance of the provisions of the Act.

7. By an indenture dated May 11, 1907, the deceased in exercise of the power in that behalf contained in the said will of Sir Humphrey de Trafford and the said indenture dated July 30, 1886, irrevocably charged the settled estate, in remainder after his own life interest, with the payment to his younger children, in such shares as he should appoint and in default of appointment equally, with the sum of £90,000 for portions and appointed the settled estate to the use of the trustees for a term of 1,000 years from his decease upon usual trusts for raising the said sum.

8. By an indenture of disentailing assurance dated Aug. 22, 1913, the present baronet granted the settled estate (subject to the said portions charge of £90,000 and to the life interest of the deceased) to the use that a certain sum of £60,000 should be raised and applied as therein mentioned for the benefit of the deceased and his wife and subject thereto to his own use in fee simple and absolutely.

9. By an indenture of re-settlement dated May 8, 1914, and set out in the schedule to and confirmed by a private Act of Parliament, namely, the De Trafford Estate Act, 1914, the present baronet granted the settled estate, subject to the said portions charge of £90,000, and subject to the life interest of the deceased to the trustees to the use that the trustees should by mortgage or sale of the settled estate, or a sufficient part thereof, raise (in the events which happened) a further sum of £160,000 as portions for the younger children of the deceased and their issue, in such shares and for such interest as the deceased should appoint and subject thereto to the use of the present baronet for life with remainders over.

10. It was by the said indenture (as so confirmed) further provided that the limit of the yearly sum which the trustees might appropriate for the benefit of the deceased and his wife and children as mentioned in para. 6 hereof should be raised from £6,000 to £10,000, and that in lieu of the yearly sum to be paid to or for the benefit of the present baronet as in the said paragraph mentioned the trustees should (out of the income of the settled estate to be received by them during the lifetime of the deceased) make the following yearly payments to the present baronet, namely (i) £3,000 from Nov. 30, 1912, until he should attain the age of thirty years or previously marry, (ii) £5,000 from the date on which he should attain the age of thirty years or previously marry until he should attain the age of thirty-five years, (iii) £8,000 from the date on which he should attain the age of thirty-five years until he should attain the age of forty years, and (iv) £10,000 from the date on which he should attain the age of forty years. The said indenture further contained divers new provisions not now material with respect to the surplus income of the settled estate during the lifetime of the deceased.

11. It was by the said indenture (as so confirmed) further provided that it should be lawful for the present baronet (subject to the said portions charge of £90,000 and to the life interest of the deceased and to the said portions charge of £160,000) to charge the settled estate with the payment to himself or to any other person of a sum of £50,000.

12. On divers dates between Nov. 6, 1917, and March 5, 1928, the present baronet, in exercise of the power last above mentioned, charged the settled estate with the payment to himself of divers sums together amounting to the said sum of £50,000.

13. On Sept. 30, 1922, the deceased irrevocably appointed the sum of £50,000 (being part of the above-mentioned sum of £90,000) to his said daughter Violet Mary Menzies absolutely.

14. On Dec. 1, 1922, the deceased irrevocably appointed the sum of £15,000 (being a further part of the said sum of £90,000) to his said son Raymund Vincent de Trafford absolutely.

15. On July 14, 1923, the deceased irrevocably appointed the sum of £15,000 (being a further part of the said sum of £90,000) to his said son Rudolph Edgar Francis de Trafford absolutely.

16. On Dec. 18, 1923, the deceased irrevocably appointed the sum of £10,000 (being the balance of the said sum of £90,000) and the sum of £75,000 (being part of the above-mentioned sum of £160,000) to the said Rudolph Edgar Francis de Trafford absolutely.

17. On Nov. 1, 1924, the deceased irrevocably appointed the sum of £25,000 (being a further part of the said sum of £160,000) to the said Raymund Vincent de Trafford absolutely.

18. On Feb. 7, 1925, the deceased irrevocably appointed the sum of £60,000 (being the balance of the said sum of £160,000) on certain trusts for the benefit of the said Raymund Vincent de Trafford and his issue.

19. By a deed of surrender dated Aug. 15, 1928, and made pursuant to an order of the High Court of Justice dated July 28, 1928, the trustees surrendered investments or cash forming part of the settled estate to the value of £300,000 discharged from all trusts relating thereto during the lifetime of the deceased to be applied in satisfaction of the sums of £90,000, £160,000, and £50,000 respectively charged on the settled estate as mentioned in paras. 7, 9, and 12 hereof.

20. By virtue of the appointments mentioned in paras. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 hereof respectively and of certain settlements respectively made by the appointees thereunder, the said sums of £90,000 and £160,000, making an aggregate sum of £250,000, became divisible upon such surrender amongst the following persons and in the following proportions, namely:

(i) The trustees under the marriage settlement of Violet Mary Menzies ..	50,000
(ii) (a) The trustees under the marriage settlement of Rudolph Edgar Francis de Trafford	40,000
(b) Rudolph Edgar Francis de Trafford absolutely	60,000
(iii) (a) The trustees in trust for Raymund Vincent de Trafford under the above-mentioned appointment dated Feb. 7, 1925	60,000
(b) Raymund Vincent de Trafford absolutely	40,000
	£250,000

21. The trustees, at some time after Aug. 15, 1928, distributed or retained the said sum of £250,000 accordingly, save that the trustees appropriated the sum of £6,200 out of the sum due to Rudolph Edgar Francis de Trafford in satisfaction of a like sum of £6,200 owing by him to the trustees and appropriated the sum of £35,000 out of the sum due to Raymund Vincent de Trafford in satisfaction of a like sum of £35,000 owing by him to the trustees.

22. The present baronet became absolutely entitled upon such surrender to the said sum of £50,000. The trustees with the assent of the present baronet appropriated the said sum in satisfaction of a like sum of £50,000 owing by him, to the trustees.

23. The deceased died on Jan. 10, 1929, being a date less than three years after the date of the said surrender dated Aug. 15, 1928. Upon such death the present baronet became tenant for life of the settled estate.

24. The present baronet attained the age of thirty-five years on Nov. 30, 1926. Immediately prior to the date of the deceased's death, therefore, the yearly sum payable to the present baronet out of the income of the settled estate (as mentioned in para. 10 hereof) had amounted to £8,000.

25. In the circumstances aforesaid the informant submits that estate duty became payable upon the death of the deceased (a) under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value at the date of such death of the settled estate as property passing on such death without any deduction in respect of the said annuity of £8,000, (b) under s. 11 of the Finance Act, 1900, as amended by s. 59 (1) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in respect of each of the above-mentioned sums of £90,000, £160,000, and £50,000 as property deemed to pass on such death.

26. The aggregate value of the property which passed on the death of the deceased within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894 (including the settled estate and the said sums of £90,000, £160,000, and £50,000), was upwards of £2,000,000, and the appropriate rate of duty is therefore £40 per cent.

27. In the circumstances aforesaid the informant submits that succession duty became payable upon the death of the deceased, inter alia, under s. 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and s. 58 (1) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, at the rate of 5 per cent. in respect of the above-mentioned sum of £160,000 as on a succession thereto derived by the above-named brothers and sister of the present baronet or their respective descendants from the present baronet as predecessor.

28. The defendants as the present trustees of the said will of Sir Humphrey de Trafford and of the said indenture of re-settlement dated July 30, 1886, have accepted liability to account for the said estate duty and the said succession duty, if held to be payable, but the defendants contend (i) that they are entitled to deduct from the principal value of the settled estate for the purpose of estate duty a principal sum sufficient to produce, at the average rate of income of the settled estate, an income of £8,000 per annum, being the yearly sum which, as above mentioned, was payable to the present baronet immediately prior to the date of the deceased's death; (ii) that no estate duty is payable in respect of any of the above-mentioned sums of £90,000, £160,000, and £50,000; and (iii) that succession duty in respect of the said sum of £160,000 is payable at the rate of 1 per cent. and no more as on a succession derived from the deceased as predecessor.

29. The defendants have in their possession or power divers deeds, accounts, writings, and other documents relating to the matters in question in this suit and they ought to produce the same.

The informant, on behalf of His Majesty, prays as follows:

1. That it may be declared that upon the death of the deceased estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value of the settled estate and without any such deduction as above mentioned as property passing on the death of the deceased.

2. That it may be declared that upon the death of the deceased estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 11 of the Finance Act, 1900, as amended by s. 59 (1) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in respect of each of the above-mentioned sums of £90,000, £160,000, and £50,000, as property deemed to pass on the death of the deceased.

3. That it may be declared that upon the death of the deceased succession duty at the rate of 5 per cent. became payable under s. 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and s. 58 (1) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in respect of the above-mentioned sum of £160,000 as on a succession thereto derived by the above-named brothers and sister of the present baronet or their respective descendants from the present baronet as predecessor.

4. That the defendants may be ordered to deliver accounts of the said estate duty and the said succession duty respectively and to pay the amount of the said duties, with interest thereon respectively from the death of the deceased, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the informant hereby waiving such penalties as the defendants may have incurred by reason of the said duties not having been paid up to the present time.

5. That all necessary and proper inquiries may be made, directions given, and accounts taken for the purposes aforesaid.

6. That the informant on behalf of His Majesty may have such further or other relief in the premises as the case may require.

The Court of Appeal held (1) that what passed over on the death of the deceased baronet was the estate free from liability to pay the £8,000 a year to the present baronet, and, in fact, the estate passed in its entirety to the present baronet, therefore the £8,000 a year could not be deducted from what passed on the death of the deceased baronet.

The directions as to the effect of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, given in Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) followed.

(2) That estate duty was payable on the whole £300,000 within the meaning of the operative words of the first part of s. 11 of the Finance Act, 1900, as amended.

(3) That succession duty was only payable at the rate of 1 per cent. unless those who were successors took by title which conferred a new succession on them, and having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Lord Wolverton v. A.-G. (2), where reversioners had created a charge upon their contingent reversionary interest in the estate, there was an alienation of a part of the succession created, and not a new succession. Authority of A.-G. v. Cecil (3) not accepted. A.-G. v. Assheton Smith (4) overruled.

The trustees appealed on findings (1) and (2) of the Court of Appeal. There was no appeal on finding (3), which was concerned with the question of succession duty.

March 7. LORD ATKIN.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion about to be pronounced by my noble and learned friend, LORD RUSSELL, and I entirely agree with it in every respect.

LORD TOMLIN.—I also have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD RUSSELL. I agree with his conclusions, and with the reasoning upon which they are based.

LORD RUSSELL.—For the purpose of indicating my view as to the order which should be made on this appeal, it will not be necessary to trace in minute detail the numerous documents which have been executed, the private Acts of Parliament which have been passed, or the Orders of Court which have been made in regard to the de Trafford Estates, since Sir Humphrey de Trafford (the grandfather of the present baronet) died on May 4, 1886.

Under and by virtue of his will and a re-settlement dated July 30, 1886, the de Trafford estates stood limited to uses under which (immediately before the passing of the de Trafford Estate Act, 1904, on Aug. 15, of that year) Sir Humphrey Francis de Trafford (the late baronet) was legal tenant for life in possession with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. He had power to charge the estates with portions for his younger children to an amount in the events which happened of £90,000. I disregard a jointure in favour of the late baronet's mother who died on July 1, 1922.

Owing to circumstances which need not be discussed the de Trafford Estate Act, 1904, was passed. By s. 6 the trustees under the Act (who were the trustees of the testator's will) were authorised to purchase the life interest of the late baronet which was thereby vested in the trustees. By s. 22 the annual income arising during his life was to be applied in the order and manner and for the purposes therein specified, which included a discretionary application of a maximum annual sum for the maintenance and support of the late baronet, his wife and issue. In 1907 the late baronet exercised his power of charging portions and charged the de Trafford estates with a capital sum of £90,000 for that purpose, but not to be raised or paid during his lifetime.

Sir Humphrey Edmund de Trafford (the late baronet's eldest son and the present baronet) attained his age of twenty-one years on Nov. 29, 1912; and shortly afterwards he disentailed and re-settled the estates. The re-settlement is dated May 8, 1914, and by it the present baronet assured the de Trafford estates to the trustees in fee simple to uses for raising further portions for the late baronet's younger children to the amount of £160,000 in addition to the £90,000 already charged, and subject thereto to the use of the present baronet for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. By cl. 8 of the re-settlement it was provided that notwithstanding anything in the Act of 1904 contained the annual income of the de Trafford Estates should during the life of the late baronet be held and applied by the trustees in making the payments therein mentioned which included the payment (during the joint lives of the late baronet and the present baronet) of an annual sum to the present baronet amounting to £8,000 as from his attaining the age of thirty-five years until he should attain the age of forty years. By cl. 18 of the re-settlement he was authorised by deed to charge the estates with the payment to himself of capital sums not exceeding £50,000 with a proviso that no sum appointed under that power should be payable or raisable during the life of the late baronet. By s. 3 of the de Trafford Estate Act, 1914, this re-settlement was ratified and all the limitations trusts powers and provisions thereof were declared valid and effectual.

The late baronet exercised his power of appointing portions to the full amount of the additional sum of £160,000, to be raised and paid after his death, with the result that the total amount charged for that purpose upon the estates and raisable after his death was a capital sum of £250,000.

The present baronet from time to time, between Nov. 5, 1917, and Mar. 5, 1918, borrowed moneys from the trustees amounting in all to £50,000, and on each occasion as part of the security for repayment thereof he, in exercise of the power conferred by the re-settlement of 1914 and the Act of 1914, charged a part of the estates with payment to the trustees of a sum equal to the loan, and appointed a term of years commencing from the death of the late baronet for securing the sum so charged.

Although the said sums of £50,000 and £250,000 were not raisable or payable out of the estates until after the death of the late baronet, circumstances arose which rendered it advisable in the interests of all concerned that these sums should be raised and paid out of the estates in advance, and a scheme for that purpose was prepared and approved by an Order of the Chancery Division, dated July 28, 1928, which gave liberty to the trustees to carry the scheme into effect. The scheme provided (amongst other things) for such surrender or release of the late baronet's life interest as was subsequently executed.

In pursuance of that order and scheme the trustees by a deed of surrender dated Aug. 15, 1928, surrendered and released investments and cash, or investments only, of the amount or value of £300,000 to be raised forthwith by the trustees (by appropriation or otherwise) out of capital money or investments representing capital money, to the intent that the said portion amounting to £250,000 and the said sum of £50,000 might be brought into immediate possession discharged from all trusts affecting the same during the life of the late baronet.

The £250,000 portions for younger children were accordingly raised and paid, by appropriation or otherwise, and the sum of £50,000 raisable under the re-settlement of 1914 and the Act of 1914 was provided by the appropriation thereto of the £50,000 owing by the present baronet to the estate in respect of the moneys to that amount already borrowed by him from the trustees. Not long afterwards the late baronet died, namely, on Jan. 10, 1929.

It is in regard to the estate duty payable in consequence of his death, that two disputed points have come before your Lordships' House for determination.

The first one is concerned with the annual sum of £8,000, of which the present baronet was in receipt and had been in receipt since he had attained the age of thirty-five years on Nov. 29, 1925. That annual sum, since it was only payable out of the annual income arising during his father's life, came to an end with his father's death: but on the happening of that event he became tenant for life in possession of the estates, and as such entitled, during his life, to the whole income arising therefrom subsequently to his father's death. In these circumstances it is argued by the appellants (who are the trustees and have accepted liability for the duty payable) that a notional portion of the estates (namely, so much as was required to produce £8,000 per annum) neither passed on the death of the late baronet within the meaning of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, nor should be deemed to be included in property so passing by reason of s. 2 of that Act. Alternatively it is contended that no benefit accrued or arose to the present baronet, by reason of the cesser of his right to receive the £8,000 a year.

These are contentions which in my opinion we are precluded by authority from adopting. I am unable to distinguish this case from Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). In that case two points arose for decision. The first related to a sum secured by a mortgage which had been created on the fee simple of the Mornington estates before the execution of a settlement of those estates upon trust that the third Earl Cowley should receive during the life of his father, the second earl, a sum of £3,000 a year, and subject to and charged as aforesaid for the second earl for life and after his death for the third earl for life with remainders over. The second point arose in regard to the annual sum of £3,000. On the death of the second earl the Crown sought to recover estate duty on the footing of the estates being valued as unincumbered by the mortgage. It was held by your Lordships' House that the case fell under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and not under s. 2 (1) (b) of that Act; and further, that the property which passed on the death of the second earl was only the property which was settled, namely, the equity of redemption and not the unincumbered fee. The third earl, however, claimed that no duty should be paid in respect of the annuity of £3,000 since no benefit had accrued to him by the cesser of the second earl's interest and he claimed to deduct the capitalised value thereof. It was decided that there was no foundation for such a claim. It was urged before us here that the second point in the Cowley Case (1) had only been aruged as a question of deduction from the value of the property which passed; but that the present contention was a question of reduction of the quantum of the property which passed on the death; and it was said that the reasoning which decided the first point in the Cowley Case (1), was applicable here, to establish that the quantum of the property which passed on the death, should be reduced by excluding the notional portion of the estates which I have indicated above. It was further said that the Cowley Case (1) was distinguishable on the facts.

For myself I see no distinction of substance on the facts; for the fact that the life estate had been divested from the tenant for life and vested in trustees during his life, can of itself cause no different answer to be given to the question what property passed on his death. The mortgage in the Cowley Case (1) was outside and anterior to the settlement, and independent of it. The annual sum of £8,000 in the present case was payable out of income arising under the settlement. The reasoning which decided the first point in the Cowley Case (1) cannot therefore apply. Nor can I see any justification for the exclusion of any portion of the estates from the property passing on the death. The present baronet's right to an annual sum of £8,000 gave him no right to the receipt of any particular items of the annual income, or to the income of any particular portion of the estates. His right to receive an annual sum of £8,000 ceased on the death of the late baronet; his right, which then arose, to receive all the rents was a new and a different right. There was never either in fact or in law anything resembling a surrender of the life estate to the immediate remainderman, as was the case in A.-G. v. Beech (5). In my opinion it is impossible to distinguish this case from the Cowley Case (1). The property as a whole passed to the present baronet freed from the trust or liability to to pay the annual sum, which trust or liability automatically came to an end with the death of his father. The case falls within LORD WATSON's words ([1899] A.C. at p. 208).

> "The annuity . . . was regularly paid to the appellant during his father's lifetime, and ceased to be payable on his death. No part of it formed a charge upon the equitable estate to which the appellant has succeeded, under the deed of re-settlement, not in fee but in life-rent. In these circumstances I do not think it can, with any degree of plausibility, be maintained that the estate which passed to the appellant upon his father's death has been thereby diminished or affected."

The second point in dispute concerned the capital sums amounting to £300,000 which were paid off in advance some five or six months before the late baronet's death. They formed no part of the estates at the death; they had before the death been permanently taken out of the estates and paid away elsewhere. Nevertheless the Crown claims that the portions of the estates released to provide those sums must be deemed to have passed on the late baronet's death by virtue of s. 11 of the Finance Act, 1900. The appellants resist this claim on the ground that the facts of this case do not fit in with the provisions of that section. The section runs thus:

> "(1) In the case of every person dying after the thirty-first day of March nineteen hundred, property whether real or personal in which the deceased person or any other person had an estate or interest limited to cease on the death of the deceased shall, for the purpose of the Finance Act, 1894, and the Acts amending that Act, be deemed to pass on the death of the deceased, notwithstanding that that estate or interest has been surrendered, assured, divested, or otherwise disposed of, whether for value or not, to or for the benefit of any person entitled to an estate or interest in remainder or reversion in such property, unless that surrender, assurance, divesting, or disposition was bona fide made or effected twelve months before the death of the deceased, and bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property was assumed thereunder immediately upon the surrender, assurance, divesting, or disposition, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the person who had the estate or interest limited to cease as aforesaid, and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

By a later statute [the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, s. 59 (1)] the section was amended by substituting the period of three years for the period of twelve months.

It seems to me that the section in terms covers this case. So far as concerns the portions of the estates which were released to provide the portions and the £50,000 during the lifetime of the late baronet, they were property in which the trustees had an interest limited to cease on the death of the late baronet, and that interest was surrendered, assured, divested or otherwise disposed of to or for the benefit of the younger children and the present baronet, each of whom was a person entitled to an interest in reversion in such property, the interest being one which (but for the disposition for his or her benefit) would only have become an interest in possession after the late baronet's death. That property must accordingly be deemed to pass on his death, inasmuch as the disposition was not made or effected three years before his death.

In the result I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal was correct and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I agree.

LORD WRIGHT.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Magistrates—Husband and wife—Maintenance—No express provision in order as to income tax—Right or obligation of husband to deduct tax from sum ordered before paying wife—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 19 (1).

Income Tax—Deduction of tax—Maintenance order made by magistrate—No express provision as to tax—Whether tax deductible—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 19 (1).

A husband is obliged and entitled to deduct income-tax at the standard rate from payments made to his wife under a magistrates' court order which makes no mention of tax made pursuant to s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

Smith v. Smith (1), [1923] P. 191, applied.

Per LAWRENCE, J.: A magistrate may make a free of tax order (i.e., an order for payment of such a sum as after deduction of tax shall leave the sum ordered) provided that the total burden on the husband (i.e., the named sum plus the tax) does not exceed 40s. (now £5, see notes) a week.

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, rr. 19 (1), 21 (1) are now the Income Tax Act, 1952, ss. 169 (1), 170.

This case must now be read subject to ss. 205, 206 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Section 205 provides that maintenance orders made by a magistrates' court (under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925 (as amended by the Act of 1951); the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, ss. 5 and 7 (b) (as amended by the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, and the Guardianship and Maintenance of Infants Act, 1951) and the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, s. 1 (as amended by the Act of 1949); and the Affiliation Orders Act, 1952), are "small maintenance orders." The amending Acts referred to above increase the maximum amounts which a magistrates' court can order to £5 per week for a wife and 30s. per week for a child. Section 206 provides that small maintenance orders shall be made without deduction of tax, and that the amount of such orders shall be assessed and charged as income of the payee only.

The dictum of Lawrence, J., as to the magistrates' jurisdiction to make free of tax orders has been held to be the law, but the making of such orders has been repeatedly discouraged by the appellate courts (see, e.g., Wallis v. Wallis, [1941] 2 All E.R. 291; J. v. J., [1955] 2 All E.R. 617; and Jefferson v. Jefferson, [1956] 1 All E.R. 31).

The effect of ss. 205, 206 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, is that a free of tax small maintenance order obliges the husband to pay to the wife not only the sum named in the order but also the tax payable in respect thereof: Jefferson v. Jefferson (ante).

This case is still authority for the now settled rule that in the absence of express contrary provision orders for maintenance are to be construed as being orders for payments "less tax," not "free of tax."

Case Stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

A complaint was made by the wife—Mrs. Lilian Maud Clack, that the appellant, her former husband, David James Clack, had failed to pay her £24 19s. due under a maintenance order.

The following facts were proved or admitted on the hearing of the complaint:

On Feb. 2, 1932, an order was made by the magistrate of the Greenwich Police Court, under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895–1925, on the ground of desertion, directing the appellant to pay to the chief clerk of the court on behalf of the respondent the sum of 30s. a week and a further total sum of 15s. per week on behalf of the three children of the marriage; that is to say, 5s. per week on behalf of each child. The appellant paid the sums ordered for some time, but thereafter deducted income tax from the payments until June 13, 1934, by which date the sum deducted amounted to £24 19s.

The husband contended that there was no jurisdiction to make an order for the payment as maintenance under the above-mentioned Acts of sums free of income tax, that the order of Feb. 2, 1932, did not purport to direct that the payments should be made without deduction of income tax, and that the case was governed by the decision in Smith v. Smith (1).

The wife contended that the order of Feb. 2, 1932, specified the weekly sums which she was entitled to receive, and that the husband was not entitled to make any deduction therefrom for income tax.

The magistrate came to the conclusion that the order secured to the wife the payment in full of weekly sums amounting to 45s. and that the husband was not entitled to make any deduction therefrom in respect of income tax.

The husband appealed to the Divisional Court.

By the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5: "The Court of Summary Jurisdiction to which any application under this Act is made may make an order or orders containing all or any of the provisions following, namely: . . . (c) A provision that the husband shall pay to the applicant personally, or for her use, to any officer of the court or third person on her behalf, such weekly sum not exceeding two pounds as the court shall, having regard to the means both of the husband and wife, consider reasonable; . . ."

By the Income Tax Act, 1918, r. 19 (1) of the rules applicable to all schedules: "Where any yearly interest of money, annuity, or any other annual payment (. . . whether payable half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods), is payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax, no assessment shall be made upon the person entitled to such interest, annuity, or annual payment, but the whole of those profits or gains shall be assessed and charged with tax on the person liable to the interest, annuity, or annual payment, without distinguishing the same, and the person liable to make such payment, . . . shall be entitled, on making such payment, to deduct and retain thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax thereon at the rate or rates of tax in force during the period through which the said payment was accruing due. The person to whom such payment is made shall allow such deduction upon the receipt of the residue of the same, and the person making such deduction shall be acquitted and discharged of so much money as is represented by the deduction, as if that sum had been actually paid."

By r. 21 (1): "Upon payment of any interest of money, annuity, or other annual payment charged with tax under Sched. D . . . the person by or through whom any such payment is made shall deduct thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax thereon at the rate of tax in force at the time of the payment."

Acton Pile for the husband.

The wife in person.

AVORY, J.—This case has raised a troublesome question, but I have come to a definite conclusion that the order of the magistrate cannot be sustained. [His Lordship stated the facts of the case and the contentions of the parties before the magistrate, as set out above, and continued:]

Once the conclusion is reached that the sums claimed by the wife were in fact the aggregates of the sums deducted by way of income tax by the husband, it becomes necessary to consider the second clause of r. 19. [His Lordship read the clause and proceeded:] This rule has statutory force, and it is not disputed here that the husband had no option in the circumstances other than to make the deductions in his returns to the income tax authority. Further than that, r. 21 provides as follows. [His Lordship then read that rule.] There being, therefore, no option but to deduct those amounts, it appears to me to follow that it became the wife's duty to permit the deductions to be made, and that thereupon the husband became, in the words of the rule, acquitted and discharged of the amount of the deductions as if those amounts had been paid to the respondent.

In those circumstances I do not think it was competent for the magistrate to order the husband to pay sums of which he had already been acquitted and discharged. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

HAWKE, J.—I agree, though I confess that I should have been glad to find reasons for deciding otherwise, for I am satisfied in my own mind that those dealing with this limited form of maintenance never thought about income tax at all. But, for the reasons given by my Lord, I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

LAWRENCE, J.—I also agree. I only wish to add that it is impossible to construe the magistrate's order having regard to the decision in Smith v. Smith (1) as an order to pay 30s. a week free of income tax, or that such a sum should be paid as would bring to the wife a clear 30s. a week. I do not, however, agree with counsel for the husband's contention that the magistrate could not have made such an order, had he desired to do so, provided always that the total burden on the husband did not exceed 40s. a week.

Appeal allowed.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Duty to fence—Need to secure "actual safety"—Need of secure fencing, or safe position or construction of machine—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 22), s. 10 (1) (c).

By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 10 (1): "With respect to the fencing of machinery in a factory, the following provisions shall have effect: . . . (c) All dangerous parts of the machinery . . . must either be securely fenced, or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced."

A workman injured his hand when working a Rhodes double-action power press, which was so constructed that its dangerous parts could not be reached by his hand when in motion unless he operated the bi-manual control of the machine otherwise than with his hands. The bi-manual control was in proper working order at the time of the accident, and had for many years been accepted by the Home Office as complying with the requirements of the above subsection. At their suggestion an automatic fly-guard had for a time been adopted as an additional precaution, but it was subsequently discontinued as it was found by the workmen and their employers to be dangerous, and was admitted by the Home Office to be "not satisfactory." In getting his hand caught in the machinery as he did, the workman was disobeying his employers' instructions.

Held: (LAWRENCE, J., dissenting) on the above facts: "safe" in the above subsection means "actually safe," and actual safety must be secured by secure fencing, or by safe position, or by safe construction; and it was, therefore, not open to justices to hold that the machinery was of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it had been securely fenced, and to dismiss an information against the employers under the above subsection on that ground.

Notes.—Section 10 (1) (c) of the Act of 1901 is now Factories Act, 1937, s. 14. The construction of the Act favoured by the majority in this case would appear also to apply to the duties imposed by ss. 12 (fencing prime movers) and 13 (fencing transmission machinery) of the Act of 1937.

Case Stated by Middlesex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction held at Uxbridge an information was preferred by Robert John Sowter, one of His Majesty's inspectors of factories and workshops (the appellant prosecutor), under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901–1920, against the Steel Barrel Co., Ltd. (the respondent employers), charging the employers that they, on April 11, 1934, at Phœnix Wharf, Uxbridge, were the occupiers of a certain factory within the meaning of the above Acts, and that on the above date such factory was not kept in conformity with the Acts in that certain machinery dangerous to persons employed or working there, to wit, the tools of a Rhodes double-action power press, were not securely fenced on the above date, as required by s. 10 (1) (c) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:

The employers were at all material times the occupiers of a factory at Phœnix Wharf, Uxbridge, Middlesex, within the meaning of the above Acts, and the machinery in question was dangerous machinery within the meaning of the Acts. The machinery was installed in 1910 and no accident had occurred in connection with its use until April 11, 1934.

The workman, one Edmund Charles Hartley, who was a left-handed man, met with an accident on that date while in the employ of the respondents at the factory and sustained an injury to his left hand. At the time of the accident, the workman was employed in working a Rhodes double-action power press.

There was on the machine a bi-manual control, and the proper way of operating the machine was by inserting the plate to be pressed into it by hand while it was at rest, and then pulling the safety handle down with the left hand and the operating lever up with the right hand. The operating lever could not be moved until the safety handle had been pulled down. If the machine was thus operated with both hands and the person operating it kept his hands on the levers, neither of his hands could get into it.

The Home Office had for many years accepted the bi-manual control as complying with s. 10 (1) (c) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, but subsequently had suggested the addition of an automatic fly-guard as an additional precaution. The respondents, while making no admission that they were not already complying with the provisions of s. 10 (1) (c) of the Act of 1901, adopted the suggestion.

In practice, the automatic fly-guard suggested by the Home Office was found by the respondents and their employees to be itself dangerous and was admitted by the Home Office to be "not satisfactory."

Immediately after the accident the machine was examined on behalf of the prosecutor, and it was found that the bi-manual control was in proper working order and that the machine itself was not in any way defective.

At the time of the accident the workman was putting a plate into the machine, but no satisfactory explanation was given as to how the accident occurred.

Since March, 1933, there had been an automatic fly-guard on the machine, but it was not in operation or in efficient working order at the time of the accident. If it had been in operation and in efficient working order it would have prevented the workman's hand being caught in the machine, although it might have caused other damage to his hand and, when in use, might have struck a careless workman who leant forward or got his head in the way of it. Some workmen preferred to operate the machine without the guard because of the anticipated danger of being struck by it.

It was unnecessary for the workman to put his hand into the machine when the machinery was in motion if he was operating the machine properly, and he was disobeying instructions in getting his hand caught as he did.

It was contended on behalf of the prosecutor that the employers were guilty of the offence charged, and that the machine was not securely fenced nor of such construction nor in such a position as to be equally safe to every person working in the factory as it would have been if it had been securely fenced.

It was contended on behalf of the employers that they were not guilty of the offence charged, and that by reason of the bi-manual control of the machine it was safer than it would have been if the fly-guard had been in operation and in efficient working order, and that the fly-guard presented additional dangers to the men working in the factory and itself required fencing.

The justices held, in so far as it was a question of fact for their decision, that the requirements of s. 10 (1) (c) had been complied with, in that the machinery in question was of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced. They accordingly dismissed the information.

The prosecutor appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Wilfrid Lewis for the prosecutor.
Lord Erleigh, K.C. and H. Salter Nichols for the employers.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. The following judgments were read:

LAWRENCE, J.—In this case I regret that I differ from the other members of the court.

This is an appeal from a decision of justices of the peace for Middlesex, who dismissed an information under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901–1920, on the ground that the machinery in question, which was alleged to be dangerous and not securely fenced, was of such construction as to be equally safe as it would be if it were securely fenced. The machinery in question which gave rise to an accident to a workman was a Rhodes double-action power press, which was so constructed that its dangerous parts could not be reached by the hand of the workman when in motion unless he operated the bi-manual control of the machine in some other way than with his hands. There appears to have been no direct evidence as to how the bi-manual control was operated at the time of the accident. The press had been in use for twenty-four years without accident, and the Home Office had for many years accepted the bi-manual control as complying with s. 10 (1) (c) of the Act of 1901. Thereafter they suggested a guard, which was used for a time, but was subsequently disused, being, in the opinion of the employers, dangerous, and, in the opinion of the Home Office, not satisfactory.

The question which the justices had, in my opinion, to decide, having held that parts of the press were dangerous, was whether the bi-manual control was a method of construction which made it as safe as if it were securely fenced. The answer to this question involved a finding of fact, and a view of the law as to the meaning of the words "securely fenced." That such is the question for justices is accepted in Atkinson v. London and North Eastern Rail. Co. (1). The justices here decided that the press was of such construction as to be equally safe as it would be if securely fenced. No authority was cited which lays down that the words "securely fenced" mean so fenced that an accident cannot happen, and such a construction would be inconsistent with dicta in Hindle v. Birtwistle (2). In my opinion, the words, upon their true interpretation, have not that meaning, but mean so fenced that careless persons will be reasonably safeguarded. Unless the words "securely fenced" mean so fenced that no person or thing can get past the fence, it must, in my view, be a question of fact in each case whether the machinery is securely fenced, or is of such construction as to be equally safe.

It was suggested that SALTER, J., had decided differently in Davies v. Thomas Owen & Co. (3), but in my opinion what the learned judge there decided was that a fence which had been found by the proper tribunal of fact not to be secure was not in compliance with the section merely because it was not commercially or mechanically possible to provide a more secure fence. The duty was absolute to provide a secure fence, regardless of commercial or mechanical possibility, and the jury had found that the fence was not secure, but if the jury had found upon evidence that the fence was secure, or that the machinery was of such construction as to be equally safe as if it were securely fenced, no court could have overruled them either because they though a more secure fence was commercially and mechanically possible or for any other reason, for the jury would ex hypothesi have found that the statutory obligation had been fulfilled.

Here the justices have found as a fact that the construction of the press was such as to be equally safe as it would be if it were securely fenced, and there were, in my opinion, facts upon which the justices could reasonably come to that decision, inter alia, the actual construction of the machine and the disused guard, which they saw, and the consideration that the machine had been safely in use for twenty-four years, and that the Home Office for many years regarded it as complying with the Acts.

It was also suggested in the course of the argument that there is a contradiction between the justices' findings that the machinery was dangerous and that it was of such construction as to be equally safe as it would be if securely fenced, but in my opinion s. 10 (1) (c) of the Act of 1901 itself contemplates that dangerous parts of machinery may be of such construction as to be equally safe as they would be if securely fenced, and on a fair reading of the case stated there is no contradiction between the above two findings. It may be that another tribunal of fact would have come to a different decision on the question whether the press was of such construction as to be equally safe, but in my opinion that does not entitle this court to overrule the justices.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—While I differ with regret from the opinion of LAWRENCE, J., I entertain no doubt that this appeal must be allowed, and that the case should go back to the justices with the direction that the offence which was charged was proved. It is not necessary to re-read the case. The statements which it contains show that the justices here coquetted with nearly all, though not quite all, the fallacies which this court for some years past has been endeavouring to destroy in such cases. It is not material that the workman who was injured was a left-handed man. He was, in fact, employed by the employers in their factory. Nor is it material that, if this admittedly dangerous and unfenced machine had been used in accordance with instructions, the accident might not have happened. One of the excellent reasons for this legislation relating to dangerous machinery is precisely the fact that, by reason of carelessness, indolence or haste, workmen sometimes omit to observe instructions. Where machinery is dangerous, they are to be saved even from themselves. Nor is it to the point that the machine had been in use for some time, nor that it was unnecessary for the workman to put his hand into it when the machinery was in motion. The scope of this legislation is not by any means limited to the prevention of accidents caused by necessary acts. The conclusion to which these justices came is the more strange because the case finds as a fact that since March, 1933—that is more than a year before the happening of this accident—there had been an automatic fly-guard on the machine, but it was not in operation or in efficient working order at the time of the accident, and, moreover, that if the automatic fly-guard had been in operation and in efficient working order it would have prevented the workman's hand from being caught in the machine. Much is said, or suggested, in the case about the difficulty of making this particular machine safe. But if in fact this machine could not possibly be made safe, the conclusion would be that it would have to be scrapped.

In the course of the argument before this court a new and ingenious fallacy was developed, and inaccurately said to be derived from the words of s. 10 (1) (c) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The relevant words are these:

> "All dangerous parts of the machinery . . . must either be securely fenced, or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced."

It is true—indeed, it is quite obvious—that the legislature is dealing with dangerous parts of machinery, but its object is not to leave them dangerous. On the contrary, its object is, under stringent penalties, to make them safe. And it is to be observed that the words are "securely fenced," not "somewhat securely fenced," and a little later the word employed is "safe," not "moderately safe." "Safe" means "actually safe," and this actual safety is to be procured (a) by secure fencing, or (b) by safe position, or (c) by safe construction. In this case the machine, at the time of the accident, was not safe at all. It is not suggested that the workman deliberately put his hand into the machine in order to hurt himself. On the contrary, his hand was accidentally caught in the machine in the course of his using it for the purpose of doing the very work which he was employed, by means of it, to do.

I must add that much time, trouble, and expense might be saved if those who adjudicate in cases about the fencing of machinery—often, as here, lay justices—and their advisers would read and consider with a little care the words of the section, and the leading decisions upon the matter, especially Hindle v. Birtwistle (2), Blenkinsop v. Ogden (4), Davies v. Thomas Owen & Co. (3), and Atkinson v. London and North Eastern Rail. Co. (1).

HAWKE, J.—I agree with LORD HEWART, C.J. I see no occasion to add anything to the observations which he has made, except this, that, in my opinion, having regard to the preceding findings of the justices, their alleged finding of fact, that the bi-manual control was in working order and that the machine itself was not in any way defective, is not a finding of fact at all, but a conclusion of law wrongly concluded.

Appeal allowed.

The donor from time to time stated that S. M. J. should have his house and furniture at his death. On the donor's death intestate his son and only child delivered the furniture and the title deeds of the house to S. M. J. At the son's subsequent death intestate S. M. J. and another were granted letters of administration of the son's estate.

Held: as there was a continuing intention of the donor up to the time of his death to give the property to S. M. J., and as S. M. J. had been appointed one of the administratrices of the son and so had got the legal estate of the property vested in her, she needed no assistance from equity to complete her title, and was entitled to retain the property beneficially.

Adjourned Summons.

James James died on Jan. 24, 1924, a widower and intestate, leaving his son John James, his only child, him surviving. The defendant, Sarah Maria James, was in the employment of James James as his housekeeper from 1909 until the date of his death, and she received no salary for her services. From time to time, however, James James stated that his house, Green Vale, and the furniture therein, should go to S. M. James at his death.

On the death of James James his son took away from Green Vale a few small articles, but he handed over all the rest of the furniture and also the title deeds of the house to S. M. James. She and her husband continued to reside rent free at Green Vale and were living there when the summons was taken out. The son died intestate and a bachelor on June 17, 1933, and letters of administration were granted to the plaintiff and S. M. James.

S. M. James claimed that she was entitled to Green Vale as beneficial owner. The plaintiff took out a summons asking whether her claim should be allowed.

Lightwood for the plaintiff.

A. L. Ungoed-Thomas for the defendant.

FARWELL, J.—I am completely satisfied on the evidence before me that there was a continuing intention in the donor up to the time of his death to give the property to the defendant.

At the time of his death the position was that the defendant was in possession both of the property and the title deeds as donee from the intestate; but the legal estate in the property was still in the donor. The case was argued on behalf of the defendant on the footing that the position was the same as in a case of an imperfect gift of personalty, and I do not, therefore, propose to consider whether possession of the title deeds and the property gave the defendant an equitable interest in the land which she could have successfully asserted. I will deal with it as if it were an imperfect gift of personalty. It is now well settled that in such a case equity will not aid the donee, but on the other hand, if the donee gets the legal title to the property vested in him, he no longer wants the assistance of equity and is entitled to rely on his legal title as against the donor or persons claiming through him: see Strong v. Bird (1). In my judgment, those principles apply here. The defendant, by her appointment as one of the administratrices, has got the legal estate vested in her, and she requires no assistance from equity to complete her title In these circumstances she cannot be compelled at the suit of persons claiming through the donor to surrender her property. It follows that in my judgment the plaintiff here must recognise the title of the defendant to the property and no steps should be taken to recover it from her.

[Court of Appeal (Greer, Slesser, and Scott, L.JJ.), November 12, 13, 14, 1935]

Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Landlord's right to enter demised premises to execute repairs at other parts of building—Self-contained flue—Damage—Extent of landlord's liability.

A lease demised a lock-up shop "being part of the ground floor of [a building] together with the basement under the shop and the drains and watercourses thereunder." By cl. 2 (5) of the lease the tenant permitted the landlord to enter the demised premises for, inter alia, "executing repairs and alterations at or upon the other parts of (the building) . . . making good all damage thereby occasioned." The landlord entered and cleaned a flue, which was a self-contained pipe having no connections at all with the demised premises except certain facilities for cleaning it there. In cleaning the flue the landlord, without any negligence on his part, caused soot to escape and so damaged some of the tenants' stock-in-trade, and did not make good this damage.

Held: the tenant's claim for damages must succeed because (i) the flue was neither part of the demised premises nor was it an easement of necessity, and so was an "other part" of the building (dictum of Stirling, L.J. in Union Lighterage Co., Ltd. v. London Graving Dock Co., Ltd. (1), [1902] 2 Ch. 557, applied by Slesser, L.J.); (ii) cleaning the flue was "repairs" (dictum of Lord Blackburn in Inglis v. Buttery (2) (1878), 3 App. Cas. 552, applied by Slesser, L.J.); (iii) "damage" in cl. 2 (5) was not limited to damage to the structure, but included all damage occasioned by the repairs (Crofts v. Haldane (3) (1867), L.R. 2 Q.B. 194, distinguished by Slesser, L.J.).

Per Scott, L.J.: Where the dispute depends on the construction of a written document, it is very dangerous, usually useless, almost always undesirable, to cite a lot of cases decided on other documents.

Appeal from an order of du Parcq, J.

The plaintiff landlord's claim was for £275, being one half-year's rent due under a lease made between the landlord and the defendant tenant, dated March 25, 1933, of a lock-up shop, being part of the ground floor of the messuage known as 25, Hanover-square, in the County of London, together with the basement under the demised shop.

The tenant, who was a court dressmaker, counterclaimed for damages caused to her stock by soot which escaped from the flues which were being cleaned by the landlord.

Du Parcq, J., held that the landlord was entitled by c. 2 (5) to enter upon the demised premises for the purpose of executing repairs, that this included the cleaning of the flues, and that the landlord could not be called upon to pay for the damage caused to the tenant's stock without negligence.

The tenant appealed.

C. Gallop and Sir John Cameron, for the tenant.

C. P. Harvey, for the landlord.

GREER, L.J.—This case has taken a long time to try, and counsel for the landlord has said all that could be said in support of the judgment of the learned judge, and a great many other things as well. He has, I have no doubt, commended himself to his clients as an advocate of courage, in the face of resistance by the Bench, but we have to judge this case on the evidence and on the true construction of the clauses in the lease, and the only doubt I have had, from beginning to end in this case, is as to whether the cleaning of the flue is a matter which could be regarded as repair of the flue.

The tenant, in the first instance, puts her counterclaim as based upon cl. 2 (5) of the lease. That contains permission to the lessor to enter upon the premises for the purpose of doing various things, including the executing of repairs and alterations to or upon the other parts of the said premises, that is to say, the parts that are not included in the lease to the tenant. It was necessary for the landlord to have an opportunity of going on to the demised premises, not merely for the purpose of viewing the state of repair of the demised premises, but for the purpose of doing repairs and alterations upon other parts of the messuage that were not included in the lease, and I cannot imagine a better illustration of the other parts of the messuage not included in the lease than the flues, which were not of any benefit whatever to the tenant, but which had to be kept in condition by the landlord, in order to benefit his other tenants in the other parts of the building, and I am satisfied that as between these parties the flues were not part of the demise from the lessor to the lessee, but were other parts of the said messuage, and he took the liberty to come upon the demised premises in order to put them in repair.

I have had some hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the word "repairs" is wide enough to include cleaning of the flues, but, on consideration, I have come to the conclusion that, as between these parties, in this lease, the word "repairs" does cover the kind of maintenance of the condition of the flue in which it ought to be, in order to carry out the purposes for which it was put into the premises, namely, to provide heat to the upper parts of the building, which were let out as flats, and, if that be so, then the permission to go on the premises to do that work was subject to the other terms of cl. 2 (5), namely, that when he did that, the landlord undertook he would make good all damage thereby occasioned.

An argument has been presented to us that the damage, referred to in that clause, is limited to damage to the structure. To my mind that is an argument that carries no weight, when we consider what it was that was being let and the purpose for which it was being let. There is an undertaking by the tenant to use the said premises for the business of dressmaking and millinery, or for such purpose or purposes as may be authorised from time to time by the previous consent of the landlord, and I cannot imagine, when we consider the effect of cl. 2 (5), that it has anything whatever to do with the damage occasioned to the tenant in the carrying on of the business of dressmaking and millinery. I think it was intended by this clause that if the landlord took advantage of the permission, granted to him by cl. 2 (5), he should be responsible for all the damage thereby occasioned, and that that would include damage to the stock-in-trade of the tenant who was carrying on this business. If damage was so caused, then it was damage which the landlord has undertaken to make good, and, if he could not make it good by restoring the frocks to the condition in which they were before the operations began, he must pay for having failed to do that which he had undertaken to do, namely, "make good all damage thereby occasioned."

Counsel for the landlord argued that we ought not to hold that in this case there was any "damage thereby occasioned," because, he says, the tenant might have prevented the damage by moving her goods from the position in which they were to some other parts of the premises.

Now I agree that she was under an obligation to take all reasonable steps to see that damage would not be occasioned by the operations of the landlord, but it is a question of fact, still to be determined, whether by removing her frocks as she did from the showroom to the office, she did all that could be reasonably expected of her, under the circumstances. I think the learned judge came to a wrong conclusion as to the construction of this clause, being persuaded by counsel for the landlord to take the view that it referred only to structural damage to the leased premises. I disagree with that view. I think it is wide enough to cover damage to the stock-in-trade that was on the premises. What the quantum is remains to be determined, and, in deciding that quantum of damage, the referee will have to take into account the question as to whether or not the tenant could be reasonably expected, and at reasonable expense which she would have been entitled to recover, to have prevented the damage which, in fact, did occur.

Reading the evidence, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that, though there was a removal into the office on the two occasions with which the action has to deal still, the damage, in fact, occurred. It will be for the referee to say whether or not the damage could not have been further diminished by some reasonable act on the part of the tenant, and I do not suppose too much importance would be attached to the casual observation made in the course of her evidence, that it was not her business to remove the frocks to the upstairs room, which was a very inconvenient place to have them, and that, she would have incurred even if she had done so some expense. Whether it could, under the circumstances, be reasonably expected that she should do so will be a matter which the tribunal estimating the damages will have to take into account.

For these reasons I think that the learned judge's judgment was wrong, and that the appeal ought to be allowed, that an order for reference as to the amount of damages should be made to a referee to be agreed by the parties, or in default of agreement, to the official referee, and that the costs of the appeal and the costs of the reference should depend on the result of the reference. It may be that the landlord will be well advised to pay some money into court, or to make some offer to the tenant. That might have some result upon the costs of the litigation, but the costs of the inquiry before the referee will be costs with which we do not deal, but which he will have power to deal with when he has heard the whole of the case with regard to damages.

For the reasons I have given this appeal should be allowed with costs, and the order of the judge should be modified by ordering the reference as to damages to a referee to be agreed or, in default of agreement, to the official referee.

SLESSER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Although this case at different times has been put on behalf of the tenant in different ways, by the time that the case fell to us for determination it was limited to really one matter, namely, whether the tenant can show that she is entitled to damages, by reason of cl. 2 (5) of her lease.

That clause reads as follows:

> "And will permit the lessor, or his surveyor, or agent and workmen at any time during the said term to enter the said premises or any part thereof during reasonable hours in the daytime to take schedules or inventories of the fixtures and things to be yielded up at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term as aforesaid, and for executing the repairs and alterations at or upon the other parts of the said messuage and sewers drains watercourses gaspipes meters electric wires and meters thereof or thereunder and effecting any alterations and repairs that may be necessary in or to the drains under the demised premises making good all damage thereby occasioned, provided that the lessor shall not thereby cause more interference with the lessee's business than is reasonably avoidable."

Now, in order that the tenant counterclaiming may bring herself within these words, it is necessary for her to show that the landlord or his agent has entered executing the repairs and alterations of, or upon, the other parts of the said messuage, and, therefore, the first question which arises in this case is, whether this flue, the cleaning of which has caused, or is alleged to have caused, the damage in this case, was, or was not, another part of the said messuage? If the flue was itself part of the premises demised to the defendant, then, of course, this part of cl. 2 (5) would not apply.

In my opinion, it is clear when the parcels and the intentions, as gathered from the lease, are considered, this flue was no part of the demised premises. The parcels are a lock-up shop,

> "being part of the ground floor of the messuage known as 25, Hanover-square, in the County of London, together with the basement under the said demised shop and the drains and watercourses thereunder."

There is, in terms, no demise of this flue, which is a self-contained pipe, having no connections at all with the tenant's premises, except certain facilities for the cleaning of it upon those premises, and which in no way serves the comfort or convenience of the tenant or the purposes of her business.

Now counsel for the landlord, in an elaborate and careful argument, met with that difficulty, and, being constrained to admit that the flue was a flue which was used by the other tenants and was being used at the time when this demise was made, attempted to show that this flue passing through or near these premises was itself a part of the demised premises, but that there was an easement whereby the tenant had agreed that the fumes and products of combustion passing through this flue should pass through her premises by way of easement.

Now it is clear there is no express easement so reserved. There is mention of the reservations of other easements in this lease. There is no reference to a flue. It would be necessary, therefore, for him, on any view in my opinion, to show that this was an easement of necessity.

I do not propose to discuss the old case in the reign of James I which was cited to us—Nicholas v. Chamberlain (4). Differing views have been taken of the effect of the judgment in that case in a more recent authority—Wheeldon v. Burrows (5), by Thesiger, L.J., on the one hand, taking it that the right to the supply of water there was by way of easement; and by James, L.J., on the other, who took the view (12 Ch.D. at p. 60) that in Nicholas v. Chamberlain (4):

> ". . . The court seems to have really proceeded on the ground that it was not an incorporeal easement, but that the whole of the conduit through which the water ran was a corporeal part of the house, just as in any old city there are cellars projecting under other houses. They thought it was not merely the right to the passage of water, but that the conduit itself passed as part of the house, just like a flue passing through another man's house."

No one case in these matters is any conclusive authority or ever can be. It must depend upon the express language and the purpose of the particular demises, but it is interesting to observe that James, L.J., in coming to the conclusion that in Chamberlain's Case (4) the conduit through which the water ran was not an easement but a corporeal part of the house, drew the analogy of a flue passing through another man's house.

I think it is impossible to say here that this is an easement of necessity. As was said by Stirling, L.J., in Union Lighterage Co., Ltd. v. London Graving Dock Co., Ltd. (1), an easement of necessity is not one which is a mere convenience, it is one without which the property retained on a severance cannot be used at all. I think it is impossible to say that this flue was in such a condition. The need for it might well have been supplied by electric heating, gas heating, or in any other way. I think it was no more, at the highest, than what Stirling, L.J., said, an easement of necessity is not, "one merely necessary to the reasonable enjoyment" of the property; and if it is not an easement, it follows, to my mind, apart from the actual language of the demise, that it was not part of the property demised.

The third view (which I think counsel for the landlord would hesitate to accept) is that it was the property of the tenant; that she had full disposition over it, and that it being part of her premises, and there being no easement, she could at any moment have closed up this flue and have refused to allow any soot or other matter to pass through it. That is a view, which needs only to be stated to be rejected, it being clearly contrary to the intention of the parties.

I agree with the views that have been expressed by Greer, L.J., with regard to the second matter which arises, that this being another part of the said messuage, this cleaning of the flue for executing repairs and alterations fell within cl. 2 (5) on the facts of this case; that is to say, that the making more efficient of this flue, by the removal of soot or any other matter which impeded its proper function, does seem to me, properly in the context and intentions of this document, to be covered by the words "execute the repairs and alterations." I take those two words together, "To repair," as meaning in the language of Lord Blackburn, in Inglis v. Buttery & Co. (2) "make good defects, including renewal where that is necessary." I think it may properly be said that an apparatus is repaired when an obstruction which is a defect to the proper working of the apparatus is taken out, even though, in any particular case, it may be that renewal does not prove to be necessary.

That was the view of the learned judge against whose decision this appeal is brought, in Bishop v. Consolidated London Properties, Ltd. (6). There a young dead pigeon had got into a pipe and caused an obstruction and an overflow of water. On the question of reparation du Parcq, J. (148 L.T. at p. 410), says this:

> "I have come to the conclusion that a pipe which is choked and not able to do its duty as a pipe is out of repair."

That seems to me to be a perfectly proper conclusion.

In another case, Melles & Co. v. Holme (7) the obligation was to keep in good and tenantable repair, but it was dealt with on the principle of the cases dealing with repair—where a stoppage was due to ashes, which had been discharged from chimneys and fallen upon the roof, and refuse had flowed into a gutter. Salter, J., said, in the Divisional Court,

> "In some case no doubt there must be read into a covenant by a landlord to repair a condition that the tenant must give him notice of the want of repair" and treated the obligation to remove that obstruction as a reparation. That, it seems to me, is sufficient to determine that matter.

There follows only the question whether here it can properly be said that there having been repairs necessary or conceived to be necessary on other parts of this messuage, there is an obligation to make good all damage thereby occasioned, meaning thereby, not only make good damage to the actual matters repaired, but damage generally done to the tenant.

I do not find it necessary on that head to repeat what my Lord has said. It appears to me quite clear that these words are words of complete generality; that there is no reason to restrict them in the way in which counsel for the landlord has endeavoured to persuade us to restrict them, and it will also be observed that in the case which he cited to us, Crofts v. Haldane (3) the language was "make good all damage occasioned thereby to the adjoining premises"—it was limited in that way. I can find no such words of limitation in the present obligation to repair; if it be found in the reference that damage has been occasioned by the execution of repairs and alterations upon other parts of the said messuage, as contemplated in cl. 2 (5), then, applying the ordinary principles, which will include the question of the obligation of the tenant to minimise her damage and to act reasonably, having regard to all the ordinary considerations which arise, the exact extent of damage which has been occasioned to the tenant will be a matter for estimation by the referee.

SCOTT, L.J.—I agree, and I particularly desire to adopt the language of Greer, L.J., which covers the whole interpretation of the lease. I wish to add two or three observations. Where, as in this case, the dispute depends on the construction of a written document, it is very dangerous, usually useless, almost always undesirable, to cite a lot of cases decided on other documents. A great many cases referred to in the learned judge's judgment and a great many cases cited in court here would seem to me to throw no light at all on the interpretation of this document.

The second observation I desire to make is this. Unless a word in a document is quite clearly a word of art, having a definite legal meaning, it should be given its natural meaning in the English language. The word repair is an ordinary English word, having a pretty wide natural meaning. It should not be limited, as it was sought to be limited in the argument in this case, to such dealing with a piece of plant or machinery or structure as involves a renewal of any part. That is not the essence. That is one form of repair. But where you are dealing with working plant or machinery, if it is not in good working order, whatever the operation may be of putting it in good working order, it would properly be called a work of repair. If your motor car is not going well and it is sent to the works to be repaired, you would normally regard it as repair work, even if you were told that all that had to be done was to decarbonise the cylinders. People use ordinary words in rather a wide sense. Unless the word "repair" here was so used in this particular sub-clause of cl. 2 of this document, there was no provision at all for the ordinary and inevitable work, which the landlord would have to do, as lessee under his headlease, in order to keep in good working condition a piece of plant essential to the working of the hot water apparatus of all the flats in the other parts of the building. I think that the natural interpretation of the word is that which has been put upon it by Greer, L.J., and Slesser, L.J.

The only other point to which I desire to refer is this. The learned judge decided that the flue was no part of the demised premises. I agree. We are rather taking the same view that he took. I think that the simple ground on which we should decide that that is the true interpretation of the lease, is that it is not mentioned in any way at all in the parcels. Where, in a composite building containing a large number of tenements, some parts of the building are necessarily retained in the possession of the landlord, of the whole, and there is a particular demise of a particular tenement carved out of the whole, with a description of what is let, there is no ground at all for including in the demise any part of the building which may happen physically to pass through or be in the middle of the demised tenement, if it is of a nature to call for the retention of possession by the landlord.

On the second point as to the meaning of the word "repair" in the covenant, the learned judge took the same view as we are taking here. We are affirming him on that. The only part of the covenant where he differed from us was in the meaning of the words "making good all damage thereby occasioned." I put to counsel for the landlord, in the course of the argument, the question whether, if the proviso forbidding unnecessary interference with the lessee's business had been written at the beginning of the clause and the two purposes for which the right of entry was granted by the lessee as part of the clause were treated as subsidiary, the words "making good all damage thereby occasioned" would not necessarily apply to the whole clause and would then, almost obviously, mean "make good all damage caused to the lessee" on the occasion of the exercise of the right of entry, or incidental to it. That, in my view, is the right interpretation of the clause as a whole.

For these reasons I agree with the judgment that is proposed by Greer, L.J.

Appeal allowed.

Gaming—Betting-house—Newspaper office—Puzzle picture competition in newspaper—Payments by competitors—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict., c. 119), s. 1.

The proprietors of a newspaper published therein particulars of a competition in which the competitors were required to state what places in the United Kingdom were represented by nine pictures published in the newspaper. More than one place might be suggested by a picture, but each picture was so designed that one name was more fitted to it than any other. Every attempt was individually scrutinised by a board of adjudicators presided over by the editor of the newspaper, who, it was stated, would present a prize of £50 to the winner or winners. Competitors had to pay 1½d. for each attempt or 6d. for five attempts.

Held: (i) the manner in which the competition was managed and the attempts at solution were investigated was immaterial, the question being whether success in the competition involved the exercise of skill; the competition was one in which success depended to a substantial degree on the exercise of skill; and, therefore, it was not unlawful under the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, s. 26 (1) (b).

Coles v. Odhams Press, Ltd. (1), printed p. 598, post, distinguished.

(ii) the competition was not a "game" within s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and, therefore, the proprietors of the newspaper would not be guilty under that section of keeping a betting house.

Action for injunctions.

The defendant company, incorporated in 1923 for the purpose of carrying on business as proprietors and publishers of newspapers, journals, magazines, etc., were the publishers and printers of a weekly newspaper called The Winner. On Nov. 18, 1935, they published therein particulars of a competition under the heading "Great new picture puzzle contest, £50 cash must be won," followed by these particulars: "Below are printed nine pictures representing the names of places in the United Kingdom (either as spelt or pronounced). There may be more than one place suggested by a picture, but upon examination of all the details in the picture you will find one name more fitting than others. You are invited to state what are the most fitting answers to the pictures. All you have to do is to study each picture carefully and determine what place in your knowledge most aptly fits the picture. There are no sealed solutions to guess. The more skilful and thoughtful you are the more likely you will be to gain the prize. Every attempt will be individually scrutinised by a board of adjudicators presided over by the editor of The Winner, who will present a prize of £50 in cash for the most meritorious attempt submitted."

By the rules it appeared that there was no official solution to the puzzle, and that each and every attempt would be individually scrutinised. In the event of equally meritorious attempts being submitted by more than one entrant the prize would be equally divided. Payment was to be made at the rate of 1½d. for each attempt, or of 6d. for five attempts. The form provided for five such attempts. Of these, the first three were diagrams incorporating some of the letters of the words London, Belfast, and Cardiff respectively, and the word "London" was printed as the solution of the first picture. The other pictures were sketches with no immediately obvious meaning. In the margin there was given "a list of places to help competitors," intimating that probably better ones might be found.

The plaintiff was a director of the defendant company, and, being in doubt whether the competition was illegal under the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, in which event he might become liable under s. 29 to penalties if the company were prosecuted and convicted under the Act, he brought this action claiming injunctions to restrain them from conducting in The Winner any picture puzzle contest or other competition in which prizes were offered for forecasts of the result of a future event, or in which success did not depend to a substantial degree upon the exercise of skill, contrary to the provisions of ss. 22 and 26 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and from keeping or using offices for the receipt of money as consideration for any promise to pay money in any event or contingency relating to any game or exercise contrary to the provisions of s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853.

The editor, Mr. C. B. Randall, in his affidavit, admitted the truth of the facts stated by the plaintiff, and said that he had instructed an artist to draw the pictures which appeared in The Winner suggesting in some cases two or more different places to each picture, but always in such a way that the place, the name of which he had communicated to the artist, appeared to be the most fitting answer in the sense that it took the most comprehensive account of the material contents of the picture. One of the pictures suggested six possible solutions, but one only in the editor's opinion was most appropriate. It was his intention to continue to publish the competition in this form, being advised that it did not offend against either s. 22 or s. 26 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and was not a game or exercise within s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853.

The Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, provides:

> s. 26: "(1) It shall be unlawful to conduct in or through a newspaper, or in connection with any trade or business or the sale of any article to the public—(a) any competition in which prizes are offered for forecasts either of the result of a future event, or of a past event the result of which is not yet ascertained or not yet generally known; (b) any other competition success in which does not depend to a substantial degree upon the exercise of skill."

The Betting Act, 1853, provides:

> s. 1: "No house, &c., shall be opened, kept, or used . . . for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by . . . the owner . . . for the consideration for any assurance . . . to pay . . . any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise. . . ."

EVE, J.—This is a case in which I should be very sorry to set up my own opinion against the opinion of a tribunal so much more used to dealing with these questions of betting and matters of that sort than this court, but at the same time, having arrived at a conclusion, I think it my duty to state it.

The nature of the competition appears from studying the notice in the paper, the way in which the competition is conducted, and the way in which the result is arrived at, which must be taken as accurately described in the plaintiff's affidavit. As a result of these documents and of the arguments which have been addressed to me, I cannot help thinking that counsel for the plaintiff is right when he says that it is an attempt to introduce matter into the competition to evade the mischief to which the competition might be subjected if it was treated as coming within the judgment in Coles v. Odhams Press, Ltd. (1).

Speaking for myself, I do not appreciate to the full the answer which counsel has made to the suggestion that the present case stands on a different footing from Coles v. Odhams Press, Ltd. (1) by reason of the fact that skill is imported into it. The way I approach the subject is this. I ask myself whether this is a competition success in which depends on the exercise of skill. The words are few, but very often a few words are pregnant with suggestion of what the interpretation of them is. The framer of this scheme must, I think, have had in mind the necessity for its being a scheme which was consistent with the judgment to which reference has been made, and he was, no doubt, as fully aware as counsel for the plaintiff of the difficulties with which the promoters were faced in Coles v. Odhams Press, Ltd. (1).

Here I am limiting myself to the question whether, if this competition were put forward as a competition initiated and conducted as has been detailed, the court would not put to itself the question, and the only question which is material: Is this a competition which involves the exercise of skill on the part of those who attempt to solve it? In my view, it is. I think the solution of these pictures would require a great deal of skill to be exercised by the person solving them. No doubt, there is a class of person who gets so used to solving such problems that they do not present the same difficulty to him as they do to an ordinary mortal, but, speaking for myself—and I have some puzzles even in my daily work here—I should find it a very difficult thing to say what is the solution of one of these puzzles.

In my opinion, the question is whether the competition involves skill, and it seems to me that the manner in which it is managed and the way in which the attempts at solution are investigated are of no particular application here. All I have to do is to see whether it comes within the section of the enactment which says that it shall be unlawful to conduct in or through any newspaper any competition success in which does not depend to a substantial degree on the exercise of skill. Here, I think, the solution does depend on the exercise of considerable skill, and in those circumstances I do not feel justified in saying that it is within the mischief of s. 26 (1) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934.

I have already said that, in my opinion, it is not a game within s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and it is a competition. Throughout, there has been a distinction made between game and competition, and I should, therefore, not be prepared to hold the word "game" as covering such a competition as this, in the absence of any authority to that effect. The motion will be dismissed.

Insurance (Marine)—Freight—Loss—Recovery under freight policy—No constructive loss of ship.

The plaintiffs, owners of the Greek steamship Yero Carras, sued on a policy underwritten by the defendants for £4,000, part of £9,000 upon freight and (or) chartered freight and (or) anticipated freight. On Nov. 13, 1930, the ship stranded while proceeding from Monte Video to Valparaiso through the Straits of Magellan. She was eventually refloated and brought by salvors to Megallanes. On Nov. 17, 1930, the vessel was abandoned to the hull underwriters. On June 17, 1931, while she still lay at Megallanes, the hull underwriters compromised for a total loss by paying 100 per cent. and a proportion of sue and labour charges, the owners retaining the vessel, but remaining liable to the salvors. Later, the ship was surrendered to the salvors in discharge of their claim, was by them sold, and was repaired in 1932. At the time of the stranding the ship was proceeding to Valparaiso to load under a charterparty dated Sept. 16, 1930, between the agents for the plaintiffs and charterers, the cancelling date specified being Nov. 20, 1930. The charterparty contained the usual exceptions, including perils of the seas. The policy on freight was against the usual marine risks and was subject to the Institute of Freight (Voyage) Clauses, of which cl. 4 provided: " In the event of the total loss, whether absolute or constructive, of the vessel, the amount underwritten by this policy shall be paid in full, whether the vessel be fully or only partly loaded or in ballast, chartered or unchartered." By cl. 5: " In ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss the insured value in the policies on ship shall be taken as the repaired value and nothing in respect of the damaged or break-up value of the vessel or wreck shall be taken into account." By cl. 7: " Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise." The insured value of the ship under the hull policies was £30,000. The damage suffered by the ship was such that she could not be tendered to the charterers by the cancelling date, so that the adventure was frustrated by the casualty, and she could not be repaired except at a cost exceeding £13,000, her repaired value, though there was no evidence that she could not be repaired at a cost less than £30,000.

Held: the earning of freight under a charterparty of a specific vessel depended on the continued existence of that vessel as a cargo-carrying vessel and freight might be lost and the shipowner relieved as against the charterers if the vessel were so damaged as to be incapable of being repaired save at an expense exceeding her value when repaired; the freight policy did not provide, expressly or impliedly, that a total loss of freight should only be recoverable in the event of an actual or constructive loss of the ship under the hull policies; and, therefore, cl. 5 of the Institute Freight Clauses did not apply and the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed on their claim for a total loss of freight on the basis that the value of the ship for purpose of comparison with the cost of repairs was the actual value and no more.

Per LORD WRIGHT, M.R.: It is not true that there is a total loss on a freight policy by the constructive loss of the ship. A ship may be a constructive total loss and duly abandoned to the hull underwriters; if after that she earns the freight the shipowner has no claim for it, for, when earned, it belongs to the underwriters as then owners of the ship.

Appeal from an order of PORTER, J.

The facts are stated in the headnote and in the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The arguments which were put before the court on Oct. 25, 28, 29 and 30 sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Sir Robert Aske, K.C., and Willink, K.C., for the plaintiffs.
David Davies, K.C., and Charles Stevenson, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 15. The following judgments were read:

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—The appellants were plaintiffs in the court below; they sued as owners of the Greek steamship Yero Carras on a policy underwritten by the defendants for £4,000, part of £9,000 upon freight and (or) chartered freight and (or) anticipated freight. The appeal is from the judgment of PORTER, J., who dismissed the action.

The steamer, while proceeding from Monte Video to Valparaiso through the Straits of Magellan stranded on Nov. 13, 1930. She was eventually refloated and brought by salvors to Megallanes. On Nov. 17, 1930, the vessel was abandoned to the hull underwriters. On June 17, 1931, while she still lay at Megallanes, the hull underwriters compromised for a total loss by paying 100 per cent., and a proportion of sue and labour charges, the owners retaining the vessel, but remaining liable to the salvors. Eventually, the vessel was surrendered to the salvors in discharge of their claim and was by them sold A and was repaired in 1932. At the time of the casualty the steamer, as already stated, was proceeding to Valparaiso to load under a charterparty dated Sept. 16, 1930, between the agents for the plaintiffs and the Chilean Nitrate Producers' Association (Overseas), Ltd. as charterers. The cancelling date specified was Nov. 20, 1930. The charterparty contained the usual exceptions including perils of the seas. The policy on freight on which the action was brought was against the usual marine risks and was for £4,000, B part of £9,000 on freight and (or) chartered freight and (or) anticipated freight valued at £9,000 subject to reduction, after loading, to the actual freight at risk as per bills of lading less advances. The policy was subject to the Institute of Freight (Voyage) Clauses. Of these the following are particularly material in this case. Clause 4 reads as follows:

> "In the event of the total loss, whether absolute or constructive of the vessel, the C amount underwritten by this policy shall be paid in full, whether the vessel be fully or only partly loaded or in ballast, chartered or unchartered."

By cl. 5:

> "In ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss the insured value D in the policies on ship shall be taken as the repaired value and nothing in respect of the damaged or break-up value of the vessel or wreck shall be taken into account."

Clause 7 reads as follows:

> "Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise." E

Except in cls. 4 and 5 the words "constructive total loss" do not appear in the policy.

It was clear that the damage was such that in any case the steamer could not be tendered to the charterers by the cancelling date or at any time consistent with the commercial adventure, and, accordingly, it was not questioned that the particular adventure was frustrated by the casualty which, by reason of the inevitable delay consequent upon it, made it impossible to carry out the freight contract. It was, F however, conceded by the plaintiffs that to a claim formulated on the ground of that frustration, cl. 7 of the policy was a sufficient answer since the case was governed by the authority of Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (1). But the plaintiffs based their claim on the doctrine that the contract of affreightment was discharged between themselves and the charterers by perils of the sea, which had rendered the ship unnavigable, and had damaged her to such an extent that she could G not be repaired save at an expense exceeding her value (by which was meant her actual value of £13,000) when repaired; hence for purposes of the adventure she was lost to the owners, because it was impossible in a commercial sense to repair her. They relied on the well-known principles illustrated in Assicurazioni Generali and Schenker & Co. v. S.S. "Bessie Morris" Co., Ltd. and Browne (2) (hereinafter referred to as the "Bessie Morris" Case), and they went on to contend that by the dissolution of the freight H contract, on which depended the chartered freight within the meaning of the policy, there was a total loss of freight within the principles expounded in Moss v. Smith (3). It is true that no notice of abandonment on the freight policy was given, but it was contended that there was nothing to abandon. The ship had at the date of the casualty no cargo on board; she could not make her cancelling date or be tendered according to contract to the charterers at Valparaiso. No substituted employment was possible; I hence there existed all the conditions postulated in Rankin v. Potter (4) as rendering unnecessary in a case like the present a notice of abandonment on a freight policy.

In my judgment, there was here an actual total loss of freight. The freight was lost because the charterparty under which it was to be earned was destroyed by the perils of the seas. The judge, however, has decided against this claim on the ground that there cannot be a loss of freight (at least on the ground of the cost of repairing sea damage to the ship) unless there is either an actual or a constructive total loss of the ship in such a sense as to bring into operation the terms of cl. 5 of the policy with the consequence that there could not be in this case a constructive total loss of the ship save on the basis of a repaired value of £30,000, an actual loss of the ship not being in question.

It will be convenient to examine the legal position so far as relevant to this case apart from the specific effect of cl. 5 of the freight policy. I shall disregard the numerous and difficult questions which arise in regard to freight insurances in circumstances different from those here in question, as, for instance, where there is at the date of the casualty cargo on board which may be transhipped so that freight can be earned in whole or in part, or where a substituted cargo may be procured though the contract cargo is lost. These and other like problems are not relevant in this case. The earning of freight under a charterparty of a specific vessel depends on the continued existence of that vessel as a cargo-carrying vessel, at least in a case like the present where no cargo is on board and the vessel is on her way to the port where she should be tendered to the charterers. If, therefore, in such a case the ship is lost or destroyed, the performance of the charterparty and the earning of the freight is prevented, and, if that is due to perils of the seas, the shipowner is relieved from liability in damages to the charterers by the usual exception of perils of the seas in the charterparty. But apart from the loss or destruction of the vessel the freight may be lost and the shipowner may be relieved as against the charterers if the vessel is so damaged and disabled as to be incapable of being repaired save at an expense exceeding her value when repaired. Such a case is covered by the reasoning in the Bessie Morris Case (2) though it was held that in the facts of that case the ship could, and ought, to have been repaired, and hence the freight was not lost. LORD ESHER, in that case, said ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 657):

> "If it is possible in a business sense of the word to repair the ship, the shipowner is bound to repair her. If the cost of the repairs necessary to enable her to complete the voyage contracted for would be more than the benefit which the owner would derive from them, then it would be impossible in a business sense to repair her."

Similarly, BOWEN, L.J., said ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 659):

> "The ship went aground, but in order to show that she was prevented from performing the voyage agreed upon by the perils of the sea she must have become unnavigable for that voyage, either on the ground that it was impossible to get her afloat again, or that, on account of the extraordinary expenditure necessary for that purpose, it would be unreasonable to require the shipowners to incur it."

Then BOWEN, L.J., quotes from the judgment of MAULE, J., in Moss v. Smith (3) (9 C.B. at p. 103), and from the judgment of CRESSWELL, J., in the same case at p. 105 ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 660):

> "When is the shipowner said to be prevented by perils of the sea from fulfilling the contract he has entered into? When the ship is, by a peril of the sea, rendered incapable of performing the voyage. A ship is not rendered incapable of performing the voyage when she is merely damaged to an extent which renders some repairs necessary; if that were so, the most inconsiderable damage, such as the loss of her rudder, without which she could not proceed, would render her incapable of fulfilling the contract contained in the bill of lading. But if a ship sustains so much sea damage that she cannot be repaired so as to be rendered competent to continue the adventure, then the owner is prevented by a peril of the sea from fulfilling his contract. If the ship is totally destroyed or sunk, the performance of the contract is obviously prevented by a peril of the sea. The courts of law have also engrafted this qualification upon the contract—that, if the damage which results from a peril of the sea is so great that it cannot be repaired at all, or only at a cost so ruinously large that no prudent owner would undertake the repairs, the owner may treat the loss as total, and say that he is prevented by a peril of the sea from performing his contract."

Moss v. Smith (3) involved an application of these principles to a claim on a freight policy. It was contended there on behalf of the shipowner that there was such commercial prevention as to cause a total loss under a freight policy by insured perils if the sea damage could not be repaired save at a cost exceeding the value of the freight though less than the value of the ship; that contention was rejected, and the same conditions were held to be necessary to justify a claim on the freight policy as to relieve the shipowner under the charterparty. I need not repeat the passages I have just quoted from the judgment of MAULE, J., and CRESSWELL, J., as adopted by LORD ESHER, M.R., and BOWEN, L.J. The test is the same under the freight policy and under the charterparty, namely, whether the shipowner has been prevented, either in a physical sense or in a business sense, from performing the freight contract, so that the freight is lost.

In this way a question has to be solved analogous to that which arises when it is claimed on a hull policy on the ground of cost of repairs that there has been a constructive total loss of ship. But the three contracts—the charterparty, the freight insurance and the hull insurance—are completely different; as LORD CHELMSFORD said in Rankin v. Potter (4) (L.R. 6 H.L. at pp. 154, 155), dealing with the policies.

> "In the arguments the counsel for the appellant complicated the question by introducing the consideration of the conduct of the plaintiffs with reference to the policy on the ship, as bearing upon their rights under the policy on freight."

And he adds later, in view of the admission,

> "that the amount of damage was such that a prudent, uninsured owner would not have incurred the expense of repairing the ship. No prudent man would, in such a state of things, incur the expense of repairing the ship; and the shipowners electing not to repair were entitled to consider the charter at an end, and the chartered freight as totally lost by a peril of the sea."

PORTER, J., I think, treats these decisions as meaning that in order to constitute a claim for total loss on a freight policy the ship must be an actual or constructive total loss within the only proper meaning of that term, that is, in insurance law, and under the actual or notional hull policy. Reliance was placed on what was said by COLLINS, J., in the Bessie Morris Case (2) ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 580):

> "In other words, where the freight is said to be lost through damage to the ship, it must be shown that the ship itself to which the freight is an accessory was actually or constructively lost."

But these words are, I think, explained by what precedes them. COLLINS, J., had said ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 580):

> "It is clear from Moss v. Smith (3) and Philpot v. Swann (5) that unless the ship is either irreparable or repair practically impossible, the shipowner cannot show as against his underwriter that he was prevented from earning the freight through damage to the ship, and the standard of what is practically impossible is the same as that of a constructive total loss."

It was, it seems, with reference to these observations that in the Court of Appeal in the same case ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 658) LORD ESHER, said:

> "The only colour for it [for the argument addressed on behalf of the appellants] is to be found in the suggestion that the case is governed by the rules applicable to what is known as 'constructive loss.' But the doctrine of constructive loss can arise only between an underwriter and his assured. There is no underwriter concerned in the present case, and the doctrine of constructive loss has no application to it."

It is to be observed that in Moss v. Smith (3) the term "constructive total loss" does not appear in the judgments. The rule is similarly stated in De Cuadra v. Swan (6) without these words, "constructive total loss," occurring in the judgments, though they do occur in Philpot v. Swann (5) (11 C.B.N.S. at p. 282) as being a paraphrase of what MAULE, J., said in Moss v. Smith (3), but as, I think, merely a convenient mode (not strictly correct) of describing the position as between shipowner and charterer. In many cases it would not be necessary to distinguish between the two positions—that is, on the one hand, the position as between shipowner and charterer, upon which depends the claim under the freight policy, and, on the other hand, the position as between the shipowner and the hull underwriter on the policy on hull. Here it is important, because of cl. 5 of the Institute Freight Clauses, to be more precise. Can it then be truly said that the essential condition for recovery on the freight policy is the constructive total loss of the ship as that term would be used correctly under the hull policy? It is certainly not true that there is a total loss on a freight policy by the constructive total loss of the ship. A ship may be a constructive total loss and duly abandoned to the hull underwriters; if, after the property in her has passed to the hull underwriters under the abandonment, she earns the freight, the shipowner has no claim for loss of freight (apart from cl. 4 of the Institute Freight Clauses); the freight has not been lost at all, though the shipowner does not get it, but that is only because the freight belongs to the hull underwriters as owners of the ship when the freight, which is incident to the property in the ship, is earned. In such a case the freight assured cannot recover from the goods owners who are bound to pay the hull underwriters, nor from the freight underwriters, who are entitled to refuse to pay on their policy because the freight is not lost.

This was held by the House of Lords in Scottish Marine Insurance Co. v. Turner (7). Conversely, if the ship has been actually lost, but the cargo she was carrying at the time of the casualty has been recovered by the shipowners, there may be no loss of freight if it is (for instance) a lump sum freight and some of the cargo is delivered in specie. The same may be true in the case of a constructive total loss of ship if the cargo has been separated from the ship and has remained in the possession of the shipowners before the date at which the property passed to the abandonees of the ship. Again, in such a case as Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (8), the freight may be a constructive total loss though the damage to the ship is comparatively slight, for example, a broken shaft, provided only that the delay necessary to effect repairs is such as by frustration of the adventure to dissolve the freight contract and thereby cause a total loss of freight. This would be the case unless the freight policy contained an express clause such as cl. 7 of the Institute Freight Clauses.

It is not necessary to multiply illustrations of the fact that the freight policy and the hull policy are independent contracts in the absence of a provision in the freight policy whereby the former is governed by the latter. But it may be observed again that a constructive total loss of ship in a case such as the present is an actual total loss of freight; there is no spes recuperandi; the assured is irretrievably deprived of any possibility of earning the insured freight. What is insured under the freight policy is not a chattel like a ship or a cargo; it is, even in the case of chartered freight, as in the present case, which is the most definite type of insurable interest in freight, merely a chose in action, a right of earning freight under the charter, a fortiori where there is merely an expectancy of earning freight, though enough to constitute an insurable interest. Thus, apart from express terms in the freight policy, the freight underwriter has no concern in the hull policy; it is a separate and independent contract, probably with different underwriters; on the freight policy the assured may not even be the shipowner. Thus, for instance, chartered freight may be insured by a charterer by demise; the chartered owner may have no general interest in the ship, while the shipowner in such a case has no interest in that chartered freight, though he may have a separate insurable interest in the freight under the head charter. In any case the freight underwriter is not interested in the fate of the ship, except in so far as sea or other perils have so affected the ship as to cause a loss of freight. Whether this is so in fact is a matter which will be exactly the same whether the ship is insured or not; the determination of that question in an issue as between shipowner and charterer will settle whether the freight contract is destroyed by sea or other perils, so that the freight is lost. As between these parties, questions of insurance are irrelevant, as LORD ESHER, M.R., pointed out in the Bessie Morris Case (2) ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 658) in the passage last quoted above. But it follows logically that qua the ship they are, in the absence of special terms, equally irrelevant in this connection between the shipowner and the freight underwriter. Further, in the absence of special terms a different test will apply in reference to the freight contract in order to ascertain if the ship is too damaged to be capable of being repaired by the shipowner, the test which will determine whether the ship is a constructive total loss under the hull policy.

It is clear that the definition of a constructive total loss of ship in s. 60 (2) (i) of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, is only dealing with the position under the hull policy; it does not qualify the common law rules according to which it is to be decided if the ship is lost in a commercial sense as between shipowners and charterer as laid down in the Bessie Morris Case (2). These common law rules are not affected by the Marine Insurance Act, which, by s. 91 (2), says:

> "The rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance."

It may, indeed, be that the shipowner in this issue as between himself and the charterer may be entitled to bring in as part of the expense of repairing the ship a sum which represents what the wreck would be worth to him as a wreck if he does not repair. This was the common law rule as laid down by the House of Lords in Macbeth & Co., Ltd. v. Maritime Insurance Co., Ltd. (9), reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal in Angel v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Co., (10). Section 60 (2) (ii) of the Act gave effect to the more technical rules which the Court of Appeal had approved, and, therefore, superseded (as it was held in Hall v. Hayman (11)) for purposes of a constructive total loss claim on the ship the more elastic rules adopted in Macbeth's Case (9); but, as the section only applies to an insurance on hull, it would seem that the rules laid down by the House of Lords in Macbeth's Case (9) would still apply in a question between shipowner and charterer in which the test is still what course the prudent uninsured owner would adopt; as already explained, the question between freight underwriter and shipowner must follow the same lines in the absence of special terms as those between shipowner and charterer in the matter now in question. There is then a further objection to assimilating the claim for loss of freight to the claim for a constructive total loss of hull. It is well known that the Act did not deal expressly with the subject of freight insurance except in s. 16 (2), where it defined the insurable value of an interest in freight as the gross amount of the freight at the risk of the assured plus the charges of insurance, and in s. 70, where it gave the rules for adjusting a partial loss on freight. It may, indeed, be that part of the definition of actual total loss in s. 57 (1), that is, the words "where the assured is irretrievably deprived" of the subject-matter insured, may apply to an actual total loss of freight such as the present; similarly, the relevant words of s. 60 (1) may apply to a constructive total loss of freight in a case like Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (8), or a case where cargo is on board which might be transhipped. But I do not think that section can apply to a case like the present which, in my judgment, is an actual total loss of freight.

The reasoning by which the learned judge meets these contentions is, as I understand, that since he holds that the assured have to prove a constructive total loss of ship in order to recover, cl. 5 of the Institute Freight Clauses is brought into operation, with the result that the repaired value is deemed for purposes of the freight policy to be, not £13,000, the actual value, but £30,000, the insured value under the hull policy. Whether that is so must depend on whether cl. 5 applies. In substance, the learned judge treats the freight policy as if it provided expressly or by implication or by intendment of law that a total loss of freight should only be recoverable in the event of an actual or constructive total loss of ship under the hull policies. An express clause to this effect is not uncommon in freight policies. A policy on the chartered freight on the very voyage in question was produced, with the terms:

> "To pay only in the event of the total and (or) constructive and (or) arranged total loss of steamer."

I merely refer to this as an illustration of a common clause. But there is certainly no such clause in this policy. For reasons already explained, I do not think that apart from express terms the right to claim a total or constructive total loss under this policy can depend upon whether there is a constructive total loss under the hull policies. Certainly cl. 5 contains no such condition. Clause 5 by its terms can only apply when it is the constructive total loss of the ship that is an essential condition of recovery under the freight policy. The first part of cl. 4 deals with the case referred to above, where the shipowner, but for the clause, would lose his freight on the ground that it has been earned by the ship after it had been abandoned to underwriters, and the clause in such an event gives an added right of recovery of the full freight. Its effect was explained in this sense by HAMILTON, J., in Coker v. Bolton (12). But there is no other condition of the freight policy which postulates or refers to constructive total loss of the ship; the term is nowhere else than in cls. 4 and 5 used in the policy. Clause 5 gives no added right and imposes no new condition save when it is necessary to establish a constructive total loss of the ship. The clause, if more correctly expressed, would read: " Whenever it is necessary to prove the total loss, actual or constructive, of the ship," &c. But that can only apply where the contract of insurance requires the ascertainment of that fact as a condition of recovering. Clause 5 does not import any such condition. The answer made by the defendants' counsel to that proposition was that if it is decided that by the general law an actual or constructive total loss of the vessel in the technical insurance sense is not an essential condition to the recovery of a total loss under the freight policy, still in ordinary commercial parlance the state of irreparability of the ship which is discussed in the Bessie Morris Case (2) is spoken of as a constructive total loss because it is a total loss in a commercial, and not physical, sense. But I cannot accept that view of the position. I do not know if such ideas or language are common among business men, but in any case the two legal concepts appear to me, for reasons already explained, to be essentially different. I do not, indeed, think that cl. 5 is necessarily limited to a constructive total loss for purposes of cl. 4. I think it might apply to any term in the policy which refers, as cl. 4 does, to a constructive total loss of the ship under the hull policy. Such a policy must, if the clause is to apply, contain an insured value. The clause is, therefore, inapplicable to a notional constructive total loss of ship under a notional hull policy such as is illustrated by Roura and Forgas v. Townend (13). As cl. 4 can only become effective if applied to a case of abandonment of the ship to hull underwriters under a hull policy containing the insured value clause, the expression " constructive total loss " must there be used in its technical and correct sense. The defendants here seek to construe the same expression in cl. 5 as not only applicable, as it properly is, to such a case, but also as equally applicable to what, in my opinion, is the entirely different case, which is in question here, where the question is primarily as between the shipowner and the charterers, and only as a consequential issue between the shipowner and freight underwriters. But I do not think the same words can properly be construed as having so widely different meanings in the same clause.

In the result, I do not think that cl. 5 can be applied to the facts of this case, because I do not think the freight policy required that there should be a constructive total loss of the ship within the true meaning of that phrase in cl. 5 of the freight policy. But it might be a sufficient answer to the defendants' contention to say that the decision of the learned judge involves a serious limitation of the shipowner's right under the policy, though they lose the benefit of their freight contract vis-à-vis the charterers and hence the freight, because their ship is so damaged that she cannot be repaired (as I assume here to be the case) except at a cost exceeding her repaired value of £13,000, and they cannot, according to the judge's decision, recover on the freight policy because they cannot prove that the ship could not be repaired at a cost less than £30,000. I think much clearer words are necessary to achieve the consequence that the assured is to be so limited in his rights under the policy, and the basis of his right to recover for a total loss of freight is to be radically changed. On that ground alone I should, with all deference, feel bound to come to a conclusion different from that of the learned judge.

I think the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the court below should be set aside, and it should be declared that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed on the claim for a total loss of freight on the basis that the value of the ship for purposes of comparison with the cost of repairs is the actual value and no more. The judge has made no specific finding on that issue, but the facts that he has found seem to leave little doubt that the plaintiffs must succeed on that basis. If the defendants so desire, the case will be remitted to the judge for his finding on that basis for him to determine the precise amount recoverable. If the defendants do not so desire, judgment will be entered for the plaintiffs on the claim.

SLESSER, L.J.—I have read the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, with which I agree, and I have little to add thereto.

The critical question which arises in this case is whether the value of the ship should be taken to be £30,000, or a far less sum, namely, £13,000, it is said. The former is the value stated to be the insured value in the policy on ship, and the latter to be the actual value as found by the learned judge before the casualty. If the insured value of £30,000 be properly taken, the ship when repaired would be worth the sum which it is necessary to spend on her, and the failure to repair and consequent loss of freight would be practically possible, and there would be no case of total loss. If, on the other hand, the value of the ship is the less sum it may be, in the language of MAULE, J., in Moss v. Smith (3) (9 C.B. at p. 103), that the ship would have sustained and the freight would be lost by perils of the sea and so the freight insurers would be liable.

> "such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her, seeing that the question of the repairs would be such that no man of common sense will incur the outlay."

The ground upon which it could be said that the value of the ship was £30,000 can only be supported by invoking cl. 5 of the freight policy, which provides that:

> "In ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss the insured value in the policies on ship shall be taken as the repaired value, and nothing in respect of the damaged or break-up value of the vessel or wreck shall be taken into account."

The learned judge has come to the conclusion that it is necessary for the plaintiffs, in order that they may recover, to show that the ship is a constructive total loss, and he, therefore, comes to the conclusion that such a finding being necessary, cl. 5, which I have quoted, must apply when the test, whether the reparation is or is not commercially feasible is considered, and £30,000, the insured value in the policy on ship, be taken as the basis of that inquiry.

While it may be true to say, subject to qualifications which I mention hereafter, that the test in fact to be applied in the case of loss of freight may be substantially the same as that to be applied in ascertaining whether there is a total constructive loss of the ship, namely, that laid down in Moss v. Smith (3), and now in s. 60 (2) (ii) of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, to the effect that there is > "a constructive total loss in the case of damage to a ship where she is so damaged by a peril insured against that the cost of repairing the damage would exceed the value of the ship when repaired," yet it is not right to say, because the facts which have to be considered may be to some extent similar, and similar conclusions on like facts may be arrived at, that constructive total loss of the ship, as such, has to be proved in the case of a claim for loss of freight. The words "constructive total loss of the ship" in cl. 5 of the freight policy are words of art and cannot properly be employed in the case where the question for determination is whether the freight has been lost by perils of the sea. It is this assumption that it is necessary actually to prove constructive total loss of the ship in order to recover upon a claim for loss of freight by perils of the sea which, in my opinion, invalidates the judgment against which this appeal lies: if there be wreck value to be taken into account it is not even accurate to say that the same facts will support a finding of loss of freight by perils of the sea and a finding of constructive total loss of the vessel by the same perils or that the standards are comparable for the following reason.

In Macbeth & Co., Ltd. v. Maritime Insurance Co., Ltd. (9) it was held before the passing of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 60, that, in estimating the value of a ship as worth repairing, the value of the damaged ship as a wreck was taken into account. Now, by that section, the value of the wreck cannot any longer be added by the assured to the cost of repairs (Hall v. Hayman (11)), but in so far as s. 60 is not dealing, in my view, with loss of freight in such a case as this, in considering the problem whether loss of freight is due to perils of the sea, the value of the wreck in applying the test of whether a prudent insured owner would sell the ship where she lies or repair her may still be relevant (see s. 91 (2) of the Act preserving the common law when not disturbed), so that the criteria in any given case of disputed causation by perils of the sea in the case of constructive total loss of ship and loss of freight may in certain cases differ.

There remains for consideration the question for what purpose it was necessary to insert a provision determining the basis of ascertainment of constructive total loss in cl. 5 of the freight policy. To understand this it is first necessary to quote cl. 4 of the same policy, which is to the effect that:

> "In the event of the total loss, whether absolute or constructive, of the vessel, the amount underwritten by this policy shall be paid in full, whether the vessel be fully or only partly loaded or in ballast, chartered or unchartered."

In Coker v. Bolton (12) it was held that what is here this cl. 4 prevented the operation of the ordinary rule of law by which, in the event of a constructive total loss, the right to the freight earned subsequently to the loss passes to the underwriters on hull, and for such a purpose it may have been considered necessary to consider a matter not generally material in the case of a claim to loss under the freight policy, namely, what constitutes constructive total loss of the ship, and the contracting parties have thought fit for such a purpose to fix as the ship's value the insured value of the ship in the hull policy. It is to be noted that such a clause is in favour of the assured; here cls. 4 and 5 read together are sought to be used to his detriment.

I am not prepared to say that the operation of cl. 5 is necessarily limited to cases coming under cl. 4, and whenever the question whether there has been a total constructive loss of the ship is raised on the freight policy, cl. 5 may well operate, though I find it difficult to imagine such a case under this contract. But, for the reasons I have stated, that question should not have been propounded in that form in the present case, and there is no reason, therefore, for invoking cl. 5, which produces an artificial enhancement of the value of the ship.

It is true that in the books there are certain dicta which seem to support the view of the learned judge in this case, that > "there can be no total loss of freight unless there be a total or constructive total loss of the ship"

PORTER, J.'s judgment (40 Com. Cas. at p. 293), such as the words of COLLINS, J., in the Bessie Morris Case (2) ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 580) to the effect that:

> "When the freight is said to be lost through damage to the ship, it must be shown that the ship itself to which the freight is an accessory was actually or constructively lost."

But these and similar statements really mean no more than that the standard to be applied in the case of freight is that which would be appropriate to the case of constructive total loss if the claim were upon a hull policy, though, for reasons which I have stated, since the passing of the Marine Insurance Act even this may not now be entirely accurate. The test whether the expense is one which a prudent uninsured owner would incur may, or may not, be precisely the same in the case of a claim on freight or on hull policy. But to say simpliciter that it is necessary to prove on a freight policy that the vessel is a constructive total loss is, to my mind, not correct.

As I have said, on the actual value of £13,000, there can be no question but that this freight was lost by perils of the sea, and I agree, therefore, that the assured succeeds, and this appeal should be allowed, and the case remitted on the terms stated by my Lord.

GREENE, L.J.—I agree. There are three contracts to be considered in this case, and it is important to keep them distinct. They are: (i) the charterparty, (ii) the hull policy, (iii) the freight policy.

(i) The charterparty regulates the rights and obligations of the shipowners and the charterers. It contains the usual exception of perils of the sea the effect of which is to excuse the parties from performing the contract if performance is prevented by a peril of the sea. The rights and obligations of the parties under the charterparty are not affected by the existence or the terms of either the hull policy or the freight policy. In considering those rights and obligations it is, in my opinion, important to avoid the introduction of the expression "constructive total loss." This is a technical expression relating to the rights and liabilities of assured and underwriters under marine policies, and is not proper to be employed in dealing with the position as between owner and charterer under a charterparty. So far as regards owner and charterer the relevant question in the present case is: What is the state of facts arising from a peril of the sea which will entitle the shipowner or the charterer to treat the contract as discharged? Where such a state of facts exists and either party properly elects not to proceed with the contract, the contract is discharged and the shipowner loses his right to receive the unpaid freight.

A lengthy discussion took place before us as to what state of facts arising from a peril of the sea would justify a determination of the charterparty. It was said on behalf of the respondents that, apart from actual total loss of the vessel, there must be a constructive total loss of the vessel. As I have already pointed out, constructive total loss is a conception with which, as such, the charterparty has nothing to do. The misleading nature of the proposition appears in a striking manner when the question what is meant by constructive total loss as therein used is investigated. If it means constructive total loss in the sense prescribed by s. 60 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, the result will be that the rights and liabilities of the parties under the charterparty are governed in this respect by a statute which is concerned only with marine insurance; and it would appear to follow that they would be affected by an amendment of that section which altered the statutory definition of constructive total loss. It is to be observed that the section itself altered the law as to what is necessary to constitute constructive total loss as laid down by the House of Lords in Macbeth & Co., Ltd. v. Maritime Insurance Co., Ltd. (9). I am unable to accept the view that the facts necessary to discharge the contract contained in the charterparty can, in any way, be affected by the statutory provisions from time to time in force with regard to constructive total loss. If, on the other hand, the expression means "constructive total loss" as it was before the statute, under the decision in Macbeth's Case (9), the argument fails to secure that correspondence between the position under the charterparty and the position under the hull policy which it aims at establishing.

In truth, as I have already said, the proposition is a misleading one. The question what facts will constitute constructive total loss under a hull policy, where the vessel is damaged by a peril of the sea, appears to me to be fundamentally different from the question what facts will discharge the contract contained in the charterparty when the vessel has been damaged by a peril of the sea. In each case the amount of expenditure required to repair the vessel (if she is reparable) is a vital consideration; and, ignoring for the moment the complication introduced by the Marine Insurance Act above referred to, it may be that no damage will discharge the contract contained in the charterparty, which would not be sufficient to constitute a case of constructive total loss under an actual or imaginary policy on hull, any conventional value agreed upon in a hull policy being for this purpose of course ignored. For the purposes of my judgment in this case I am prepared to proceed upon this hypothesis, although it must not be assumed that I accept it as correct or that I accept the view that the amount of damage requisite to discharge the contract contained in the charterparty is in any way affected by statutory provisions for the time being in force in relation to what constitutes constructive total loss for the purposes of a policy on hull. I must also make it clear that the acceptance of this hypothesis is a different thing from the acceptance of the proposition that "constructive total loss" is a proper way of describing the state of the vessel when the question is one between owner and charterer or between assured and underwriter on freight. The importance of this distinction for the present case will appear when I come to consider the Institute Clauses which are incorporated in the freight policy.

It was said on behalf of the appellants that the true test is in principle that performance of the charterparty is excused if the expenditure necessary to make the vessel navigable for the voyage in question is such that it would be unreasonable to require the shipowner to incur it. The effect of this contention, if correct, would be to introduce a standard of damage different from that required to constitute a constructive total loss under a policy on hull, and, accordingly, to make it impossible to say that cl. 5 of the Institute Clauses applied. For the purposes of this judgment it is unnecessary to consider whether or not this contention is correct.

(ii) The position of the parties under the hull policy presents no difficulties. It only comes into consideration in this case for the purpose of seeing to what extent its existence or its terms may affect the mutual rights and liabilities under the freight policy.

(iii) By the freight policy the shipowner effected an insurance of the freight payable under the charterparty against the risk of loss by perils of the sea. The subject-matter of the insurance is a chose in action, namely, the contractual right to receive the freight from the charterer under the charterparty. If that right is lost through a peril of the sea, the underwriters are liable as on a total loss.

In considering whether or not there has been such a loss of the right to receive freight through a peril of the sea, it is necessary to determine in the first place whether or not as between charterer and shipowner the right to receive the freight has been lost by peril of the sea. Upon principle and apart from any special provisions in a freight policy (such as, e.g., cl. 7 in the Institute Clauses), this would, in my opinion, be the relevant question to determine in deciding what are the liabilities of the freight underwriter, and, in deciding this question, the same principles must apply as between assured and underwriter on freight as apply as between owner and charterer.

The question was discussed before us as to the state of facts necessary to enable the assured on a freight policy, apart from special provisions, to recover where the ship is damaged. This question is similar to that discussed in the case of charterer and owner, and similar contentions were made on behalf of the parties. Here, again, I do not find it necessary to decide whether or not the plaintiffs' contention is correct, and, in particular, I refrain from expressing any opinion as to the correctness or otherwise of certain observations of BLACKBURN, J., when advising the House of Lords in Rankin v. Potter (4) (L.R. 6 H.L. at p. 117) which were discussed at length before us. I am content, without deciding the question, for the purpose of this judgment to accept in the case of the freight policy a hypothesis corresponding to that which I have for the like purpose accepted in the case of the charterparty.

Apart from certain special clauses in the freight policy, it could not have been contended that the right of the assured in the circumstances to recover from the freight underwriters would have been affected in any way by the valuation clause in the hull policy, the effect of which on the facts of the present case was to prevent the case being one of constructive total loss as between the owners and the hull underwriters. Apart from the special clauses in the freight policy, the existence and the terms of the hull policy appear to me to be irrelevant for the purpose of determining the rights and liabilities of the parties under the freight policy. The fact that the parties to the hull policy have for the purposes of that policy agreed on a conventional value for the vessel cannot in the absence of special provision to that effect in the freight policy prevent the assured under the freight policy from asserting that he has lost the right to receive the freight from the charterer by a peril of the sea.

Upon the hypothesis referred to above the decision of the present case, in my opinion, turns entirely on the true effect of cls. 4 and 5 of the Institute Voyage Clauses—Freight which are incorporated in the freight policy. The terms of these clauses have already been stated, and I need not repeat them. A clause similar to cl. 4 has already been judicially considered by LORD SUMNER (HAMILTON, J., as he then was) in Coker v. Bolton (12). The form of Institute Freight Clauses which fell for consideration in that case did not, as we were informed by counsel, contain a clause corresponding to what is now cl. 5, that clause having been introduced into the form at a later date. LORD SUMNER held that what is now cl. 4 was introduced to meet the hardship caused by the rule that a shipowner who, by giving notice of abandonment, has lost his right to any freight subsequently earned is precluded from suing on the policy on freight. I do not read this judgment as meaning that this is necessarily the only effect of the clause; indeed, the words "whether the vessel be fully or only partly loaded or in ballast, chartered or unchartered," seem to show it has a wider operation. The object of the clause, however, was I think clearly to confer additional rights upon the assured, not to cut down rights which he already enjoyed.

I turn now to a consideration of cl. 5. One argument advanced on behalf of the respondents with regard to this clause may be stated as follows: In order to entitle the assured to recover on the freight policy there must be a constructive total loss of the vessel; apart from cl. 5 it might be doubtful whether the real value of the vessel or its conventional value as stated in the hull policy should be taken for this purpose; cl. 5 removes this doubt by providing that the conventional value is to be taken, and, as on the basis of that value, there was no constructive total loss of the vessel, the assured is not entitled to recover. On the other hand, it is said on behalf of the appellants that cl. 5 is merely a definition of the expression constructive total loss in cl. 4, an expression which does not appear elsewhere in the freight policy.

It is right to observe that if the sole object of cl. 4 was to afford a remedy for the injustice referred to by LORD SUMNER, cl. 5 would appear to be in part, at any rate, otiose, since that injustice could not arise unless there had in fact been abandonment of the vessel to the underwriters and abandonment as on a constructive total loss could only take place in accordance with the terms of the hull policy and on the basis of the conventional value appearing therein.

But this does not dispose of the matter. The argument is necessarily based upon the assumption that constructive total loss of the vessel is as such essential to the right of the assured to recover under the freight policy, since it is only upon this assumption that the formula laid down in cl. 5 for ascertaining when a constructive total loss has taken place is relevant. If I am right in my view that this assumption is incorrect, the whole argument appears to me to fall to the ground. The formula can, in my opinion, only be applied where constructive total loss as such is relevant for the purposes of the freight policy, and it can only become relevant if the parties have so agreed. The only matter in respect of which the parties have expressly so agreed are the matters dealt with in cl. 4, and I think that the operation of cl. 5 must in this policy be confined to those matters, although a similar clause in a different policy might have a wider effect, e.g., if the policy itself contained other references to constructive total loss of the vessel. The other argument as to the operation of cl. 5 was as follows:

It was said that, even if the phrase "constructive total loss" of the vessel is not in itself apt to be used in reference to the question between assured and underwriter on freight, yet the parties must be taken so to have used it in the present case; and in support of this argument it was said that what would be in strictness a misuse of a technical expression is intelligible if the relevant state of facts with regard to the condition of the vessel is the same both for the purpose of constituting a constructive total loss under a hull policy and for that of constituting a loss of freight by a peril of the sea under the freight policy. But I do not think that this argument should be accepted. The effect of accepting it would be to cut down the rights of the assured under the freight policy to a serious extent. If the parties had this object in mind it would have been natural to use clear language, and, in my opinion, the language of cl. 5 has no such clear meaning. If the argument were accepted it would mean that the parties had in the first place tacitly assumed that the requisite state of facts with regard to the condition of the vessel was the same under the freight policy as under the hull policy—an assumption which leaves at large the question whether constructive total loss at common law or under the Marine Insurance Act is meant—and had then inaccurately used in cl. 5 the expression "constructive total loss" to describe that state of facts.

If it had not been for the fact that we are differing from PORTER, J., I should have been content to express my agreement with the judgments already delivered, but out of respect for the learned judge, I have thought it right to state my reasons, which I do with all deference.

Appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. DUKE OF WESTMINSTER

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, Lord Russell, Lord Macmillan and Lord Wright), March 12, 14, 20, May 7, 1935]

Surtax—Deductions—Annual payments—Payments under covenant to employee—Reduction of employee's salary by amount of covenanted sum—Substance of the transaction.

The taxpayer executed deeds of covenant, all in substantially the same form, in favour of employees of his. In each deed he covenanted to pay to the relevant employee in consideration of past services as from a stated date, during the joint lives of himself and the employee or for a period of seven years, a stated weekly sum. It was expressly provided that the payments were " without prejudice to such remuneration as the annuitant will become entitled to in respect of such services (if any) as the annuitant may hereafter render to" the taxpayer. A letter of explanation was sent to each employee in whose favour a covenant was made informing him that there was nothing to prevent him claiming full remuneration for his future services, but stating that it was expected that, in practice, he would be content with the provision which was being made by the deed, in addition to such sum (if any) as might be necessary to bring the total periodical payment up to the amount of the salary which he had lately been receiving. The employee was asked to acknowledge that he accepted the provision made for him by the deed, and each employee signed such an acknowledgment. The taxpayer claimed to deduct the amount of each annuity from his total income for the purposes of surtax.

Held (LORD ATKIN dissenting): under the deeds of covenant each employee was entitled to an annuity which, as between himself and the taxpayer, was liable to deduction of income tax by the taxpayer and which the taxpayer was entitled to treat as a deduction from his total income for surtax purposes; and the letters of explanation and acknowledgments did not qualify the deeds so as to change the legal rights and liabilities created by them.

Per LORD TOMLIN: Every man is entitled, if he can, to order his affairs so that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be. If he succeeds in ordering them so as to secure this result, then, however unappreciative the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or his fellow taxpayers may be of his ingenuity, he cannot be compelled to pay an increased tax. This so-called doctrine that the court may ignore the legal position and regard " the substance of the matter " seems to me to be nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Slesser and Romer, L.JJ.) on a Case stated under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 42 (7) (d), and the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

The Case stated as follows:

1. At meetings of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on Nov. 3, 1932, and April 3, 1933, the Duke of Westminster, hereinafter called "the appellant," appealed against assessments to surtax made upon him for the three years 1929–30, 1930–31 and 1931–32.

2. The question for the decision of the court is whether certain payments, or any of them, made by the appellant under various deeds of covenant, constitute annual payments which are admissible as deductions in arriving at his liability for surtax for the years under appeal.

3. The deeds referred to in the foregoing paragraph are not all in precisely the same terms, but they are all deeds under which the appellant covenanted to make payments to persons who in fact were when the deeds were respectively executed, and in most cases remained throughout the material period, in his employ. Apart from the deeds of covenant executed in favour of Mr. Detmar Jellings Blow, hereafter referred to in para. 8 of this case, each of the deeds referred to above was in one or other of six forms.

5. The case of Frank Allman, gardener, is here set forth as a case typical of the cases covered by the before-mentioned six forms of deed. Deed of covenant made Aug. 14, 1930, between the appellant and Frank Allman, gardener, recites that in recognition of services faithfully rendered to the appellant for over twenty-seven years past the appellant desires to make provision for Allman notwithstanding that he may re-engage or continue in the appellant's service in which event he will become entitled to remuneration in respect of such future service. In consideration of Allman's past services the appellant covenants to pay Allman during the joint lives of himself and Allman or for a period of seven years the weekly sum of £1 18s. 0d.

6. It was admitted that all the covenantees were in fact getting under their deeds of covenant (with or without other moneys), the amounts which they would respectively have received as wages or salary if they lived during the period and continued in their employment, and that if they ceased to work the payments secured by the deed must still be made. It was also admitted on behalf of the respondents that in the case of an employee of the appellant who ceased to be in that employment at the date of the deed applicable to his case the payments made under that deed by the appellant were proper deductions in computation of his surtax income, and that such payments made to any employee who though in the appellant's employment at the before-mentioned date ceased to be in that employment during the period covered by the deed were also—in respect of the period after retirement of the employee—proper deductions in computation of the appellant's surtax income. This case accordingly concerns only the payments made by the appellant in respect of periods during which the covenantees were in the appellant's service. No question of figures arises.

In some cases in which like deeds or substantially similar deeds were entered into the covenantees had retired and were still being paid under the deeds.

7. Except in the case of Mr. Blow, letters of explanation were sent to the employees informing each of them before he signed the deed that there was nothing therein to prevent him from being entitled to and claiming full remuneration for such future work as he might do for the appellant, but stating that it was expected that in practice he would be content with the provision which was being legally made by the deed with the addition of such sum (if any) as might be necessary to bring the total periodical payments while he was still in the appellant's service up to the amount of the salary or wages which he had lately been receiving. The letter asked in each case for an acknowledgment from the employee if he was satisfied to accept the provision made for him by the deed.

8. The case of Mr. Detmar Jellings Blow is different in its facts from the other cases. Mr. Blow was at the date of each of the under-mentioned deeds and continued during the relative years to be in the appellant's service. By deed of covenant dated Aug. 2, 1927, the appellant, in consideration of the past services of Mr. Blow, covenanted to pay him or in the event of his death to his personal representatives and assigns for ten years from the date thereof a yearly sum of £2,000.

A new deed of covenant, dated Aug. 5, 1931, substitutes a period of twenty years from Aug. 5, 1931, for the period of ten years covered by the former deed. No letter was written to or acknowledgment required from Mr. Blow in connection with either of the deeds referred to in this paragraph.

9. It was contended on behalf of the appellant: (1) that all the payments made under the before-mentioned deeds so far as such payments were not already allowed or admitted as deductions should be allowed as deductions from the appellant's income in arriving at his liability for surtax for the years under appeal; (2) that the assessments were severally excessive in amount.

10. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that except as regards payments to covenantees who had left the appellant's service all payments under the deeds with employees were (in effect) payments for services to be rendered to the appellant and were not allowable as deductions from his income.

11. The commissioners who heard the appeal, held that in construing the true effect and substance of the deeds under which payments are made to the appellant's employees, they were entitled to consider together with these deeds the letters of explanation and form of acknowledgment which were sent to the covenantees. These letters, like the deeds themselves, were not in one stereotyped form, but were sufficiently to the same effect to enable them to arrive at a decision in respect of them all. They held that the payments made under these deeds to persons who remain in the appellant's employ were, in substance, payments for continuing service ejusdem generis with wages or salaries so long as the recipients in fact remain in the appellant's service and as such were not annual payments which were a proper deduction from his assessment to surtax.

They further held that the new deed of covenant with Mr. Blow did not alter the facts, and that the payment to him must fall under the principle of the above decision so long as Mr. Blow remained in the appellant's service.

12. The appellant immediately upon the determination of the appeal by his counsel declared to the commissioners his dissatisfaction with such determination as being erroneous in point of law and he in due course required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Finance Act, 1927, s. 42 (7) (d), and the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

The Court of Appeal held, reversing the decision of Finlay, J., that the genuine nature of these deeds was not impugned, and if no further services were to be rendered by the employees, the covenant, it was not disputed, would stand good, and in respect of that the payments would fall within r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules to the Income Tax Act, 1918, when income tax would be deducted from an annual sum paid out of profits already brought into charge; but the covenants, being definitely effective whether the employee continued in service or not, must be accepted in any event and the payments were payments under the deed and nothing else; therefore there existed a covenant to pay an annual sum and the covenantee, being the recipient, was bound under the latter part of r. 19 to allow deduction of income tax. If these payments could be considered as wages only, the matter would be different, as income tax on them would be assessable under Sched. E directly on the recipients, and surtax was payable on any money which was paid to employees for wages beyond the amount payable under the deed. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Reginald P. Hills for the appellants, the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

Wilfrid Greene, K.C., Raymond Needham, K.C., W. Cleveland Stephens, K.C., and Cyril King for the respondent, the taxpayer.

The House took time for consideration.

May 7. LORD ATKIN.—In 1930 and in subsequent years the respondent, the Duke of Westminster, executed a series of deeds in which he covenanted to pay to the several parties mentioned in the deed certain weekly sums for a period of seven years or the joint lives of the parties. The recipients in all the cases in question were persons then in the employ of the respondent at fixed wages or salaries, and after completion of the deeds continued in the employment and continued to receive such sums as with the sum payable by the deed made up the amount of the wages or salary payable before the deed and no more. The sums varied from 12s. to £2,000; the employment from gardener and laundryman to architect; and the past periods of employment from four years to forty-five. The Crown say that the payments made under the deed were made in the circumstances given in evidence as remuneration for services, and could not be deducted from the respondent's total income for purposes of surtax. The respondent says that the payments were annual payments which he was entitled to deduct. It is agreed between the parties that the question in this case is whether the payments were remuneration for services or not; if the former the respondent is chargeable, otherwise not. It is unnecessary, therefore, to trouble your Lordships with the various relevant sections and rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and subsequent Finance Acts. It is sufficient to say that your Lordships were satisfied that the admission was correct.

It was not, I think, denied, at any rate it is incontrovertible, that the deeds were brought into existence as a device by which the respondent might avoid some of the burden of surtax. I do not use the word device in any sinister sense; for it has to be recognised that the subject, whether poor and humble or wealthy and noble, has the legal right so to dispose of his capital and income as to attract upon himself the least amount of tax. The only function of a court of law is to determine the legal result of his dispositions so far as they affect tax. In the present case FINLAY, J., affirming the commissioners, decided in favour of the Crown, while the Court of Appeal have set aside that decision and given judgment in favour of the respondent.

The commissioners have taken six cases as typical in which the documents differ slightly in form, but in their opinion have the same effect. They chose for special example the case of Frank Allman, a gardener, and I will adopt the same course, though reference may have to be made later to some of the other instances.

The deed is in the following terms:

> "This deed of covenant is made this Aug. 14, 1930, between the Most Noble Hugh Richard Arthur Duke of Westminster, D.S.O. (hereinafter called 'the Duke') of the one part and Frank Allman of Vine Cottage Aldford near Chester Gardener in the Duke's service (hereinafter called 'the annuitant') of the other part.
>
> "Whereas in recognition of the services which for over twenty-seven years past the annuitant has well and faithfully rendered to the Duke the Duke desires to make provision for the annuitant in manner hereinafter expressed notwithstanding that the annuitant may re-engage or continue in the service of the Duke in which event he will become entitled to remuneration in respect of such future service.
>
> "Now this deed made in furtherance of the Duke's said desire and in consideration of the past services so rendered as aforesaid witnesses as follows:
> > "1. The Duke covenants to pay to the annuitant as from Aug. 2, 1930, during the joint lives of himself and of the annuitant, or for a period of seven years the weekly sum of £1 18s. (amounting in each year to the sum of £98 16s.) the first of such payments having fallen to be made on Aug. 9, 1930.

"2. The said payment shall be made from time to time on such days for such period and in such proportions as shall from time to time be mutually agreed upon by the parties hereto and in default of agreement shall be made in weekly payments on the Saturday of each week.

"3. It is hereby expressly agreed that the said payments are without prejudice to such remuneration as the annuitant will become entitled to in respect of such services (if any) as the annuitant may hereafter render to the Duke.

"In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written."

"[Signed and attested.]"

Counsel for the respondent took the view that the period of the covenant was the joint lives or seven years whichever was the shorter, and that the deed was to be without prejudice to the recipient receiving full remuneration for his future services. I shall assume that this construction is correct. No contention was raised in the present case that the payments, though expressed to be weekly, were not annual payments within the Income Tax Act, and Rules.

It will be convenient to consider the legal relations which would exist between the Duke and his servant on the supposition, which is that of the respondent, that the deed came into force without any further agreement of any kind being made between the parties.

The servant was serving the Duke under a contract of employment under which he was entitled to receive an agreed weekly wage of, we will suppose, £3: which contract would continue until terminated by notice or summarily or varied by agreement. On this footing when the deed came into operation the servant remaining in the employment would be entitled to 38s. a week in addition to the 60s. wages, and it is obvious that so far from benefiting himself by avoiding income tax the Duke would be adding several thousand pounds annually to his expenditure. I conceive it to be self-evident that no single party to the transaction ever contemplated that the servant would in fact draw the full contract wages in addition to the 38s. under the deed. And in fact as we learn from the case the servant after the deed continued to receive weekly the exact former amount of his wages, 60s., i.e., he received 38s., and such additional sum as made the total weekly payment the equivalent of his contractual wages. We are to assume, however, on the respondent's contention that no contract was made modifying either the terms of the deed or the contract of employment. The position of the Duke therefore was that, assuming the servant was content to draw only 60s. a week, the Duke would remain at all times liable to pay to the servant the arrears of the contractual wages, i.e., 60s.—22s., in other words, a sum equal to the payment under the deed. However long a time the service continued the servant would be entitled to this sum within the limit, if the Duke of Westminster chose to plead the Statute of Limitations, of six years arrears. The arrears would be a debt due to the servant and could be attached by any creditor of the servant, and would on death be assets of his which his personal representative would be bound to recover. It is perhaps worth mentioning that if in fact the Duke were only paying as wages 22s. peculiar results might follow if the wages were regulated by statute as by the Agricultural Wages Act or similar legislation: but as we have no evidence of such a position it is unnecessary to dwell on it. A nice question might also arise as to the amount which the Duke would be bound to tender as wages in lieu of notice.

The embarrassments, however, are not all on the Duke's side. One result to the servant, perhaps unexpected, would be that his total income having become 98s. a week he would incur liability to income tax, for salary or wages that he is entitled to but voluntarily forgoes must be included in his total income. And on what footing his "earnings" in his last employment would be calculated for purposes of workmen's compensation whether on 22s. or 60s. is a problem which I am glad we have not to decide.

Such being the position if the matter rested upon the deed and no more, it seems to me plain that the Duke's advisers were not prepared to leave him exposed to the liabilities I have mentioned. In every case before the deed became operative a letter was written by the Duke's solicitors to the servant the effect of which seems to me to be the material question in this case. The letter is not in the same form in every case though its effect is the same. In Allman's case it is on a typed form and is signed by the solicitors over a 6d. stamp. It is as follows:

> "Private.—The Grosvenor Office, 53, Davies-street, Berkeley-square, London, W.1.—Aug. 13, 1930.—To Mr. Frank Allman.—Dear Sir,—On Wednesday, the 6th instant, we read over with you a deed of covenant which the Duke of Westminister has signed in your favour under which you will be entitled to a gross sum of £1 18s. 0d. a week in consideration of your past faithful service and irrespective of any work which you may do for His Grace after the deed comes into effect. The deed will be in force for seven years if you and the Duke should so long live, and His Grace can reconsider the position at the end of that period. We explained that there is nothing in the deed to prevent your being entitled to and claiming full remuneration for such future work as you may do, though it is expected that in practice you will be content with the provision which is being legally made for you for so long as the deed takes effect, with the addition of such sum (if any) as may be necessary to bring the total periodical payment while you are still in the Duke's service up to the amount of the salary or wages which you have lately been receiving. You said that you accepted this arrangement, and you accordingly executed the deed. We write, as promised, to confirm the explanation which we gave you on the 6th instant. If you are still quite satisfied we propose to insert the 6th instant as the date of the deed, and we shall be obliged by your signing the acknowledgment at the foot of this letter and then returning it to us.—Yours faithfully, Boodle, Hatfield and Co., Stamp 6d."
> "Acknowledgment.—To the Duke of Westminster, D.S.O.—And to Messrs. Boodle, Hatfield and Co., his solicitors.—I have read the above written letter, and I confirm that I accept the provision made for me by the deed. I agree to the deed being dated and treated as delivered by and binding upon the Duke of Westminster and myself.—Frank Allman."

It will be observed from the letter that on Aug. 6 the solicitors had produced to the servant the deed already executed by the Duke, but undated and had made the explanation set out in the letter: that the servant had accepted "this arrangement" and had executed the deed. Now what was the object of the letter and the signed acknowledgment which formed part of the document? The respondent gravely says merely to provide evidence that the servant was satisfied with the provision made for him by the deed and to protect the Duke against claims against him in the future for any increased pension. But the servant in no case had any legal claim to pension, in any case the deed was not to last for more than seven years: and finally, and as I suggest, conclusively, the servant had already signified his acceptance of the provision made in the deed by executing it "accordingly." Execution by the servant had been in law unnecessary.

In my opinion, the facts and the terms of the letter indicate that the transaction was intended to have and had far more substantial results than the interchange of unnecessary assurances between master and servant. The document was intended to bind the servant, exactly to what terms I will shortly discuss. They must depend on the terms of the letter. But that the document was intended to be contractual is a conclusion that I find irresistible. For what reason is the signature of the solicitors placed by them over a contract stamp? Can there be any reason except that they thought that the letter contained an offer of a contract which would be completed by the signature of the acknowledgment by the party to whom it was addressed. I am satisfied that a letter signed over a contract stamp and requiring the addressee to return it with the appended acknowledgment signed, addressed by the employer's solicitors to a workman at weekly wages would inevitably be understood by the recipient and would be intended by the writers to be understood as a representation that he was being asked to make a contract in the terms of the document.

It still remains to consider whether the document discloses the parties to be agreed and sufficiently defines the terms. I have already pointed out the urgent necessity there was to relieve the duke from the obligations which would exist if the deed stood alone. I read the letter as saying there is nothing in the deed to prevent your claiming 60s. in addition to the sum mentioned in the deed, but you are expected in practice to be content with the provision, &c., with the addition, &c.: you have already said that you accept this arrangement, and will you now bind yourself by a formal contract to this effect. The acknowledgment "I confirm that I accept the provision made for me in the deed" in my opinion plainly relates to the only matter previously recited as being said by the servant, namely, I confirm that I accept this arrangement: and the arrangement is that I will be content with the provision in the deed with the addition, &c., of any sum necessary, &c.

We are thus, I think, inevitably forced to the conclusion that before the deed was executed there was a contract between master and servant as to the effect of the deed on the existing contract of service.

The only remaining question is relatively simple. Is the contract one which radically alters the terms of the existing contract of service: I will make a new contract of service, and I will serve you as gardener for 22s. a week; or, as in some of the other cases, I will serve you for nothing; or is it a contract which maintains the existing contract of service, I will continue to serve you as gardener for 60s. a week: but I will take payment of that 60s. as to 38s., the payment under the deed, and as to the balance, by the ordinary weekly payment. In the latter case the employer remains under an obligation to pay 60s., and discharges 38s. of that obligation by making the payment under the deed, which has been delivered with that bargain in existence.

I quite agree that the former is a possible bargain. A servant may agree to work for nothing, or for some sum which is merely a fraction of the current rates of wages. But such agreements are, in my experience, very exceptional. In the present case they would apply, it is said, to about a hundred employees. And I cannot contemplate so many servants consciously making bargains so alien to their traditions and for a period which would not be longer than seven years and might be shorter. The better construction appears to me to be that the servants were never asked to abandon the existing contractual rate. If it were otherwise one bears in mind the strange position of what were neatly called the uncovenanted servants, serving for higher wages, together with the other difficulties earlier referred to as wages statutes and wages in lieu of notice.

With great respect to the members of the Court of Appeal they seem to ignore what seems to me the essential fact of the document of Aug. 13, 1930, signed by both parties. SLESSER, L.J., alone makes what seems to me the necessary assumption that it is contractual, but for the reasons given I cannot assent to his view of the ensuing legal effect. Nor am I impressed with the fact that the deed would have a different effect on the surtax liability of the Duke if later he did not happen to be employing the recipient. That seems to me a very ordinary result if the circumstances of the covenantor and covenantee alter for income tax purposes. The fact is that what would make the difference in the tax position would be that the recipient would no longer be employed: the letter would not be in operation, and there could be no ground for alleging that the Duke was paying the money as remuneration.

I do not, myself, see any difficulty in the view taken by the commissioners and FINLAY, J., that the substance of the transaction was that what was being paid was remuneration. Both the commissioners and FINLAY, J., took the document of Aug. 13 into consideration as part of the whole transaction, and, in my opinion, rightly. I agree that you must not go beyond the legal effect of the agreements and conveyances made construed in accordance with ordinary rules in reference to all the surrounding circumstances. So construed, the correct view of the legal effect of the documents appears to me to be the result I have mentioned. I think the difficulty has probably arisen from the wording of the commissioners' finding that "the payments made under the deed were in substance" payments by way of remuneration. Standing alone, I do not think that phrase would be justified. But reference to the immediately preceding sentence indicates that the commissioners had taken into consideration the letters and form of acknowledgment before expressing their finding as above. Though they have not analysed the transaction as fully as I have endeavoured to do I have little doubt that they and Finlay, J., arrived at the same result as I, and it may be noted that so far as there is any question of fact involved, the finding of the commissioners if there is evidence is final.

Basing as I do my conclusion on the preliminary contract contained in the letter and acknowledgment, I find myself unable to accept the commissioners' conclusion in the case of Mr. Detmar Blow. No letter appears to have been written to him, and there was no evidence before the commissioners as to any agreement made with him. In those circumstances, on the facts as they were made known to the commissioners, it appears necessary to treat the legal relations between him and the duke in respect of the payment of £2,000 a year as governed by the deed alone. The assessment, therefore, should be reduced by that sum. Except as thus varied, in my opinion the order of the commissioners should be restored, and the appeal allowed with costs here and below.

LORD TOMLIN.—It cannot I think be doubted that each one of the annuities payable under the deeds of covenant brought to your Lordships' attention if considered with reference to the deed creating it and without regard to the other matters upon which the appellants rely falls into that class of payments which are treated as part of the taxable income of the payee and not of the payer. Each annuity is on this footing therefore an item from which the payer is entitled to deduct income tax and which he is entitled to treat as deductible from his total income in making his return for surtax purposes.

So far as concerns the annuity payable to Detmar Jennings Blow I can discover no element in the case which upon any view of the law or facts can alter the position as I have stated it and in my opinion the appeal in regard to this annuity must fail.

With regard to the other annuities the correspondence in each case contemporaneous with or following upon the execution of the deed of covenant together with the fact that after the deed the payee being in the Duke's employment was in fact getting under the deed (with or without other moneys) the amount which he would have received as salary or wages if no deed had been executed, is said by the appellants to alter the whole position and so long as the payee continues in the Duke's service to render it impossible for the Duke to treat the annuity under the deed as a deductible item in his return of income for surtax purposes.

It is agreed that as between the annuities under consideration (other than that of Blow) no distinction can be drawn and that Allman's annuity is typical. A decision in Allman's case must therefore govern the remainder.

Now, so far as I understand the argument, the appellants, while admitting that Allman's annuity is payable under the deed, say that there is, having regard to the correspondence and in all the circumstances, another collateral contract between the Duke and the payee to the effect that the payee will serve the Duke in consideration of a salary or wage equal to the salary or wage he was receiving before the deed of covenant was executed and that he will accept what he receives under the deed in part satisfaction of this salary or wage, and therefore that the annuity, so long as the payee remains in the Duke's service, is of a changed nature and is no longer a payment which the Duke is entitled to deduct from his income for the purposes of surtax.

In the first place I would observe that if any such contract is proper to be inferred from the correspondence and circumstances, the contract must be a separate independent contract in the case of each payee, and could only be inferred from a full examination of each case separately, and unless the contract alleged is wholly in the correspondence only after hearing evidence from the parties to the alleged contract or their representatives. In fact no evidence of this kind was called before the commissioners and the commissioners have not found that any such contract existed. Their only finding is expressed in para. 11 of the case stated and is as follows:

> "11. We, the commissioners who heard the appeal, held that in construing the true effect and substance of the deeds under which payments are made to the appellant's employees, we were entitled to consider together with these deeds the letters of > explanation and form of acknowledgment which were sent to the covenantees. These letters, like the deeds themselves, were not in one stereotyped form, but were sufficiently to the same effect to enable us to arrive at a decision in respect of them all. We held that the payments made under these deeds to persons who remain in the appellant's employ were, in substance, payments for continuing service ejusdem generis with wages or salaries so long as the recipients in fact remain in the appellant's service and as such were not annual payments which were a proper deduction from his assessment to surtax."

I will deal later with that part of the finding which says that the payments were "in substance" payments for continuing service ejusdem generis with salaries or wages.

In the next place I would note that a contract in the terms alleged is nothing more than a contract that the payee will serve the Duke for a salary or wage equal to the difference between the amount received under the deed and the amount of the original salary or wage. In any event, whether he serves the Duke or not the payee is entitled under the deed to the amount of the annuity less tax and the annuity already legally payable cannot become part of the consideration for a new contract of service.

Again, such a contract if it could be inferred at all is in flat contradiction of the deed. Under the deed the payments are expressed to be without prejudice to such remuneration as the annuitant would become entitled to in respect of such services (if any) as the annuitant might thereafter render to the Duke. It is also in flat contradiction of the terms of the letter to which I will presently refer.

In fact I do not think that upon the true construction of the relevant letter and written acknowledgment even when regarded in the light of such facts as are admitted or found in para. 6 of the case stated, there was any such collateral contract as alleged.

The letter of Aug. 13, 1930, told the annuitant that there was nothing in the deed to prevent his being entitled to and claiming full remuneration for such future work as he might do, though it was expected that in practice he would be content in effect with the difference between the annuity and salary or wages which he had been lately receiving.

I cannot think that a letter so framed can be construed as constituting a contract that the payee would serve the Duke upon terms in contradiction of the language of the letter, namely, that he should be entitled to less than the salary or wages which he had been then lately receiving. Further, the arrangement which the annuitant is stated in the letter to have accepted must, I think, on a proper reading of the letter refer to all that is set out in the letter as well as what is contained in the deed and includes his right to full remuneration over and above what is received under the deed. Again, the acknowledgment signed by the annuitant at the foot of the letter is that he accepts the provision made for him by the deed, and that is a provision without prejudice to his right to full remuneration over and above what he receives under the deed. In short it seems to me that there is no such contract as that which the appellants suggest can be inferred.

Apart, however, from the question of contract with which I have dealt, it is said that in revenue cases there is a doctrine that the court may ignore the legal position and regard what is called "the substance of the matter," and that here the substance of the matter is that the annuitant was serving the Duke for something equal to his former salary or wages and that, therefore, while he is so serving the annuity must be treated as salary or wages. This supposed doctrine (upon which the commissioners apparently acted) seems to rest for its support upon a misunderstanding of language used in some earlier cases. The sooner this misunderstanding is dispelled and the supposed doctrine given its quietus the better it will be for all concerned, for the doctrine seems to involve substituting "the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion" for "the golden and straight mete wand of the law" (4 Inst. 41).

Every man is entitled, if he can, to order his affairs so that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be. If he succeeds in ordering them so as to secure this result, then however unappreciative the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or his fellow taxpayers may be of his ingenuity, he cannot be compelled to pay an increased tax. This so-called doctrine of "the substance" seems to me to be nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable. A

The principal passages relied upon are from opinions of LORD HERSCHELL and LORD HALSBURY in your Lordships' House. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in Helby v. Matthews (1) ([1895] A.C. at p. 475) observed:

> "It is said that the substance of the transaction evidenced by the agreement must be looked at, and not its mere words. I quite agree," B

but he went on to explain that the substance must be ascertained by a consideration of the rights and obligations of the parties to be derived from a consideration of the whole of the agreement. In short, LORD HERSCHELL was saying that the substance of a transaction embodied in a written instrument is to be found by construing the document as a whole. C

Support has also been sought by the appellants from the language of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in Secretary of State for India v. Scoble (2) ([1903] A.C. at p. 302). There LORD HALSBURY, said:

> "Still, looking at the whole nature and substance of the transaction (and it is agreed on all sides that we must look at the nature of the transaction and not be bound by the mere use of words), this is not the case of a purchase of an annuity." D

Here again LORD HALSBURY is only giving utterance to the indisputable rule that the surrounding circumstances must be regarded in construing a document.

Neither of these passages, in my opinion, afford the appellants any support or has any application to the present case. The matter was put accurately by my noble and learned friend, LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE, when, as WARRINGTON, L.J., in Re Hinckes, Dashwood v. Hinckes (3) ([1921] 1 Ch. at p. 489), he used these words: E

> "It is said we must go behind the form and look at the substance. I do look at the substance, but in order to ascertain the substance I must look at the legal effect of the bargain which the parties have entered into."

So here the substance is that which results from the legal rights and obligations of the parties ascertained upon ordinary legal principles, and having regard to what I have F already said the conclusion must be that each annuitant is entitled to an annuity which, as between himself and the payer, is liable to deduction of income tax by the payer and which the payer is entitled to treat as a deduction from his total income for surtax purposes.

There may, of course, be cases where documents are not bona fide nor intended to be acted upon, but are only used as a cloak to conceal a different transaction. No such G case is made or even suggested here. The deeds of covenant are admittedly bona fide and have been given their proper legal operation. They cannot be ignored or treated as operating in some different way because as a result less duty is payable than would have been the case if some other arrangement (called for the purpose of the appellants' argument "the substance") had been made.

I find myself, therefore, in regard to the annuities other than that of Blow unable to H take the same view as the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack.

In my opinion in regard to all the annuities the appeal fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD RUSSELL.—I would dismiss this appeal. It is conceded that the deeds are genuine deeds, i.e., that they were intended to create and do create a legal liability on the Duke to pay in weekly payments the annual sum specified in each deed, whether I or not any service is being rendered to the Duke by the covenantee. Further, it is conceded that the sums specified in the deeds were paid to the covenantees under the deeds.

The question for our decision is whether those sums so paid constitute part of the Duke's income for the purpose of computing his liability for surtax in the particular years in question.

I need not consider in detail the various statutory provisions which are relevant to the consideration of this matter. The result may for the purposes of this case be summarised thus:—if the payment of these sums is payment of salary or wages within Sched. E, from which tax is not deductible by the Duke, then he is not entitled to exclude the amounts paid in ascertaining his total income for surtax purposes, but if the payment is an annual payment within Sched. D, from which tax is deductible by the Duke, then he is entitled to exclude the amounts paid in ascertaining such total income.

There can, I think, be no doubt that if the deeds stood alone the payments are annual payments within Sched. D. Indeed, this is not, I think, disputed. It is, however, argued that certain letters written by the Duke's solicitor to the covenantees and certain acknowledgments signed by the covenantees at the foot of those letters, effect a complete change in the situation, and turn the payments made under the deeds into payments of salary and wages within Sched. E.

I will consider the suggestion in relation to the case of Frank Allman. The argument centred round his case, and it was common ground that all the cases (with the exception of the case of Mr. Blow) stood or fell together notwithstanding any difference of wording which might exist among them.

The legal position created by Allman's deed is clear. He is entitled during the defined period to his annual sum of £98 16s. by weekly payments of £1 18s., commencing on Aug. 9, 1930. He is not bound to do a stroke of work in order to be entitled to payment. If he does in the future render any service to the Duke, he will be legally entitled to claim remuneration for it, over and above the payments under the deed, which are to be without prejudice to his remuneration for future services. The deed expressly so provides.

The letter to Allman states the effect of the deed, but says that it is expected that in practice he will be content with the legal provision made by the deed

> "with the addition of such sum (if any) as may be necessary to bring the total periodical payment while you are still in the Duke's service up to the amount of the salary or wages which you have lately been receiving."

That is an expression of hope or anticipation that the covenantee will not enforce his legal right to remuneration for future services beyond a certain amount. The letter states that the covenantee had "accepted this arrangement," and asks him to sign an acknowledgment in a form already written out at the foot of the letter. The arrangement said to have been accepted can be nothing more than what the letter states, namely, the execution of a deed which was to be binding and in full force, coupled with an expectation on the part of the Duke that the covenantee's legal right to full remuneration for future services would not be enforced. There is no evidence of any other arrangement. Acceptance of that arrangement cannot turn the expectation into an enforceable legal right.

The acknowledgment signed by the covenantee is in strictly limited terms. It accepts the provision made by the deed; it in no way admits or suggests that the deed has to any extent been qualified by the letter.

For myself I can find nothing in the letter and acknowledgment which constitutes or resembles a contract, notwithstanding the fact that the names of the solicitors were written across an adhesive stamp. There is an expression of a hope or anticipation or expectation that the covenantee will pursue a certain line of conduct, but he nowhere binds himself to do so, nor indeed is he even asked to do so. In my opinion, the letter has no operation at all, and has no effect upon the legal rights and liabilities of the parties created by the deed.

But if I am wrong in this view, and some contract dehors the deed was brought into existence by means of the letter and acknowledgment, it can be no more than a contract by Allman that his remuneration for future services shall not be full remuneration but only the additional sum referred to in the letter. I can see no grounds for extracting from the language used a contract that the remuneration for future services shall, despite the deed, be the sums payable under the deed in respect of past services plus the additional sum mentioned in the letter. I can find no possible justification for this. A suggestion was made that such a contract can be found by reason of the presence in the letter of the words

> "to bring the total periodical payment up to the amount of the salary which you were receiving previously to the deed of covenant."

I fail to see how these words can bear this strain. Indeed, to me they seem to point in the opposite direction. They recognise that full remuneration for future services will not be paid, and that the total periodical payment will be composed in part of salary and in part of something which is not salary at all.

If the true view is that (contrary to my opinion) a contract has been made to accept less than full remuneration for future services, the position is still the same, namely, that the legal rights and liabilities of the parties created by the deed remain unqualified and unaffected.

The result is that payments, the liability for which arises only under the deed, are not and cannot be said to be payments of salary or wages within Sched. E. They cannot with any regard to the true legal position be said to arise from an employment. They are, and can only be said to be, annual payments within Sched. D. Tax was deductible on payment; they are income of the recipient, and are accordingly not part of the Duke's total income for the purpose of calculating his liability for surtax.

The commissioners and FINLAY, J., took the opposite view on the ground that (as they said) looking at the substance of the thing the payments were payments of wages. This simply means that the true legal position is disregarded, and a different legal right and liability substituted in the place of the legal right and liability which the parties have created. I confess that I view with disfavour the doctrine that in taxation cases the subject is to be taxed if, in accordance with a court's view of what it considers the substance of the transaction, the court thinks that the case falls within the contemplation or spirit of the statute. The subject is not taxable by inference or by analogy, but only by the plain words of a statute applicable to the facts and circumstances of his case. As LORD CAIRNS said many years ago in Partington v. A.-G. (4) (L.R. 4 H.L. at p. 122):

> "As I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation it is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown seeking to recover tax cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law the subject is free however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be."

If all that is meant by the doctrine is that having once ascertained the legal rights of the parties you may disregard mere nomenclature and decide the question of taxability or non-taxability in accordance with the legal rights, well and good. That is what this House did in the case of Secretary of State for India v. Scoble (2); that and no more. If, on the other hand, the doctrine means that you may brush aside deeds, disregard the legal rights and liabilities arising under a contract between parties, and decide the question of taxability or non-taxability upon the footing of the rights and liabilities of the parties being different from what in law they are, then I entirely dissent from such a doctrine.

The substance of the transaction between Allman and the Duke is, in my opinion, to be found and to be found only by ascertaining their respective rights and liabilities under the deed, the legal effect of which is what I have already stated.

The case of Mr. Blow's deed, which is uncomplicated by any letter, is necessarily decided, in my view, in the same way as Allman's case.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal was right and ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACMILLAN.—The respondent recently entered into certain transactions with a number of his employees, and the question to be determined in this appeal is whether these transactions have affected his liability to surtax. It has been agreed that, to test the matter, the respondent's transaction with Frank Allman may be taken as typical of the series.

Allman was employed by the respondent as a gardener at a weekly wage, the amount of which is not stated, but which was in excess of 38s. a week. The wages paid by the respondent to Allman were profits arising to Allman from his employment within the meaning of Sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918. Consequently the respondent was not entitled to deduct tax on paying Allman his wages, nor was he entitled to deduct his payments to Allman in computing his total income for surtax purposes. Such being the position of the parties, they executed in 1930 a deed of covenant which has been quoted in full by my noble and learned friend LORD ATKIN.

It is agreed on all hands that the legal effect of this deed was to give Allman thereafter for the period of its endurance the right to a weekly payment of 38s. irrespective of whether he remained in the respondent's employment or not, but without prejudice to Allman's right to remuneration for such services as he might thereafter render to the respondent. I do not think that there can be any doubt, and indeed none was suggested, that, if this deed had stood alone, the sums paid to Allman in pursuance of it would have been of the nature of an annual payment payable as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of a contract within the meaning of r. 1 applicable to Case III of Sched. D, with the result of entitling the respondent, under r. 19 (1) of the All Schedules Rules to deduct income tax on making the covenanted payments to Allman and consequently to deduct the amount of these payments in computing his total income for surtax purposes.

But the deed of covenant did not stand alone. There were in addition a letter addressed to Allman by the respondent's solicitors and an acknowledgment by Allman, which have also been quoted in full by my noble and learned friend. In my opinion these two documents formed part of the transaction between the parties. It has been suggested that they had no legal efficacy. The respondent's solicitors do not appear to have held that view. They may have been mistaken in their belief that the letter and the acknowledgment embodied a binding arrangement but I confess that I share it. In my opinion these documents embody an agreement between the parties that, notwithstanding Allman's unqualified right under the deed to 38s. a week, work or no work, and to full remuneration for any future work he may do for the respondent, nevertheless, so long as he remains in the respondent's employment, he will be content with the covenanted payments under the deed plus the difference between them and the wages he was previously receiving. In other words Allman agrees that in view of the respondent having undertaken to pay him 38s. a week in the future independently of his employment, he will not expect or be entitled to any further payment from the respondent, so long as he remains in the respondent's employment, beyond the difference between the covenanted payments and the wages he previously received.

Allman has, I understand, remained in the respondent's service and receives in fact the same sum of money weekly from the respondent as he received before the transaction in question. Has that sum to the extent of 38s. altered its legal character in consequence of the transaction? In my opinion it has. Whereas previously Allman was entitled to the 38s. a week as wages, he is now entitled to payment of this sum weekly whether he is employed by the respondent or not. That is the effect of the deed of covenant. The arrangement embodied in the two collateral documents does not alter that effect, whatever else it does. It is difficult to see how a sum which is payable irrespective of employment can be said to be a profit arising from employment. If the collateral documents had affected the absolute and independent nature of the obligation under the deed of covenant different considerations might have arisen. But the absolute obligation to pay irrespective of employment remains unaffected by the collateral documents, which recognise that Allman will in future have an unqualified right to a weekly payment of 38s. from the respondent whether the respondent employs him or not.

I venture to suggest that the proper approach to the problem is to ask the question, in the language of r. 1 applicable to Case III of Sched. D: Is the 38s. a week of the nature of an annual payment payable by the respondent as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of a contract? Plainly it is, and none the less so because of the collateral arrangement which, whatever it does, does not convert the deed of covenant into a contract of employment, for the 38s. remains payable, employment or no employment. It is agreed that if Allman leaves the respondent's employment the weekly payments which he will continue to receive under the deed will fall within r. 1 applicable to Case III of Sched. D. But the payments made to him while he remains in the respondent's employment are exigible by him under precisely the same legal obligation on the part of the respondent. If then the question which I have put must be answered in the affirmative, r. 19 (1) of the All Schedules Rules automatically applies and the respondent is entitled to deduct tax on making the covenanted payments to Allman and if he is entitled to deduct tax from the payments he is also entitled to deduct the amount of these payments in computing his total income for surtax purposes. The same reasoning is applicable to the respondent's transactions with his other employees, except that in the case of Mr. Blow there was only a deed of covenant and no collateral letters. His case is consequently a fortiori of the others.

I am fully conscious of the anomalous consequences which might conceivably arise in other connections from the course adopted by the respondent, but your Lordships are concerned only with the technical question whether the respondent has brought himself within the language of the income tax rule as to contractual payments, and I think that he has succeeded in doing so. That is enough for the decision of the case. It is not likely that many other employers will follow the respondent's example, for few employers would care to take the risk to which the respondent has left himself exposed, namely, that his servants may quit his employment and take their services elsewhere and yet continue to exact the covenanted weekly payments from him.

The result of the views which I have expressed is that in my opinion the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

LORD WRIGHT.—The difference of opinion which this appeal has elicited has caused me some doubt, but after careful consideration I am bound to say that, speaking for myself, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal must fail.

If the case were one in which it was found as a fact in regard to each of the deeds in question that it was never intended to operate as a legal document between the parties, but was concocted to cover up the payment of salary or wages and to make these payments masquerade as annuities in order to evade surtax, it may well be that the court would brush aside the semblance and hold that the payments were not what they seemed. But there is no such finding by the commissioners; indeed, no such case was even suggested; on the contrary, it is admitted that the deeds are genuine and carry an obligation according to their tenor, irrespective of whether the various payees are or are not in the respondent's service at any material date. This is clearly so in the cases not here questioned in which the covenantees are no longer in the respondent's employment. And all your Lordships are of opinion that this is so in the case of Blow, though he is still in the respondent's service, and that the payments in his case are properly deductible.

What then is the difference which distinguishes Blow's case from that of the other covenantees whose cases are to be considered in this appeal? The only difference is to be found in the accompanying letter and form of acknowledgment, both of which are absent in Blow's case. It is on these documents that the commissioners arrive at their conclusion that the payments under the deeds are not annual payments but "in substance payments for continuing service ejusdem generis with wages or salaries" so long as the recipients remain in the respondent's service.

Like others of your Lordships I shall take as typical the case of Allman. The covenant in the deed to pay him is unconditional. It is not conditioned by the contingency of Allman re-engaging or continuing in the respondent's service; the relevance of that contingency is expressly negatived in the recital; and by cl. 3 it is expressly agreed that the payments are to be without prejudice to such remuneration (what that may be is unspecified) as the annuitant will become entitled to in respect of such services, if any, as he may thereafter render to the respondent.

On the footing that the deed is genuine, I do not see any possibility of going behind what appears on the face of the document, or qualifying its effect by documents dehors the deed and in no way embodied in it or regarding the payments as other than annual payments, as it is admitted that ex facie they are. And what the legal effect is as between the covenantor and the covenantee must determine for revenue purposes the character of the payments actually made.

That character is not to my mind changed if the letter of explanation and the letter of acknowledgment can be taken into account.

The letter of explanation quite correctly, and in accordance with the actual terms of the deed, states that there is nothing to prevent Allman from claiming full remuneration for future work from the respondent; the letter goes on to state what is expected, namely, that Allman will " in practice be content " with the provision made by the deed with such additional payment as will, with the payments under the deed, bring his salary up to what he had been previously receiving. This seems to me to be merely the language of hope and expectation and not to be language capable of being construed as an offer which, if accepted by Allman, would bind him to work for the respondent at the reduced rate; that is if in future he did so work, because no one suggests that if he did not work for the respondent his right under the deed would be affected.

But if the letter of explanation, together with the acknowledgment, were treated as constituting a contract, it could only be a contract to pay and accept what may be called the additional sum. I cannot extract from the actual words a promise or right to pay or receive what is called the " full remuneration for future work " ; it is true that Allman would under the deed be entitled to claim " full remuneration " if he were so minded, as a condition of working, but I cannot find any ground for thinking that he ever did so, and still less that the respondent employed him on that footing.

But whatever view is taken, the nature of the obligation embodied in the deed appears to me to be unaffected. I do not stop to examine what is the precise position of Allman and those in like case with him if they go on working in the respondent's employment. It may be that the true inference of fact is that they are working for the additional sum and nothing else, the reason why they are content with this reduced rate being that they are receiving also the annuities under the deed. There may be difficulties in that position. But in any event any such agreement would be merely collateral to the deed.

I may add that I do not understand what is meant by the expression " payments for continuing service ejusdem generis with wages or salaries." The payments must be one thing or the other, either annual payments or wages; there is no room for anything intermediate or in the nature of cy près. And once it is admitted that the deed is a genuine document, there is, in my opinion, no room for the phrase " in substance." Or, more correctly, the true nature of the legal obligation and nothing else is " the substance."

I need not develop this point, as I agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friends, LORD TOMLIN and LORD RUSSELL.

Appeal dismissed.

Adjourned Summons. By her will dated April 13, 1868, the testatrix directed her executor and trustee to invest £600 and pay the interest thereon upon trusts for the benefit of her natural children Emma Boyer and Frederick Boyer, and after the death of both of them to divide the £600 and any accumulation of interest therefrom "among such and so many of my brothers and sisters or their heirs as shall be living at the time of my decease." The testatrix died on April 7, 1868. Emma, a sister of the testatrix, died intestate on Nov. 10, 1871, leaving a husband, Frederick Nicole, and six children her surviving, one of whom was the defendant, Agnes Amelia Williams. The husband, Frederick Nicole, re-married and died on Nov. 18, 1907, leaving two children of his second marriage him surviving, one of whom was the defendant, Edward Charles Nicole. The survivor of the testatrix's two children, Emma Boyer and Frederick Boyer, namely, Emma Boyer, died on March 18, 1930.

The present trustee of the will of the testatrix took out this summons in which the principal question to be determined was whether C. F. Nicole, the husband of Emma Boyer, the sister of the testatrix, took on the death of his wife her share in the £600 as her heir, and, therefore, whether all his children, by both his marriages, participated.

FARWELL, J.—The question which I have to determine is whether under a gift to a person or his heirs, the words "or his heirs" include, or do not include, the husband of the first taker. I have already decided on a previous occasion in this case that the gift was a substitutionary gift and that the words "or his heirs" operate to give the personal estate to the persons who would have become entitled on the death intestate of the first taker to his or her personalty. That, however, does not conclude the question which I am now considering, namely, whether where the first taker was a married woman the persons entitled include her husband.

This matter has been considered to some extent in certain cases and it has been treated by the text writers as a matter which is now settled. I find in HAWKINS ON WILLS (2nd Edn.), p. 123, the rule stated in these terms:

> "A bequest of personal estate to 'A. or his heirs' is construed as a gift by way of substitution to the heirs, in the event of the death of A. before the period of distribution."

Then the learned author goes on:

> "And the word 'heirs' is held to mean the persons who would be entitled to the personal estate of A., by virtue of the statutes of distribution, if he had died intestate, including therefore a widow, but not including a husband."

A statement to a similar effect is to be found in JARMAN ON WILLS (7th Edn.), pp. 1541, 1545. A similar statement up to the last edition, without any qualification, is to be found in THEOBALD ON WILLS; but in the 8th edition of THEOBALD, at p. 369, there is a reference to an Irish case to which I shall have to refer in a moment.

The question really is this: Do the persons who take by way of substitution mean the persons entitled on the death of the first taker as though the first taker had died intestate, that is, without any reference to the statutes of distribution at all, but simply the persons who would take if he had died intestate, or do they mean the persons who take by virtue of the statutes of distribution, or do they mean the next of kin? Now, if the words mean the next of kin that would exclude the widow, if the first taker was a married man, and I think it is quite plain that that is not the meaning which has been attributed to these words in any of the cases. There seems to be little doubt that a widow is one of the persons who is entitled to take under a gift of this sort, and she is entitled to take although there is imported into the gift a reference to the statutes of distribution—indeed she is one of the persons who takes by virtue of those statutes. But in no case, if the words are to be treated as meaning next of kin or as meaning the persons who take under the statutes of distribution, can a husband participate if the first taker is a married woman, because the husband succeeds to his wife's property, not as one of the next of kin, nor by virtue of the statutes of distribution, but by reason of his marital right.

This being so, there appears to be some doubt whether the husband ought to be included or not. The principle upon which the courts have acted in construing the word "heirs" in reference to personal estate seems to be this. The word "heirs" as referring to personal estate is not a very apt word. The courts have said it can be given a proper and reasonable meaning by analogy to the use of the word in connection with real estate, and that, therefore, it can be taken to mean the persons who succeed to the personal estate of the first taker. If that be the ratio decidendi I find it a little difficult to see why it is necessary to import the statutes of distribution at all. I should have thought the logical conclusion would have been that the persons who take are the persons who are what LORD BROUGHAM called in Gittings v. McDermott (1), the heirs of the personalty, that is to say, the persons who succeed upon an intestacy to the personal estate of the first taker.

But, even if the statutes of distribution are not brought in, there is still a difficulty in the way of the husband, because it may be said that, although he may take his wife's personal property on her death intestate, he does not succeed to it. He takes it, not by way of succession, but by his marital right. That would seem to be a somewhat artificial use of the word "succeed," because for all practical purposes, e.g., paying succession duty, he does succeed to his wife's property, and, had the matter been free from authority, I should have thought the proper conclusion to come to was that the husband was one of the persons who would be entitled to participate in a gift of this kind.

But this matter is not free from authority, because, apart from the textbooks, there is a case which appears to decide the point adversely to the husband—Re Walton's Trust (2). That was a decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C. Unfortunately, the case is not reported, but it is referred to and cited by Wood, V.-C., in Doody v. Higgins (3). So far as I can gather from the reference to Re Walton's Trust (2) in Wood, V.-C.'s judgment, Kindersley, V.-C., decided two points: (i) that the gift was substitutional; (ii) that the husband did not participate. That case went to the Court of Appeal, who reversed the decision on the first point and consequently did not have to consider the second point at all, and if that be so, Kindersley, V.-C.'s decision that the husband was not included in the class to take stands and is a direct authority on the point. That appears to have been the view of Wood, V.-C., in Doody v. Higgins (3), because, having cited Re Walton's Trust (2), he adds this (2 K. & J. at p. 738):

> "The husband does not take by succession—he is not entitled under the Statutes of Distribution, but by virtue of his marital right—a right distinct from and paramount to the statutes of distribution."

Under those circumstances, I think it would not be right for me to decide in favour of the husband in a case of this kind, even though the statement by Wood, V.-C., in Doody v. Higgins (3) is only dictum, since it appears to have been based on the decision in Re Walton's Trust (2).

The matter is not wholly free from authority the other way, because in a comparatively recent case in Ireland, Barton, J., in Re Cusin (4), held that in a case of this kind a husband was entitled. Apparently Doody v. Higgins (3) was cited to him, but he does not make any express reference to it in his judgment. He says at the end of his judgment ([1917] 1 I.R. at p. 66):

> "There was no serious dispute at the Bar except in the case of Sarah. In her case it was contended that under the word 'heirs' her share would pass to her next of kin; and passages were cited from several cases in which 'heirs' of personal property has been held to mean next of kin. But that is because the persons entitled to succeed to the personal property ab intestato were in those cases the next of kin. In the present case it is the husband who is so entitled. It is well settled that a widow, although not strictly a next of kin, takes her share in cases of this kind. Why should not a husband take, when he is the person who is entitled on his wife's death to her personal estate? I therefore hold that, in the events that have happened, S.'s husband is entitled to her share."

If I may say so, with respect, I share the feeling of the learned judge in that case. Why should not a husband take when he is the person who is entitled on his wife's death to her personal estate? I appreciate, however, that it is not strictly accurate to say that a husband takes by succession, and if a substitutionary gift of this kind means either the persons who take by succession or the persons who are entitled under the statutes of distribution, in either case the husband is excluded. At any rate, I do not think that in the circumstances it is open to me to decide otherwise than in accordance with the view expressed by Wood, V.-C., which appears to be founded upon the decision in Re Walton's Trust (2). The Irish case is one which is not binding upon me, although, of course, I must treat it with every respect and, as I say, had I thought the matter free from authority I should have been tempted to follow that decision. Under the circumstances I do not think it would be right for me so to decide, and, accordingly, I must hold that the husband is not entitled to participate.

RAAHE O/Y OSAKEYTIO v. GODDARD

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lewis, J.), November 20, 1935]

[Reported 154 L.T. 124; 80 Sol Jo. 93]

Sale of Goods—Rejection—Defective quality—Part of goods defective—"Each item of this contract to be considered a separate interest"—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 30 (3).

A contract for the sale of timber contained a clause dealing with allowances for overshipment and undershipment, concluding with the words "each item of this contract to be considered a separate interest." The buyer rejected the whole of the goods on the ground that part of them did not comply with the contract specification.

Held: that the stipulation that each item was to be treated as a separate unit was applicable only to disputes with respect to quantity and not to disputes with respect to quality, and that, as part of the goods were defective in quality, the buyer was entitled to reject the whole, in accordance with the provisions of s. 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which enacts that where goods which do not comply with a contract are delivered mixed with others which do so comply the buyer may refuse to accept delivery of any part of the contract goods.

Notes. As to buyer's rights on a delivery of mixed goods see 29 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 128, and for cases see 39 DIGEST 566, 567. For Sale of Goods Act, 1893, see 22 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 985.

Case referred to:

(1) White Sea Timber Trust, Ltd. v. North, Ltd. (1932), 148 L.T. 263; 49 T.L.R. 142; 77 Sol. Jo. 30; 18 Asp. M.L.C. 367; Digest Supp.

Special Case stated by arbitrator.

By two f.o.b. contracts the sellers sold to the buyer consignments of Finnish timber. The contracts were in the form known as "Uniform 1933 contract (f.o.b. form), 1933," adopted by the Timber Trade Federation and by Swedish and Finnish associations. In each contract there appeared, at the end of a clause dealing with questions of overshipment and undershipment, the words: "Each item of this contract to be considered a separate interest." The buyer rejected the goods on the ground that part of them did not comply with the specifications in the contracts.

By the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 30 (3) it is provided that where goods which do not comply with a contract are delivered mixed with other goods which do so comply, the buyer is entitled to reject the whole.

The question in issue was whether that rule applied notwithstanding the express provision of the contracts that each item was to be considered a separate interest.

Sellers, K.C., and Gething (A. T. Miller, K.C., with them) for the buyer.

LEWIS, J. [after dealing with other questions not material to the point here reported, continued:]—Now comes question five, and I have been told I think by both counsel, that as far as they know the point which is raised by this question has never been argued. The question is: Is each of the contracts to be treated as an indivisible whole or are the various items of unsorted redwood and fifths included in the shipment under each contract to be taken as separate or divisible items.

I am told, I think I am right in saying, by both counsel, but certainly counsel for the buyer told me so and counsel for the sellers has not produced any authority to contradict it, that where this expression is to be found in a contract, and, apparently, it is to be found in contracts of this nature, nobody has ever argued that that means that each item in the contract is to be treated as a separate contract. The nearest attempt to any argument of that sort seems to have been made in White Sea Timber Trust v. North (1). There when the matter came before the court counsel sought to argue that the contract was divisible in the sense that each item formed a separate contract, but MACKINNON, J., pointed out that the point had never been taken before the arbitrator and did not arise to be argued. At all events, nothing more happened and no mention was made of it by MacKinnon, J., in his judgment.

The matter has never been raised expressly before me and was raised expressly before the arbitrator and appears in the arguments as set out in this Case on the part of the sellers, and I confess that I find very great difficulty in saying what those words, "Each item of this contract to be considered a separate interest," mean. Counsel for the sellers argued this point quite properly, and his argument would have to go as far as this—that, if all the items in the contract except one were not in accordance with the specification, the buyer would be compelled to take the one which was. I hope I am not doing any injustice to counsel's argument when I say that I think he was bound to go as far as that. To reduce it to the terms of the present contract and looking at the contract of March 20 it would work out in this way. There were thirteen items under the category of unsorted redwood, one of which, namely, two standards of $1\frac{1}{4}$ in. by 10 in., was entirely without reproach. Two of the others had small percentages of fifth quality, which for the purposes of what I am saying now may or may not render them blameless. I think all the fifth quality or discoloured redwood in the March 20 contract was according to the contract, and if counsel for the sellers is right it means that the buyers would be compelled to take the fifth quality, and the two standards of $1\frac{1}{4}$ in. by 10 in. and possibly the $\frac{7}{8}$ in. by $5\frac{1}{2}$ in. and the 3 in. by 4 in. which only contained 2 per cent. of fifth quality, but would be entitled to reject all the remainder of the parcel.

That may be the answer, but it does strike one as a little curious that where you get goods which are not the goods specified owing to their not coming up to the description or their not being of the dimensions, or in the case of the tins not being packed with a sufficient number of tins in the case or too many tins in the case—that in a matter of that sort the buyer should be bound to take that part of the contract which may only be one item out of 100, but should be entitled to reject the remaining ninety-nine. I heard counsel for the buyer state that it was obvious that the buyers never wanted the fifth quality. I do not know whether that is so or whether it is not; all I know is that it does appear on the correspondence that the sellers were saying: "We are not going to give you the unsorted redwood unless you take the fifth quality," and I am doing no more than forming an inference from the correspondence that it is admitted that the fifth quality would be unfit for joinery purposes. That goes without question, and, as the buyer was wanting timber for joinery purposes I should think it highly probable he did not want the fifth quality. However that may be, it does seem to me to be a curious result if the provision that each item of this contract must be considered as a separate item means that each item is to be looked at separately for all purposes. If it means that, you may get the curious position of a man being compelled to take something which he has only taken into the contract as a makeweight and is useless to him without the rest of the contract. He is entitled to reject the remainder of the contract although he may want to get the goods which are in the contract and may be the only things he does require. That is only speculation, but it does show the curious result of this clause if it means what it has been argued it means, namely, that each of these items is to be looked upon for all purposes as a separate contract and is to be dealt with separately.

I need not say more with regard to it than this. It is, of course, perfectly clear that under ordinary circumstances a contract for a parcel or parcels of goods of this sort is an entire contract. A reference was made to Benjamin on Sale, and I think it is conceded by everybody that in ordinary circumstances it is all one entire contract. Of course, there is nothing to prevent parties agreeing, where they are buying half a dozen commodities, or may I say a commodity in half a dozen different lengths and sizes, to treat each length and each size as a different contract. What I have to decide is whether the parties in this case have done that which it is contended they have done.

If that expression in the contract means what it is suggested it does, it is a little difficult to see why it was necessary to have cl. 16 in the contract which deals with claims as to quality. Counsel for the sellers in answer to the point made by counsel for the buyer in regard to that says: "Oh, but cl. 16 only draws a distinction between cases of what I may call complaint as to quality and complaint as to discoloration—that is to say, where you get one parcel, a part of which is discoloured, you may deal with that part of the parcel which is not discoloured, but where you are dealing with a complaint as to quality of a parcel, you have to put that parcel, so to speak, on one side and keep it intact but still you may go on and deal with the others." I do not think that that argument convinces me or that it is an answer to the point counsel for the buyer makes, namely that, if each of these parcels or items are separate contracts why was it necessary to put in cl. 16?

Although I find considerable difficulty in making up my mind about this, I cannot help thinking that the real answer is that the words: "Each item of this contract to be considered a separate interest," only refers to quantity. That is to say, when you are dealing with the quantity of each item, each item has to be looked upon as a separate contract. I have not been referred to any authority on the matter, and I feel certain if there had been any authority I should have been referred to it. I have to decide this case without the assistance of any authority, and I cannot help thinking that the real answer is as I have said, in view of the fact of the words "each item shall be a separate interest" are placed at the end of a paragraph which deals solely with the question of quantities shipped, overshipment or undershipment, and bearing in mind that there is at least one condition which would seem to be redundant if the clause "each item of this contract to be considered a separate interest," meant that for all purposes each item is to be a separate contract. I find that the contract is not separate or divisible for the purpose for which this matter comes before me. It is not a question of quantities shipped at all, but a question whether or not the sellers complied with the contract as to the condition or quality of the articles. I, therefore, find that the answer to question five is that the various items of the contract are not to be taken as separate or divisible items.

[Court of Appeal (Greer, Slesser and Roche, L.JJ.), May 22, 23, July 5, 8, 1935.]

Moneylender—Memorandum—Sufficiency—Application by moneylender for rectification of error in memorandum—Bankruptcy of borrower in respect of previous loan transaction—New loan of £100 at 64 per cent. interest granted on the terms that part of the loan should be retained by moneylenders as compensation for loss on previous loan—Memorandum setting out compensation term and stating loan was £100 and interest 64 per cent.—Default clause stating loan was £140*—Moneylenders Act,* 1927 (17 & 18 Geo. 5, c. 21), ss. 6, 15.

A borrower who had been adjudicated bankrupt in respect of loans which he had obtained from moneylenders was later granted by them a further loan of £100 upon the terms that £50 was to be retained by the moneylenders as compensation for the loss which they had incurred through his bankruptcy. In the memorandum and promissory note it was stated that the loan was £100 with interest at the rate of £64 per cent. per annum, payable by fourteen consecutive monthly instalments of £10 each, but in the default clause in the memorandum the amount of the loan was stated to be £140. The borrower defaulted and the moneylenders brought an action for the balance of principal and interest due on the promissory note. The borrower contended that the memorandum did not contain all the terms of the contract and as it did not show the amount of the principal of the loan, and the interest charged on the loan expressed in terms of a rate per cent. per annum as required by the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 6 (2). The moneylenders sought rectification of the statement as to the amount of the loan in the default clause.

Held: the memorandum did not comply with s. 6 (2), and the contract for repayment of the loan and payment of interest was, therefore, unenforceable, because (i) per Greer, L.J., the £50 retained by the moneylenders was "interest" within the definition contained in s. 15 (1) of the Act, and the rate of interest was, accordingly, more than the 64 per cent. stated in the memorandum; (ii) per Slesser and Roche, L.JJ., the £50 retained by the moneylenders was not actually lent to the borrower, the principal of the loan was, therefore, only £50, and neither the principal nor the interest was correctly stated in the memorandum.

(iii) per Slesser and Roche, L.JJ., the statement in the default clause that the amount of the loan was £140 made it impossible to say that all the terms of the contract had been included in the memorandum, and it was impossible for an application to be made to the court by a moneylender to rectify a mistake in a note or memorandum of the contract of loan required by the Moneylenders Act, 1927, or for a moneylender to talk of falsa demonstratio.

Appeal by the plaintiff moneylenders from a decision of du Parcq, J.

The plaintiffs, the Dunn Trust, Ltd., were a firm of registered moneylenders. The defendant, Robert Feetham, the borrower, had, until February, 1932, been a member of a firm of stockbrokers, and had had many loan transactions with the moneylenders. In July, 1933, he was adjudicated bankrupt and the moneylenders proved in that bankruptcy for £257 in respect of principal and interest. No dividend was paid. In May, 1934, the borrower approached the moneylenders with a view to a further loan, and an arrangement was come to between the parties that the moneylenders would make a loan to the borrower of £100 on the condition that the borrower would give the moneylenders £50 in part satisfaction of the losses which the moneylenders had sustained by reason of the borrower's bankruptcy, and a loan was accordingly made on that footing.

The memorandum of the contract which was signed by the borrower was in the following terms:

> "The Dunn Trust, Ltd., 11, Princes-street, Hanover-square, London, W.1. Note or memorandum for the proposed advance to be made to me by you this 28th day of May, 1934, of the sum of £100 with interest at the rate of £64 per cent. per annum on a promissory note payable to The Dunn Trust, Ltd., 11, Princes-street, Hanover-square, W.1, or at such place as they may direct, by fourteen consecutive monthly instalments of £10 each, commencing on the 28th day of June, 1934, and the balance on the fourteenth month, and in the event of default in payment of any instalment or part thereof then the said The Dunn Trust, Ltd., shall be at liberty at their option to demand payment of the whole of the balance of the said sum of £140 remaining unpaid and interest at the rate aforesaid to the date of such demand thereupon the whole of the said balance with interest as aforesaid whether in respect of principal or interest shall bear simple interest on that sum at the rate of £64 per cent. per annum from the date of such demand until payment and until such demand continue to pay the said monthly instalments and to pay interest at the above rate upon all overdue instalments until payment and all moneys paid on account of the said advance and interest shall be applied firstly in payment of the interest due to that date and then to principal. I agree the above rate of interest as a fair rate of interest for the risk taken by you in advancing me the sum of £100 on the security of the promissory note. Dated this twenty-eighth day of May, 1934. Out of this advance please retain the sum of fifty pounds to compensate you for part of the loss you sustained by reason of my last bankruptcy. I acknowledge to have received a true copy of this Note or Memorandum and that it was signed before the money was advanced or the security above-mentioned given.
>
> (Signed) R. Feetham."

The promissory note, signed in accordance with the memorandum, was as follows:

> "London, May 28, 1934. I, Robert Feetham, of Hill Top, Warlingham, promise to pay The Dunn Trust, Ltd., of No. 11, Princes-street, Hanover-square, W.1, or at such other place as you may direct, the sum of £100 together with interest at the rate of £64 per cent. per annum by   consecutive monthly instalments of £10 each the first of such instalments commencing on the twenty-eighth day of June, 1934, and the balance on the fourteenth month and in the event of default in payment of any instalment or part thereof then The Dunn Trust, Ltd., shall be at liberty at their option to demand payment of the whole of the balance with interest as aforesaid to the date of such demand thereupon the whole of the said balance with interest as aforesaid shall immediately become due and payable and such balance of the said sum and interest so remaining due as aforesaid, and whether in respect of principal or interest shall bear simple interest on that sum at the rate of £64 per cent. per annum from the date of such demand until payment and until such demand to continue to pay the said monthly instalments, together with interest at the above rate upon all overdue instalments until payment and all monies paid on account of the said advance and interest shall be applied firstly in payment of the interest due to that date and then to principal. (Signed) R. Feetham, Hill Top, Warlingham."

Only one instalment of £10 was paid, and the date of that payment was July 2, 1934. A

On Sept. 1, 1934, the moneylenders brought an action against the borrower as the maker of the promissory note dated May 28, 1934, claiming £96 2s. 8d. as being the amount due, but unpaid, after giving credit for the instalment of £10.

Du Parcq, J., held, that the moneylenders were not entitled to recover because the provisions of s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, had not been complied with. According to the evidence the amount lent by the moneylenders to the borrower was £50, B and that being so it followed that the note or memorandum did not contain all the terms of the contract. Both the amount of the principal and of the interest had been incorrectly stated. There must, therefore, be judgment for the borrower.

The Moneylenders Act, 1927, provides:

> s. 6: "(1) No contract for the repayment by a borrower of money lent to him or to any agent on his behalf by a moneylender after the commencement of this Act, C or for the payment by him of interest on money so lent, and no security given by the borrower or by any such agent as aforesaid in respect of any such contract shall be enforceable, unless a note or memorandum in writing of the contract be made and signed personally by the borrower, and unless a copy thereof be delivered or sent to the borrower within seven days of the making of the contract; and no such contract or security shall be enforceable if it is proved that the note or memor- D andum aforesaid was not signed by the borrower before the money was lent or before the security was given as the case may be; (2) the note or memorandum aforesaid shall contain all the terms of the contract, and in particular shall show the date on which the loan is made, the amount of the principal of the loan, and either the interest charged on the loan expressed in terms of a rate per cent. per annum, or the rate per cent. per annum represented by the interest charged as E calculated in accordance with the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act."
>
> s. 15: "(1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say:
>
> "Interest does not include any sum lawfully charged in accordance with the provisions of this Act by a moneylender for or on account of costs, charges, or expenses, but save as aforesaid, includes any amount, by whatsoever name called, F in excess of the principal, paid or payable to a moneylender in consideration of or otherwise in respect of a loan.
>
> "'Principal' means, in relation to a loan, the amount actually lent to the borrower."

The moneylenders appealed.

G

Croom-Johnson, K.C., and R. F. Levy for the moneylenders.
Harold S. Simmons for the borrower.

GREER, L.J.—Several difficult questions have been raised in the course of this appeal, but on one ground I am quite clear that the judgment of the learned judge below was right and that this appeal should be dismissed. The action was brought for money lent and interest. The Dunn Trust, Ltd., are moneylenders, and as such are H subject to the stringent provisions of the Moneylenders Act, 1927. In many cases borrowers, having obtained money by way of loan from moneylenders, have refused to pay the money back, relying on some technical provision in the Act. That does not seem to me to be entirely in accord with my abstract sense of justice. The statute, however, now states in its various provisions the requirements of the legislature as to how a moneylending business should be conducted in this country, and those provisions I must be complied with.

In this case the relevant facts are these: The borrower Feetham had been a stockbroker for a number of years, and was well acquainted with the manner in which interest is calculated. He had had several moneylending transactions with the moneylenders before the present one, extending over a period of several years, and had escaped from liability upon the last of those previous moneylending transactions by his bankruptcy in July, 1933. As he had not obtained his discharge the moneylenders could not call upon him to repay the money advanced by them; all they could do was to prove in

A bankruptcy against his estate for a dividend. Not having paid anything in respect of the earlier transactions the borrower went to the moneylenders and wanted to borrow some more money. According to the evidence of Kerman, the managing director of the moneylenders' company, which the judge accepted, the borrower arranged that if £100 were lent to him by the moneylenders he would agree to pay to the moneylenders £50 out of the £100 to compensate them for the loss they had previously incurred through B the borrower's bankruptcy.

One of the questions involved in the case is whether the note or memorandum which was signed by the borrower accurately states the transaction between the parties in the way required by s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927. Subsection (2) of that section provides that

> C "the note or memorandum aforesaid shall contain all the terms of the contract, and in particular shall show the date on which the loan is made, the amount of the principal of the loan, and either the interest charged on the loan expressed in terms of a rate per cent. per annum, or the rate per cent. per annum represented by the interest charged as calculated in accordance with the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act."

D It is to be noted that, under the provisions of s. 6 (1), not only must the note or memorandum be signed personally by the borrower before the money is lent, but also a copy of such note or memorandum must be sent to the borrower within seven days of the making of the contract. Unless both of these events happen the contract for the repayment by the borrower of money lent to him by a moneylender is unenforceable.

The question here, then, is whether, when the memorandum is looked at, it is right E to regard the £50 as being a payment of interest within the meaning of s. 15. If so, then there is no true statement in the memorandum of interest at a rate per cent. per annum. The question, therefore, to be determined is whether an agreement by the borrower that, in consideration of being lent £100, the lender might retain £50 out of the £100, and so to that extent compensating him for a loss on a previous transaction, does not make the £50 interest within the meaning of the Act. If it is interest then F there was no true memorandum of the contract within the meaning of s. 6 of the Act. Section 15 of the Act contains a definition of the term "interest." It provides that

> "'Interest' does not include any sum lawfully charged in accordance with the provisions of this Act by a moneylender for or on account of costs, charges, or expenses."

G It cannot be suggested that the £50 comes within those words. The section goes on to provide:

> "but save as aforesaid, includes any amount, by whatsoever name called, in excess of the principal, paid or payable to a moneylender in consideration of or otherwise in respect of a loan," and it is said that the £50 comes within those words. I find it impossible to come to H any other conclusion than that the £50 retained by the moneylender was an amount in excess of principal paid to the moneylender in consideration of a loan. If that be so, it concludes the case in favour of the borrower. The learned judge below decided that there was a loan for £50 only, and that, therefore, the amount of the principal was not truly stated in the memorandum. I am inclined to disagree with the judge's decision that the loan was not a loan of £100 but only of £50, but this is a matter of no con- I sequence, as in either case the memorandum untruly stated the rate of interest.

The learned judge also dealt with the question whether the interest was correctly stated, and came to the conclusion that the interest charged on the loan was not truly expressed in the note or memorandum in terms of a rate per cent. per annum. It is, however, not necessary to enter into a discussion of that question.

I am also inclined to the view that the statement in the memorandum that in the event of default in payment of any instalment or part thereof the moneylenders could "demand payment of the whole of the balance of the said sum of £140 remaining unpaid" was not a mere slip of the typist in typing the document, but that the person who typed the document intended to insert £140 in the memorandum in the case of a default. I have some difficulty in coming to a clear decision as to the truth with regard to this matter, and I do not base my decision in the case on this point. The cases cited by counsel do not seem to me to have any application to the facts of the present case. Even if the argument that the aid of the court can be sought in order to rectify the mistake be accepted, and rectification of the document were at all possible, inasmuch as the seven days after the making of the contract, within which a copy of the note or memorandum of the contract must be sent to the borrower, have elapsed, the contract, even if the memorandum were rectified, would nevertheless be unenforceable.

I ought, perhaps, to refer to the decision of the Court of Appeal in B. S. Lyle, Ltd. v. Chappell (1). In that case the borrower agreed with the moneylender that the money lent on the loan in question should be applied in repayment of an existing debt of the borrower to the moneylender. The contract gave the moneylender nothing more than he was entitled to apart from the contract. That fact distinguishes that case from the present case where the moneylender was getting something from the borrower which he could not get except under the contract for the loan.

In my view, the decision of the learned judge in the court below was correct, and this appeal must be dismissed.

SLESSER, L.J.—I have come to the conclusion, having regard to the provisions of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, that no more than £50 was actually lent to the borrower, and that, therefore, the principal of the loan was only £50. That being so, it is impossible to say that the interest was accurately stated in the memorandum as being £64 per cent. per annum, and, therefore, as neither the principal of the loan nor the interest charged on the loan was accurately stated in the memorandum the contract for the repayment by the borrower of the loan cannot be enforced.

Speaking for myself, I have come to a clear determination with regard to the insertion of £140 in the body of the memorandum instead of £100. In my view, owing to the fact that £140 was inserted in the body of the memorandum, it is impossible to say that all the terms of the contract have been included in the memorandum. I do not think it is necessary to inquire whether the insertion of £140 in the memorandum was due to a clerical error or any other kind of error, but only whether the insertion of that amount is material. SCRUTTON, L.J., in Reading Trust, Ltd. v. Spero (2), said ([1930] 1 K.B. at p. 505):

> "It was said in the first loan that the note of the contract was for payment of £200 and £60 per cent. interest by consecutive monthly instalments of £20 each, the first payable on Feb. 13, and the balance in the fourteenth month. Such a contract, a loan for thirteen months, would need thirteen consecutive instalments; that is to say, £260, and a balance to discharge it. The promissory note said so, but it was said the contract ought to have said 'thirteen' and did not. This difference is too trivial to notice."

SCRUTTON, L.J., referred to that case in Temperance Loan Fund, Ltd. v. Rose (3), and said ([1932] 2 K.B. at p. 527):

> "In Reading Trust, Ltd. v. Spero (2), I said that the particular difference there relied upon was too trivial for notice. Of course that again must in each case turn upon what the particular variation is."

The test, therefore, is whether the error in the memorandum is too trivial for notice, or whether it is a material error. In the present case we have had the evidence on affidavit of the lady who typed the document as to how she came to make the mistake. I do not think, however, that her evidence deals with the substance of the matter. A clerical error may be very serious. In the present case the error was a material error, as it is impossible to say that the insertion of £140 in the memorandum as being the amount of the principal sum due, instead of £100, was an error too trivial for notice.

It has been suggested that this was a case of a mutual mistake, and that the court has power to rectify the mistake, and reference was made to the jurisdiction of the court to rectify mistakes in documents in cases under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and the Statute of Frauds. But I do not think that the analogy of cases under those Acts applies to the present case. It is impossible for an application to be made by a moneylender to the court to rectify a mistake in a note or memorandum of the contract of loan required by the Moneylenders Act, 1927, or for a moneylender to talk of falsa demonstratio. I express no opinion with regard to the policy of the law as to moneylenders. That is not a relevant matter for this court to consider. It is a matter for the legislature to deal with. For these reasons I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed, inasmuch as there was a failure by the moneylenders to set out in the memorandum of the contract required by s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, a true statement as to the amount of the principal of the loan, namely, the amount actually lent to the borrower, or as to the interest charged on the loan according to the definition of "interest" in s. 15 of that Act, and consequently under s. 6 (1), of the Act the contract for the repayment by the borrower of the money lent to him by the moneylenders is unenforceable. I only desire to add a few words as to the distinction between B. S. Lyle, Ltd. v. Chappell (1) and this case, as I understand it. In that case the memorandum truly represented the transaction between the parties. The borrower who owed money to the moneylender borrowed more money from the same moneylender, and agreed that the moneylender should retain sufficient money out of the second loan to repay the amount due and unpaid on the first loan, whereas in the present case the memorandum did not truly represent the contract between the parties, and the £50 which was paid by the borrower to the moneylenders to compensate them for the loss they had sustained by reason of the borrower's bankruptcy was not paid in respect of any debt which the moneylenders could enforce, as the only right which the moneylenders had was to prove in the bankruptcy against the borrower's estate for a dividend. I do not accept counsel's argument that payment by the borrower to the moneylenders of the £50 was not part of the consideration for the loan. In my opinion, it was part of the consideration. I think that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below was right on that ground. As to the point with reference to the insertion in the body of the memorandum of £140 instead of £100, I entirely agree with the observations of SLESSER, L.J.

Appeal dismissed.

EYRE v. MILTON PROPRIETARY, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Lord Wright, M.R., Romer and Greene, L.JJ.), December 18, 1935]

Article 85 of the articles of association of the defendant company provided that one-third of the directors were to retire annually, but were eligible for re-election at the ordinary general meeting of the company, throughout which they should act as directors, and continued: " The directors to retire in the year 1925, . . . shall be determined by ballot. In every subsequent year the directors to retire shall be those who have been longest in office, and when two or more of such directors shall have served for an equal period, then their retirement shall be determined by ballot." In 1932 the plaintiff became a director of the company, and at that time there were seven other directors, two of whom were additional directors appointed under art. 90 which empowered the board to appoint such directors, but provided that any director so appointed should hold office " only until the next following ordinary general meeting of the company, and shall then be eligible for re-election." By art. 101 the managing director was not liable to retire by rotation.

Held: (i) on the true construction of art. 85 " ballot" meant " lot"; (ii) in view of the terms of art. 90 the two additional directors would cease to hold office as soon as an ordinary general meeting began, and, therefore, the number of directors at such a meeting to be taken into consideration for the purposes of art. 85 was five (the ordinary directors other than the managing director).

Notes. The wording of art. 90 of Table A scheduled to the Companies Act, 1948 (which reproduces art. 74 of the Table scheduled to the Companies Act, 1929), is somewhat similar to art. 85 in the present case, the word " lot" being used instead of " ballot": see the judgment of LORD WRIGHT, M.R., infra.

As to retirement of directors see 6 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 319, 320, and for cases see 9 DIGEST (Repl.) 551, 552. For Companies Act, 1948, see 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452.

Appeal by plaintiff from an order of EVE, J.

The facts and arguments appear in the judgment of LORD WRIGHT, M.R.

Sir Stafford Cripps, K.C., and Gordon Brown for the plaintiff.

Cyril Radcliffe, K.C., and Heckscher for the defendants.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—This is an interlocutory appeal from an order of EVE, J., and it raises a point of some interest, and, indeed, of some difficulty under the articles of association of this company.

The plaintiff is a director of the company. He was elected in February, 1934, and the question has arisen whether, under the articles of association and on the facts of the case, he is a retiring director at the end of the current year. The articles of association provide for a certain number of directors. They are at present six in number, the chairman and five others, and there are in addition two other directors, who are called additional directors. The article in question is art. 85, and it is in these terms:

> " At the ordinary meeting in the year 1925, and in every subsequent year, one-third, or the nearest number next below one-third, of the whole number of directors, shall retire from office, and the meeting shall elect qualified members in their place. A > retiring director shall be eligible for re-election at the meeting at which he retires, and shall act as a director throughout that meeting. The directors to retire in the year 1925, unless the directors agree among themselves, shall be determined by ballot. In every subsequent year the directors to retire shall be those who have been longest in office since their last election, and when two or more of such directors shall have served for an equal period, then their retirement shall be determined by ballot."

The points which arise on the construction of that article are two. One point was not taken before Eve, J., and it is taken now for the first time, and that is what is meant by "the whole number of directors," one-third of whom, or the nearest number next below one-third of whom, are to retire from office in the manner prescribed by the article.

The second point is what is meant by the word "ballot," if there are two or more directors to whom the article would apply in the absence of a determination as to who are to retire. The position is that the plaintiff and the chairman are both primâ facie liable to retire under this rule. They have served for an equal period, and if the number of directors who, under art. 85, are to retire from office in the current year are two, then a conflict will arise between the plaintiff and the chairman, Mr. Clough. If, on the other hand, the number of directors, who, under art. 85, have to retire is not two but one, then that one will not be the plaintiff, but will be Mr. Knox, another director. The directors are contemplating deciding the matter on the footing that there are these two directors, the plaintiff and Mr. Clough, who are liable to retire, and they are proceeding to determine as between these two which of them is to retire by a secret vote, because that is the meaning which they attach to the word "ballot." That is the second question, and it is the question on which Eve, J., gave his decision. He held that the word "ballot" meant a secret vote, whereas it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that it means, not a secret vote, but a drawing by lot. Both these questions are questions of some nicety, and either of them would be decisive of this appeal, but I think it better, as both points have been argued, to deal with both of them, especially as the first point was not before the learned judge.

As to the second point, which is the point of more general interest, that is to say, whether the word "ballot" means a secret vote or a drawing by chance, the word itself is clearly capable of either meaning, and after hearing the references to the history of this word in the course of company legislation, and also after being referred to a number of other Acts in which the word has been used, the first conclusion at which I arrive is that the meaning of the word must be determined, wherever you have a company using a set of articles of its own instead of Table A, by the construction of the articles as a whole. We have been referred to the Building Society Acts and to the Militia Acts. I do not deal with them, because they relate to an entirely different subject-matter from that which has to be dealt with now in dealing with this company. We have been referred to the Companies Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, where the word "ballot" was used in s. 88. It provides there:

> "The directors appointed by the special Act" [and others in their place] "shall retire from office at the times, and in the proportions following: the individuals to retire being in each instance determined by ballot among the directors."

So the word "ballot" starts in this connection at a very early period of company legislation. In Table A in the Companies Act, 1862, there is a very similar provision in art. 59.

> "The one-third or other nearest number to retire during the first and second years ensuing the first ordinary meeting of the company shall, unless the directors agree among themselves, be determined by ballot; in every subsequent year the one-third or other nearest number who have been longest in office shall retire."

That is very similar in terms in effect and in language to the article here. In 1906 the Board of Trade, acting under the powers given to them by the Act of 1862 to alter the tables, altered among other things the language of that article which I have just read, substituting the word "lot" for the word "ballot," and so the term has been used in the Companies Acts, and now appears in art. 74 of Table A, scheduled to the A Companies Act, 1929:

> "The directors to retire in every year shall be those who have been longest in office since their last election, but as between persons who became directors on the same day those to retire shall (unless they otherwise agree among themselves) be determined by lot."

The word "ballot" clearly may cover a case in which the decision depends on chance B or by lot. We have been referred to Re Tewkesbury Gas Co., Tysoe v. The Co. (1). There is no decision on this point, but the language there, which I imagine is quite usual, was to be found in a debenture, and the clause was:

> "The debentures to be paid off will be determined by ballot, and six calendar months' notice will be given by the company of the debentures drawn for payment," C so that there the word is clearly used, as it well may be used, in the sense of the name or a little ball or a piece of paper or whatever it is being put into some receptacle, mixed up with others, and drawn out. That is, of course, a matter of chance. That is a "lot," and it is chance in such circumstances which determine what the result is to be. The word "ballot" has been, undoubtedly, used in other circumstances as indicating a secret vote, but when I look at the language of art. 85 in this case, and consider the D circumstances, the view at which I have arrived is that the language here "by ballot," and the proper construction of the words "by ballot," is "by lot." No doubt, it is purely an administrative matter for the directors to ascertain in the case of doubt or conflict which of the possible directors is to retire at any particular time, but art. 85 contains no provision at all as to who is to determine the ballot, if by "ballot" is meant a vote. It is perfectly true that it might be implied that the persons to ballot would be E and must be the directors, but, on the other hand, if it is the directors who are to vote, if the matter is to be determined by a vote of the directors, whether secret or not, it is clear that very serious administrative difficulties would arise. There might, for instance, be an equality of vote, and then there is no provision at all for who is to give the casting vote. There would be an absolute impasse without any provision being made in the articles, and that difficulty is peculiarly illustrated by the provision relating to the year F 1925. It is provided that the directors, who shall retire in the year 1925, unless the directors agree among themselves, shall be determined by ballot. If, in such a case, "ballot" means a secret vote, there has been a failure to agree and that failure may be produced in the secret vote, and, as I have said, nobody would be able to settle the difficulty in the case of an equality of votes.

As I read these words, they presuppose first an attempt among the directors to agree, G and then the determination of the question who is to retire by something other than the agreement or the choice of the directors, and that can only be by the decision of the lot or by chance, and then in every subsequent year the same thing is to happen in a different way. You have, first, to ascertain who have been longest in office since their last election. If there are two or more of such directors who have served for an equal period, then their retirement is to be determined by ballot. Although the language is H capable of either meaning in the abstract, I think that when regard is had to the precise terms used and to the reason, probabilities, and practical advantages of the one interpretation as contrasted with the other, of the two meanings to be put on the word "ballot," the right one is the word "lot." That is what the plaintiff contends for.

The other point, as I have said, is what is meant by the words "of the whole number of directors" in art. 85, because it is essential to ascertain that in order to determine I what is the number of directors who have to retire in any particular year. On the one side it is contended that the number of directors constituting the whole number for this purpose is seven. That is the defendants' contention. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that "the whole number of directors" is not seven, but five. On the former view the number of retiring directors would be two; on the other view the number of retiring directors would be one. It is clear that the total number of directors for this purpose does not include the managing director. That is clear under art. 101, because art. 101 expressly says:

> "A managing director shall not, while he continues to hold that office, be subject to retire by rotation, and he shall not be taken into account in determining the rotation of retirement of directors."

Therefore, that reduces the possible number to either seven or five. The question whether seven or five is the correct number is to be ascertained by taking into consideration the terms of art. 90, which provides:

> "The board may from time to time appoint additional directors, but so that the total number of directors shall not exceed the prescribed maximum, but any director so appointed shall hold office only until the next following ordinary general meeting of the company, and shall then be eligible for re-election."

The point to be considered depends for its answer on the introductory words of art. 85 C as compared with the words of art. 90, and also certain later words of art. 85. There must be some point of time at which it must be ascertained who are "the whole number of directors" to whom must be applied the provision relating to retirement, and the time is to be at the ordinary general meeting. At the ordinary general meeting it is clear under art. 90 that the two additional directors will not be in office. They are to hold office "only until the next following ordinary general meeting of the company," that is D to say, at the moment when the next following ordinary general meeting of the company begins they are no longer in office, whereas the other five directors, whether retiring or not, are to act as directors throughout the meeting, and there is no express provision as in art. 90 that their office is to cease until—that is to say, just before—the ordinary general meeting. It follows from that, in my opinion, that when you take the critical time, the commencement of the ordinary general meeting, the number of directors that E you have to consider are the directors, exclusive not only of the managing director, but also of the two additional directors. That being so, the number to be considered is only five and "one-third, or the nearest number next below one-third," of five is obviously one, and it is not disputed that if there is only one director who, under the articles, is to retire, that director is not the plaintiff, but it is Mr. Knox.

On both these grounds, therefore, it seems to me, in my judgment, that the appeal F should be allowed, and an order made in the terms asked for. The exact words of the order which the court makes may be considered at the end of the judgments.

ROMER, L.J.—The position at the time when this motion came before EVE, J., was thought to be this, that Mr. Knox, who had been the longest in office, was due to retire, but that the plaintiff and Mr. Clough, who had been an equal time in office, not both G were to retire, but one of them was to retire. The dispute between the parties was whether it was Mr. Clough or whether it was the plaintiff who should join Mr. Knox. That is, as I understand it, the position with regard to the retirement. Accordingly, the notice of motion before EVE, J., was in these terms:

> "Take notice that this honourable court will be moved," and so on, "for an order restraining the defendant company from stating in the notice convening its ordinary H general meeting about to be convened or in any report accompanying such notice that the plaintiff and not the defendant Clough is one of the directors retiring by rotation, unless and until the question which of them is the director so retiring shall have been determined by drawing of lots and also restraining the defendant Clough, as chairman, from submitting and the defendant company from passing at such ordinary general meeting any resolution appointing or purporting to appoint any I other person to be a director in the place of the plaintiff, as being the director retiring by rotation at such meeting, unless the plaintiff shall have first been selected as the director to retire thereat by a drawing of lots."

When the matter comes before us, however, the plaintiff had thought this over further with his advisers, and had come to the conclusion that it was possible that neither he nor Mr. Clough would have to retire at the ordinary general meeting. Accordingly, the notice of appeal asks, in the first place, for an injunction

> "restraining the defendant Clough as chairman of the defendant company from submitting, and the defendant company from passing, until after judgment in this > action or further order, at the ordinary general meeting of the defendant company convened for Dec. 19, 1935, or at any adjournment thereof any resolution appointing or purporting to appoint any other person to be a director in the place of the plaintiff, as being a director retiring by rotation at such meeting," A and he only asks in the alternative for the relief that he had asked for before EVE, J., so that if he be right in the point with which the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has just dealt, B this relief must be given in accordance with the first part of the notice of appeal. If, however, he be wrong on that point, but right on the first point with which the MASTER OF THE ROLLS dealt in his judgment, then the plaintiff would be entitled to the alternative relief that he asks for in the notice of appeal.

I have come to the same conclusion as that to which the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has come upon both those points. Art. 85 provides as follows, and I am reading now the C last sentence of the article: "In every subsequent year the directors to retire shall be those who have been longest in office since their last election, and when two or more of such directors shall have served for an equal period, then their retirement shall be determined by ballot." "Subsequent year" means, subsequent to the year 1925, and if those words had not been preceded by a sentence which I will read in a moment, I do not think that anyone would have suggested, or at any rate could have suggested with D any chance of success, the "ballot" there meant a secret vote, because the secret voters are not determined. Nothing is said whether the secret voters are to be the two or more directors who have been an equal time in office, or whether the secret voters are to be the whole body of directors, or whether they are to be the whole body of directors excluding the two or more who have been longest in office, or whether the secret voters are to be the shareholders of the company in general meeting. In these circumstances, E it seems to me impossible to think that the word "ballot" there meant anything more than by lot, but the sentence with which we have to deal in this case, and which I have just read, is preceded by these words:

> "The directors to retire in the year 1925, unless the directors agree among themselves, shall be determined by ballot."

EVE, J., thought that those words, "unless the directors agree among themselves," F were sufficient to show that the ballot was to be a ballot amongst the directors themselves, the people who had been unable to agree. In his judgment he said this:

> "In my opinion, art. 85 indicates first that certain things are to be done if the directors are unanimous, that is to say, if there is no difference of opinion amongst them, certain things will be done as prescribed in the first part of the clause. If G they do not agree, I am of the opinion that the point in dispute is to be submitted to a secret vote where the names of the directors voting are concealed from the individuals who are ultimately to be turned out."

That, of course, was construing the sentence that I have just now read, and if in that sentence the word "ballot" meant a secret vote, of course "ballot" in the last sentence of art. 85 must, in accordance with the ordinary rules of construction, be given the same H meaning, but with the greatest deference to EVE, J., I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that by the use of those words, "unless the directors agree among themselves," the parties to the articles of association have shown that by "ballot" they meant a secret vote amongst the directors themselves. I confess that the words "unless the directors agree among themselves" have just the opposite effect on my own mind. They strongly suggest to me that if the directors cannot agree, then the directors are I to have nothing more to do with it at all, and the matter is then to be determined by chance.

Upon the other question which has been raised for the first time in this court, I have nothing to add to what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has said. I agree that in the circumstances the number of directors to be considered is the number of directors existing at the moment when the ordinary general meeting begins, and inasmuch as at the particular moment that it begins the two directors elected under art. 90 cease to be directors, the number of directors then must be taken to be five and not seven.

GREENE, L.J.—I agree on both points. With regard to the point that was first argued before us, it appears to me that arts. 85 and 90 show a clear distinction in the status of additional directors appointed under art. 90, and directors who retire by rotation under art. 85 at the relevant moment. The status of those appointed under art. 90 when the ordinary general meeting opens is that they are not directors. On the other hand, at the moment when the meeting opens a director retiring by rotation is entitled to be present in his capacity as director, notwithstanding that he is to retire, and may retire, at the next moment.

On the second point, the argument is that "ballot" must mean a vote by a constituency which consists only of the directors. I should have thought myself that if the word "ballot" was intended to imply a vote the constituency to be considered would be the constituency of the members of the company present at the meeting rather than the board alone. It is at the meeting that the retirement is to take place, and if that retirement was to be decided by a vote, one would have thought that, on the language used, the persons to vote would have been the shareholders. It is, to my mind, impossible to suppose that a matter of that importance should have been left in doubt, which, to say the least of it, would be the result on the construction submitted by the company. I further call attention to this fact, that it is admitted that the construction contended for by the company might, in circumstances which might very easily occur, lead to an impasse. In construing a document of this kind, which is intended to provide for the smooth and effective running of the machinery of the company, I think that it is legitimate to rely, and to lay stress, upon that matter. It is also right, I think, to point out that from the year 1862 down to the year 1906, with regard to all companies which had adopted Table A, or which had adopted that part of Table A which referred to this matter—and there were many of them certainly which adopted Table A—if all those companies were, whenever this occasion arose, deciding the question by a vote, in 1906 the procedure of those companies was changed. In view of the fact that an impasse is a thing which would be quite likely to arise, it does seem difficult for me to believe that companies in all those years, if they were deciding this matter by vote, would not have found themselves, sooner or later, in a state of impasse which would have involved some person bringing the matter before the courts. It is further to be observed that, so far as I have been able to discover, no textbook writer on the matter appears to attach any significance to the change in language which was introduced in 1906, and, had the change in language had the important result which is suggested, I cannot myself think that it would have escaped attention. The real fact of the matter is, in my opinion, that when in Table A of the original Companies Act of 1862 the word "ballot" was used it was used in the sense of the word "lot," and the change introduced in 1906 was not a change in the meaning of the word, but a change in language in order to preclude any possibility of doubt as to what was intended by the legislature.

Appeal allowed.

Shop—Hours of closing—Early closing day—Customers being attended to in shop before closing hour and remaining thereafter—Shops Act, 1912 (2 Geo. 5, c. 3), s. 4 (1), (2), (7).

Under an early closing order made by a local authority pursuant to s. 4 (2) of the Shops Act, 1912, a hairdresser's shop was required to be closed for the serving of customers not later than 1 p.m. on Tuesday of each week. On a particular Tuesday two women were in the shop for the purpose of having their hair "permanently waved," in one case from 10.15 a.m. to 2.15 p.m., and in the other case from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. Both had attended on appointments previously made, and there was evidence that three-and-a-half to four-and-a-half hours was the time required to complete a permanent wave. At 1 p.m. the outer doors of the shop were closed, and the assistant employed therein left, and, apart from the two women, no customer was in the shop after 1 p.m. An information was laid against the hairdresser charging him with a breach of the above statute and order. Section 4 (7) provided that "the occupier of a shop shall not be guilty of an offence against this Act when a customer is served at any time at which the shop is required to be closed under this section if he proves . . . that the customer was in the shop before the time when the shop was required to be closed."

Held: the justices were entitled to dismiss the information, as the women who were in the shop after the closing time were both genuine existing customers and had come to the shop for the purpose of having something definite done, and the hairdresser was, accordingly, protected by the above proviso.

Case Stated by Lancashire justices.

The appellant, Moore, the town clerk of Bury, preferred an information against the respondent, Tweedale, under the Shops Act, 1912, and the Bury Hairdressers' and Barbers' Early Closing Order of July 5, 1923, charging him that on July 15, 1934, at 32, Crostons-road, Bury, he unlawfully failed to close his hairdresser's shop for the serving of customers not later than one o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

The following facts were proved or admitted on the hearing of the information.

The respondent was a hairdresser carrying on business at 32, Crostons-road, Bury. In accordance with the provisions contained in the above-mentioned statute and order, the shop must be closed for the serving of customers not later than 1 p.m. on Tuesday of each week. On Tuesday, May 15, 1934, a police-constable saw one Alice Taylor leave the shop at about 2.15 p.m. She was questioned by the police officer and admitted that she had been in the shop for the purpose of having her hair permanently waved and was only just leaving. The constable then entered the shop and found there one Charlotte Goodman, and the respondent admitted that he was "doing her hair." Alice Taylor had attended at the shop on this day at 10.15 a.m. on an appointment made previously. Charlotte Goodman, who had also attended pursuant to a previous appointment, had arrived at 11 a.m. and left at 4 p.m. Immediately after Alice Taylor arrived the respondent and his wife were working on her permanent wave. After they had finished she took tea with the respondent and his wife and left at 2.15 p.m. Immediately after Charlotte Goodman arrived at 11 a.m. the respondent and his wife were working on her hair and continued to do so until she left at 4 p.m. It was proved that it took from three-and-a-half to four-and-a-half hours to complete a "permanent wave," the time varying according to the texture of the hair. The respondent employed an assistant who, on this day, closed the outer doors and left the shop at 1 p.m. No other customer entered the shop.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that s. 4 (7) of the Act did not operate to protect the respondent, as the proviso to that section was intended only to apply to the case of a customer who accidentally failed to complete an intended purchase before the closing hour, and did not extend to protect a shopkeeper who deliberately allowed a customer to enter his premises before the closing hour with the full knowledge that, in order to complete the work required by that customer, he would have to carry on his business for a long period after the closing hour. He relied on Salford Cattle Market Salerooms, Ltd. v. Osborne (1). On the part of the respondent it was contended that he had not acted contrary to the provisions of the order. The customers were both in the shop before the time when the shop was required to be closed, and the fact that it took a long time after the hour for closing to complete the service did not destroy the protection given by s. 4 (7).

The justices held that, inasmuch as the customers were in the shop and were being served some hours before the time when the shop was required to be closed, the protective provision of s. 4 (7) of the Shops Act, 1912, was operative and that the defendant had not been guilty of any breach of the order. They, accordingly, dismissed the information, and the appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

The Shops Act, 1912, provides:

> s. 4: "(1) Every shop shall . . . be closed for the serving of customers not later than one o'clock in the afternoon on one weekday in every week. (2) The local authority may, by order, fix the day on which a shop is to be so closed. . . . (7) In the case of any contravention . . . of this section, the occupier of the shop shall be guilty of an offence against this Act . . . Provided that the occupier of a shop shall not be guilty of an offence against this Act when a customer is served at any time at which the shop is required to be closed under this section if he proves either that the customer was in the shop before the time when the shop was required to be closed. . . ."

J. C. Jolly for the appellant.
Herbert Malone for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—In my opinion this appeal ought to fail. I think the conclusion of the whole matter is reasonably clear.

Under s. 4 (7) of the Shops Act, 1912, the occupier of a shop is not to be found guilty of an offence against the Act if he proves that the customer was in the shop before the time when the shop was required to be closed. Those words are somewhat vague and general. They must mean that the customer remains in the shop after the closing hour, and not merely that he had been in the shop before the closing hour and returned to it afterwards. The principles for the interpretation of a statute such as this are beyond dispute and are set out in Cope v. Doherty (2) and Parry v. Croydon Commercial Gas Co. (3), and as a physical fact it is obvious that the customer here was in the shop before the closing time and that the shop was closed at that time and after that time was not re-opened.

Much has been said about Salford Cattle Market Salerooms, Ltd. v. Osborne (1). I have a clear recollection of that case, which was heard in 1923 and dealt with an Act passed in 1920. Twelve years have now gone by, and I observe that every member of the court took pains to guard against construing the words of that statute as applying to all the infinitely various circumstances of human life. I myself said (129 L.T. at p. 688):

> "I am not attempting to imagine, much less to lay down, an exhaustive description of what is permitted by para. 2," and SHEARMAN, J., said:

> "I do not want to lay down any general principles on certain things, which, if the matter should come up, will be more specifically determined."

I accentuate the stress we all laid on the word "customer." If I may be permitted to do so, I will refer to the words I used on that occasion:

> "You have suggested a contrast between a general keeping open of a shop in order to invite persons to become customers, and, on the other hand, a serving in an emergency of a particular existing customer who happens to be caught in the shop, so to say, by the coming of the closing hour."

There is all the difference between keeping a shop open for the purpose of inviting persons to become customers, and serving customers in a closed shop who were present before the closing hour arrived. I do not think, therefore, that the judgment in the Salford Case (1) is conclusive of the present case.

On the facts of this case, I think that the justices were entitled to come to the conclusion to which they did come. The customers were genuine existing customers and were not stray persons from the street who entered in order that they might become customers. On the contrary, they had come for the purpose of having something definite done. One had arrived at 10.15 a.m., pursuant to an appointment previously made, and the other at 11 a.m., in similar circumstances. The respondent and his wife could not finish the work which they had undertaken to do before the shop closed. In those circumstances I cannot read into the subsection any words which made it obligatory on the justices to say that the statute had been infringed. It may be that cases will arise where the contract made necessarily involves that the shop must be kept open after hours, but that is not this case. There is to my mind much force in the observation of counsel for the respondent that in 1912, when this statute was enacted, it could not have been foreseen that "permanent waving" would have become so universal and essential. I think the justices came to a correct conclusion and that this appeal must be dismissed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. In my view, it is clear that the proviso to sub-s. (7) of s. 4 of the Act of 1912 applies. On the facts of this case there can be no doubt that the two women were customers in the shop before the time when the shop was required to be closed, and there is, therefore, a clear distinction between this case and the Salford Case (1), in which the whole point of the judgment was based on the fact that the persons in the shop were not customers, but persons who had been invited to become customers before the shop closed. I agree with my Lord that there may be cases which come within the mischief of the Act, but, apparently, are protected by the words of the proviso. To meet those cases, it would be necessary that there should be an amendment of the words of the proviso. Until that amendment is made I can see no ground for saying that the justices were wrong.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I also am of the same opinion. This is a case in which justices have dismissed an information, and we cannot upset that finding of not guilty unless we are satisfied that they misdirected themselves in law. The justices have found that the respondent was serving customers after the closing hour of 1 p.m. and that they were in the shop being served some time before that hour, and they state that in their view the respondent has not been guilty of the offence charged. Their finding, therefore, amounts to an acquittal, and it appears to me impossible to say that they were wrong in failing to convict in those circumstances. I agree that the case has disclosed the possibility of an undesirable state of things which may amount to breaches of the intention of the Act, though not a breach of its letter, and therefore not punishable. But that is a matter for Parliament to deal with. I agree with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

Summons

By s. 163 (3) of the Companies Act, 1929, concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court is given to the county court to wind-up companies of which the capital does not exceed £10,000. The High Court having made an order transferring to the county court the winding-up of Vernon Heaton Co., Ltd., a company with a paid-up share capital exceeding £10,000 the county court judge refused to deal with an application in the winding-up made to him by a creditor, and gave as his reason that he had no jurisdiction to deal with the winding-up of companies the capital of which exceeded £10,000. The creditor thereupon applied to the High Court for the proceedings to be re-transferred to the High Court.

Andrew Clark for the applicant creditor.

J. B. Lindon, for the liquidator.

BENNETT, J.—I decide that the court has jurisdiction to transfer winding-up proceedings from the High Court to any court which has jurisdiction to wind-up companies. This decision is the only possible one in view of the orders that have been made since the Companies Act, 1929, came into force. Re Real Estates Co. (1) is only applicable in a case where the court to which the proceedings are proposed to be transferred has no court to which the winding-up proceedings were ordered to be transferred has jurisdiction to wind-up companies. If the county court judge has said that he is not going to deal with the matter because he has no jurisdiction, the remedy is not to transfer the proceedings back to the High Court, but to apply for a mandamus. I hold that there was jurisdiction under s. 165 to transfer the winding-up proceedings to the county court following, as I have said, numerous orders made by judges of the High Court who since the Act of 1929 came into force have had charge of the company work. The application must, therefore, be refused.

[Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Roche, L.J., and Swift, J.), April 9, May 16, 1935]

Railway—Accommodation works—Fence—Payment to owner, on purchase of land by company, of compensation for fencing—Occupier subsequently becoming owner—Right to compensation for company's failure to maintain fence—Merger—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 68, proviso.

In 1885 the North Cornwall Railway, predecessors of the defendant company, purchased from the owners of R. Farm four acres of its land adjoining the railway for £727 13s. 0d., which, the conveyance stated, was to be the purchase price of the land and also compensation for all fences and things whatsoever by the side of the railway which the vendors might otherwise be entitled to claim. At that time the plaintiff's father was in occupation of the farm as a yearly tenant, and with him the railway company entered into no agreement. Fences were erected by the railway company, and from 1885 until the present action they were maintained by the company. In 1911 the plaintiff's father purchased the farm, and on his death in 1932 it was conveyed to the plaintiff in fee. On Aug. 13, 1934, sheep of the plaintiff, owing to a defective fence, strayed on to the railway, and two were killed. On a claim by the plaintiff against the defendant company for the value of the sheep, Held: the agreement contained in the conveyance of 1885 was effective against the owners of the farm under the proviso to s. 68 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but not at that time against the plaintiff's father; in considering whether there was a merger in law of the occupier's interest when, in 1911, he became the owner of the fee the court would be guided by the occupier's intention, and, in the absence of express intention, would look to the benefit of the plaintiff's father as the person in whom the two estates became vested; there appeared to be no intention on the part of the plaintiff's father to give up any rights hitherto owned by him, and so there was no such merger as to deprive him of his right to have the fences maintained by the defendants; that right became vested in the plaintiff in 1932; and, therefore, he was entitled to recover.

Appeal by the defendant company from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE LIAS in the Launceston County Court of Cornwall.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of the county court judge:

The plaintiff, who is the owner of Ridgegrove Farm, near Launceston, claims £5 from the Southern Railway, the value of two sheep, which strayed through a gap in a fence adjoining the railway and were killed on the defendants' line on Aug. 13, 1934.

On Aug. 14, 1885, about four acres of the land of which Ridgegrove Farm then consisted was purchased from the then owners by the North Cornwall Rail. Co., now the Southern Rail. Co., for £727 13s. 0d. The plaintiff's father was in occupation of the farm as a yearly tenant at the date of the purchase. The conveyance stated that it had been agreed that the purchase money should include a compensation for all fences and that the conveyance was intended to operate and take effect "as a conveyance made as near to the form in Sched. A to the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, as the circumstances will admit, and also in every other mode in which the same may operate or take effect independently." Fences were erected by the railway company and have been maintained by them ever since. On June 24, 1911, Ridgegrove Farm was conveyed to the plaintiff's father by the successors in title of the vendors to the railway company. The only reference to the land conveyed to the railway contained in the conveyance was in the list of contents in the first schedule, which read: "Deduct parts of Numbers 1051, 1047, 1052, 1032 sold to North Cornwall Railway 4 acres and 1 pole." The plaintiff's father died, and on June 24, 1932, his personal representatives conveyed to the plaintiff the land occupied by him, the only reference to the land conveyed to the railway company being the same as in the previous conveyance.

The plaintiff and his father were in occupation of the land for more than seventy years as yearly tenants until June, 1911, and they have been in possession as owners since that date. The plaintiff states, and it is not disputed, that for nearly fifty years neither he nor his father was ever asked or allowed by the railway company to maintain or repair the fences. The invariable practice was for the railway company to maintain them. If the plaintiff or his father found that repair was required they had to report to the railway company's ganger, and he did the repairs. For some unexplained reason for two years before last summer the hedges were not pruned. Last summer [i.e., in 1934] they were pruned rather severely, with the result that gaps were left in the hedges. The plaintiff called the attention of the ganger, whose duty it was to repair the hedges, to their defective state, and warned him that, if his sheep got through, he would hold the railway company responsible. The ganger replied that he knew the hedges were defective, but that he was unable to get the material with which to repair. A few days later, on Aug. 13, 1934, seventeen of the plaintiff's sheep strayed on to the railway through a weak place in a hedge and two were killed. The hedge was repaired next day, and the plaintiff was told that he could re-stock his land. The damages subject to the question of liability are agreed.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, with costs, and the defendant company appealed.

F. W. Beney for the company.
Ernest Hancock for the plaintiff.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16. The following judgments were read.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE LIAS, given on Feb. 20, 1935, at the county court at Launceston, whereby he decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover £5 from the defendants, as the value of two sheep which strayed through a gap in a fence adjoining the railway and were killed on the defendants' line on Aug. 13, 1934.

The defendants deny liability, and the question to be decided is whether the railway company are responsible for the maintenance of the fence in a proper condition to prevent sheep and cattle from being able to enter upon the defendants' land. There is no dispute about the facts. The question is as to the law applicable to them. On Aug. 14, 1885, about four acres of the land of which the farm, Ridgegrove Farm, then consisted, was purchased from the then owners by the North Cornwall Rail. Co. for the sum of £727 13s. At that time the plaintiff's father was in occupation of the farm as a yearly tenant. By the terms of the conveyance it > "is hereby agreed and declared that the said sum of £727 13s. shall be taken not only as the purchase money of the said lands and hereditaments and estates and interests of the said trustees and of the said Thomas Archer Bewes therein free from incumbrances but also in full satisfaction and compensation for all damage, whether permanent or otherwise, loss or inconvenience, occasioned by severing the said pieces of land and hereditaments hereby conveyed from the other lands or property subject to the uses or limitations contained in the said will of the said Thomas Bewes, deceased, or by otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands or property, in the exercise of the powers of the North Cornwall Railway Act, 1882, and the Acts incorporated therewith, and which sum it has also been agreed shall include compensation for the temporary occupation by the company of the lands coloured brown on the said plan drawn at the end of these presents required for the construction of accommodation roads, and for all communication gates bridges culverts ditches drains fences ways passage works and things whatsoever either over under across or by the side of the said railway (save and except such as are hereinafter more particularly specified) which the said trustees or the said Thomas Archer Bewes might otherwise be entitled to claim."

No agreement was entered into with the occupier, the plaintiff's father. The defendants are the successors of the North Cornwall Rail Co.

[His Lordship then stated the facts as they were set out in the judgment of the county court judge.]

It is clear that at common law owners of adjoining closes are not bound to fence, either against or for the benefit of each other; but in the absence of fences each owner is bound to prevent his cattle or other animals from trespassing on his neighbour's premises. That proposition is clearly laid down in Lawrence v. Jenkins (1), in the judgment of the court consisting of COCKBURN, C.J., MELLOR and ARCHIBALD, JJ.

The liability of the railway to fence is statutory, and is imposed by s. 68 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. By s. 6 of that Act the construction of the railway was subject to the provisions of that Act and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and s. 68 provided:

> "The company shall make and at all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway . . . sufficient . . . fences for separating the land taken for the use of the railway from the adjoining lands not taken, and protecting such lands from trespass, or the cattle of the owners or occupiers thereof from straying thereout . . . Provided always, that the company shall not be required . . . to make any accommodation works with respect to which the owners and occupiers of the lands shall have agreed to receive and shall have been paid compensation instead of the making them."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff before this court that the proviso was not operative because the owners and occupiers are to be dealt with conjointly, and that, unless an agreement had been made with both, there was no release which enured to the railway company—the proviso remained inoperative. I cannot accept this construction of the section. The owner's interests and the occupier's interests are several and distinct, and an agreement made with one of them is none the less operative because no agreement has been reached with the other. This construction is, I think, that which was adopted by the Court of Appeal in Corry v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2). In that case an agreement had been made with the owner of the land, but BRAMWELL, L.J., points out (7 Q.B.D. at p. 325):

> "His landlord cannot be taken to have given up any right which the plaintiff had as his tenant, and I think there would be a hardship upon the plaintiff if it were otherwise, because he, the plaintiff, was no party to the agreement by which the landlord gave up the right to fencing."

There is no suggestion there that the agreement being with the landlord only, was ineffective, and that the proviso did not operate as against him. BAGGALLAY, L.J., definitely says the contrary (7 Q.B.D. at pp. 326, 327):

> "An agreement was come to with the owner of the lands which in effect deprived him of the right of insisting upon either the original making or the maintaining of any such fence as this."

There is another point which must be noted in the section. The railway is required to make these sufficient fences for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway, not only for the preservation of the cattle of the owner or occupier from straying from the lands not taken, but also for "protecting (the lands not taken) from trespass by reason of the railway." They are to prevent the railway from becoming a means of access to the adjoining lands not taken. Also I attach no importance to the distinction pointed out that s. 68 in its opening has the words "make" and "maintain," whereas the proviso refers only to making. By the proviso, if operative, the railway are excused from making, and by parity of reasoning from maintaining the fence. The making of the fences by the railway company under s. 68 is to be carried out forthwith if so required and otherwise as conveniently may be. By s. 73 there is a time limit of five years to any requisition for accommodation works, though that does not diminish the duty of a railway company to make and maintain the necessary fences in cases where the proviso is not operative by reason of no agreement having been entered into within its terms: see Dixon v. Great Western Rail. Co. (3).

In the present case, however, there was an agreement made which was effective as against the owners under the proviso, and which, in accordance with the decision in Corry v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2), barred any claim being made by them, but did not bar a claim by the occupying tenant.

The plaintiff rests his claim upon his being, as his father was before him, the occupier and thus in the position that was given effect to in Corry's Case (2). But then comes the question—not an easy one—upon which the defendants rely, namely, whether there was a merger in law of the occupier's interest as tenant from year to year when in 1911 the plaintiff's father became owner of the fee. Thereafter the father was, and his son became, and now is, the freeholder. Have their rights as tenants been lost by this coalescing of the tenancy in the freehold? It is a clear principle that at law a term merges by union with the reversion, and that the right to the estate subject to the term cannot subsist separately in the same person. A

BLACKSTONE (2 COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, p. 177) puts the doctrine thus: B

> "It may be proper to observe that whenever a greater estate and a less coincide and meet in one and the same person—without any intermediate estate, the less is immediately annihilated: or in the law phrase is said to be merged, that is, sunk or drowned in the greater"; and illustrations of the operation of the doctrine may be found in Salmon v. Swann (4) Stephens v. Bridges (5), and Lord Dynevor v. Tennant (6). The learned judge says that he was not convinced upon this point, but it is one upon which the plaintiff's rights in my judgment turn. C

This rule of law as to merger was modified in equity, and both as regards the merger of a less estate in a greater and a merger of a charge on the land the question was held to depend upon the intention, actual or presumed, of the person in whom the interests become united. That doctrine was given effect to by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (4), which is now replaced by s. 185 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which declares: D

> "There is no merger by operation of law only of any estate the beneficial interest in which would not be merged or extinguished in equity."

That the question of merger or no merger depends upon intention, and applies to the case of a merger of a term in the reversion, appears clear from the decision in the Capital and Counties Bank, Ltd. v. Rhodes (7) (see per LORD COLLINS, M.R., [1903] 1 Ch. at p. 648), and in Chambers v. Kingham (8), and also per FARWELL, J., as he then was, in Ingle v. Vaughan Jenkins (9). In the latter case the learned judge definitely says that the court, in considering merger or no merger, is guided by the intention; and, in the absence of express intention, the court looks to the benefit of the person in whom the two estates become vested. E F

Applying these principles to the present case, it appears to me that there was no merger such as to deprive the father of the plaintiff of his right to have the fence maintained and that right still remains in the plaintiff. From 1885 to 1911 the defendants or their predecessors maintained the fence, as they were bound to do "for the accommodation of the occupier" with whom they had come to no agreement of release and also for two other reasons—one the duty, already referred to, to protect the adjoining lands, not taken, from trespass, and the second, the necessity of exercising reasonable care to prevent cattle straying upon their line, in default of which they might be held liable for an injury by accident to one of their passengers if caused by the collision of the train in which he was being carried with a bullock that had strayed on the line, as in Buxton v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (10). G H

The learned judge accepts the evidence that the defendants, in fact, repaired the fence whenever asked so to do and refused to allow the plaintiff, or his father, to repair it, and that this practice or system prevailed as well after as before 1911 and has continued throughout twenty-four years since that date.

Upon these facts it appears to me that the conclusion must be that the plaintiff's father accepted and acted upon the status quo ante, and intended that no change should be made—in other words, that there should be no merger of rights which would certainly have been to his disadvantage and not to his benefit. I

If, then, merger does not prevail to have taken away the plaintiff's rights, he is in the same position as the plaintiff in Corry's Case (2), and the judgment of the county court judge in his favour must be affirmed. In this view of the case it is unnecessary to deal with the other grounds upon which—somewhat tentatively—the learned judge was prepared to base a judgment in favour of the plaintiff. With regard, however, to an assessment, I will say this. The maintenance of the fence may be—indeed, ought

A to be—referred to the fulfilment of the statutory duties imposed on the railway company, and not to any action by a servient owner in favour of the plaintiff as dominant owner. The origin of the maintenance of the fence being thus explained, there is no room for the doctrine that the right or title to have it maintained was gained by prescription.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with B costs.

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

The facts have been so fully and clearly stated by my Lord that it is unnecessary to refer to them in detail. It is sufficient for the purposes of my judgment if I recall the following facts and dates. In or shortly after 1885 the railway was constructed and a C fence was then made and maintained between the railway and the fields which remained part of Ridgegrove Farm. No compensation was agreed to be paid, or was, in fact, paid at that time or at all to Mr. Symons, father of the plaintiff, or to the plaintiffs who were then the occupiers of the farm. This was natural enough, as the railway company had evidently determined to make a fence. The conveyance of the land from the owners of Ridgegrove Farm to the railway company stipulated that the price paid D for the land included compensation for all the matters (other than certain specified matters), including fences, which the owners might otherwise be entitled to claim—that is to say, from the owners of Ridgegrove Farm to the railway company. Accordingly, such owners could not have insisted on the making of a fence, but, as such fence was about to be made and was made, the stipulation had not, at the time, any practical effect on the situation. Thereafter the company always maintained the fence in question, E which was a quickset hedge, and made good any gaps. But in 1934 a gap was not filled up, and in consequence the plaintiff's sheep got on the line and two of them were killed. By that time the plaintiff had become the owner of the farm in succession to his father, who had bought the freehold in 1911, and had died in 1932.

The father and son continued as occupiers after the purchase in 1911 until the father's death, when the plaintiff became sole occupier and soon afterwards owner of the land F by conveyance from his father's executors. It was said for the defendants that, although up to 1911 they were bound to maintain the fence, yet after 1911 there was a merger of estates, and the fact of compensation having been paid to the owners in 1885 was an answer to the plaintiff's claim in this action. The defendants' contention is not, in my opinion, well founded. It is unnecessary to decide what would have been the rights and position of the parties if the merger relied upon was in fact effected. Speaking for G myself, I attach more importance than my Lord to the fact that, even as regards the owners of this land, the language of the present compensation clause, unlike that in Corry v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2), contained no mention of maintenance of fences. I am disposed to think that in this state of facts, although the owners could not have claimed that such a fence as is now in question should be made, yet when it was made and maintained pursuant to s. 68 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, owners as H well as occupiers and the licensees of both of them had a right to complain if they suffered damage by inefficient maintenance of the hedge—see Ricketts v. East and West India Docks (11) and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. v. Wallis (12). But it is not necessary to decide this point. Admittedly the occupiers, as distinct from the owners, had in 1885 and subsequently a right to have the fence maintained, and I agree with the conclusion of my Lord that there was no extinction by merger of such I rights. I agree also with the reasons which my Lord has assigned for that conclusion. All the evidence seems to be opposed to a conclusion that there was at any time an intention to give up (or merge in the greater estate) any rights or advantages acquired by the occupiers. In addition to the matters of evidence referred to in this connection by my Lord, it is to be observed that in 1911 and before the occupiers of the land were the plaintiff's father and the plaintiff, whereas the conveyance of the fee simple in 1911 was to the plaintiff's father alone. It was not until 1932 that the plaintiff, who was by that time sole occupier by reason of his father's death, became the owner of the fee simple.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

SWIFT, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Special resolution—"Twenty-one days' notice"—Computation—Companies Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 117 (2).

By s. 117 (2) of the Companies Act, 1929: "not less than twenty-one days' notice" is required to be given specifying the intention to propose a resolution as a special resolution at a general meeting of a company.

Held: (i) that the phrase "not less than twenty-one days" in the subsection means not less than twenty-one clear days exclusive of the day of service of the notice and exclusive of the day on which the meeting is held; (ii) a company cannot validly by its articles of association curtail the length of time which Parliament has said must elapse between the date on which the notice is served and the date on which the meeting is held.

Notes. The Companies Act, 1929, was repealed by the Companies Act, 1948. Section 117 (2) of the 1929 Act is reproduced in s. 141 (2) of the Act of 1948. Reduction of share capital is dealt with in the Act of 1948 in s. 66 et seq.

As to reduction of capital see 6 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn.) 154 et seq., and as to resolutions see ibid. 345 et seq., and for cases see 9 Digest (Repl.) 149 et seq. and 618, 619. For Companies Act, 1948 see 3 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 452.

Petition for confirmation of reduction of capital of a company.

At the hearing of the petition a question arose whether the provisions of s. 117 (2) of the Companies Act, 1929, had been complied with. S. 117 of the Companies Act, 1929, provided as follows:

> "1. A resolution shall be an extraordinary resolution when it has been passed by a majority of not less than three-fourths of such members as, being entitled so to do, vote in person or, where proxies are allowed, by proxy, at a general meeting of which notice specifying the intention to propose the resolution as an extraordinary resolution has been duly given. (2) A resolution shall be a special resolution when it has been passed by such a majority as is required for the passing of an extraordinary resolution and at a general meeting of which not less than twenty-one days' notice, specifying the intention to propose the resolution as a special resolution, has been duly given. . . . (6) For the purposes of this section, notice of a meeting shall be deemed to be duly given and the meeting to be duly

A held when the notice is given and the meeting held in manner provided by this Act or the articles."

The relevant articles of association were as follows:

"133. A notice or other document may be served by the company upon any member either personally or by sending it through the post in a prepaid letter B addressed to such member at his registered address.

"138. Any notice or other document if served by post shall be deemed to have been served on the day following that on which the letter containing the same is put into the post, and in proving such service it shall be sufficient to prove that the letter containing the notice or document was properly addressed and put into the post office as a prepaid letter or prepaid registered letter as the case may be.

C "139. Where a given number of days' notice or notice extending over any other period is required to be given, the day of service shall be counted in such number of days or other period."

The notice convening the extraordinary general meeting was dated May 8, 1935, and the meeting at which the resolution was passed was by the notice convened for May 30, 1935. The notice was thus, under the articles, deemed to have been served on May 9, D 1935.

Lionel Cohen, K.C., and T. D. D. Divine for the company.

BENNETT, J.—The first point to be decided is what is meant by the phrase "not less than twenty-one days' notice," contained in s. 117 (2) of the Companies Act, 1929. In the interests of everybody it is of importance that there should be no doubt as to E the meaning of a phrase in a section of almost daily use. I do not think there is any doubt about its meaning, and I propose to found my decision on R. v. Turner (1) and Chambers v. Smith (2) and to decide that the phrase means twenty-one clear days exclusive of the day of service and exclusive of the day on which the meeting is to be held.

The question then arises whether the effect of s. 117 (6) is to enable the company to F say that the statutory requirement of sub-s. (2) that there was to be twenty-one clear days' notice has been cut down by the provisions of art. 139. In my judgment, that article has nothing to do with the service of the notice and nothing to do with the manner in which the notice is given. It is concerned entirely with the way in which time is to be measured, and I can see no ground on which I can properly decide that a company can by its articles of association curtail the length of time which Parliament G has said must elapse between the date on which the notice is served and the date on which the meeting is held. Sub-s. (6) is concerned solely with the method of giving notice. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that art. 139 is irrelevant for the purpose of the question which I have to decide.

In my view, the petitioning company has failed to prove that the special resolution was properly passed. I will, therefore, adjourn the further hearing of the petition to H enable the company to call a fresh meeting.

WILLIAM DENBY & SON, LTD. v. MINISTER OF HEALTH

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Swift, J.), December 16, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 337; 105 L.J.K.B. 134; 154 L.T. 180; 100 J.P. 107; 80 Sol. Jo. 33; 34 L.G.R. 61, D.C.]

Housing—Clearance Order—Public local inquiry—Right of objectors to see report of inspector. B

Constitutional Law—Minister of Crown—Administration of statute—Duty to act according to dictates of justice.

A person objecting to the confirmation of a clearance order made under s. 1 of the Housing Act, 1930, is not entitled to see the report made to the Minister of Health by the inspector who has conducted a public local inquiry pursuant to Sched. I., para. 4, to that Act. C

Per Curiam: A Minister or other officer of State who has to administer an Act of Parliament is not a judicial officer. He is an administrative officer carrying out the duties of an administrative office and administering the provisions of particular Acts of Parliament. From time to time in the course of his administrative duties he has to perform acts which require him to interfere with the rights and property of individuals, and in doing that he must act fairly and reasonably, not capriciously, but in accordance with the ordinary dictates of justice. He does not occupy the position of judge. The inspector who holds a public local inquiry under the Housing Acts is an administrative officer helping in the administration of the Acts, but he comes more nearly to the position of a judicial functionary, or as nearly to that position as the Minister himself does. In the discharge of his duties he must be bound by the dictates of natural justice, and his inquiry must be fair to all parties interested. He must hear everything which any of them desires to say, and should not hear anything without giving an opportunity to the other parties interested to answer that which has been said. D E

Notes. Schedule I to the Housing Act, 1930, was repealed by the Housing Act, 1936, and the provisions of para. 4 are reproduced in para. 5 of Sched. III to the Act of 1936. The Minister concerned is now the Minister of Housing and Local Government. F

As to clearance orders, see 26 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 536 et seq., and for Housing Act, 1936, see 11 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 444.

Application under s. 11 of the Housing Act, 1930.

The applicants, William Denby & Son, Ltd., sought an order of the court to quash two clearance orders made by the respondents, Baildon Urban District Council, on June 12, 1934, and confirmed by the Minister of Health on Aug. 25, 1934, in which orders certain houses belonging to the applicants were scheduled for demolition. The applicants complained that the Minister had refused to disclose to them the contents

A of the report made by the inspector who had conducted the public local inquiry held pursuant to para. 4 of Sched. I, to the Act, and contended that the Minister, as a quasi-judicial officer, was bound to disclose to the parties interested any information in his possession bearing on the matters in issue.

The Housing Act, 1930, provides (by s. 1 (1)) that a local authority may pass a resolution declaring an area to be a clearance area, and (by s. 1 (3)), that thereupon the B local authority may make, and the Minister of Health may confirm, a clearance order in respect of that area. By Sched. I, para. 4:

> "If no objection is duly made by any of the persons upon whom notices are required to be served, or if all objections so made are withdrawn, the Minister may, if he thinks fit, confirm the order with or without modification; but in any other C case he shall, before confirming the order, cause a public local inquiry to be held and shall consider any objection not withdrawn and the report of the person who held the inquiry, and may then confirm the order, either with or without modification. . . ."

SWIFT, J.—On June 12, 1934, the urban district council of Baildon made two clearance orders under Part I of the Housing Act, 1930. Messrs. William Denby and Sons, Ltd., were owners of properties affected by such orders, and they duly caused notice of objection against the inclusion of their properties in the orders to be lodged E with the Minister of Health. On July 17, 1934, the Minister, in pursuance of para. 4 of Sched. I to the Act, caused a public local inquiry to be held by Mr. J. S. Todd. The company were represented at that inquiry by a solicitor and evidence was given on the one hand by the local authority in support of the confirmation of the clearance orders, and on the other hand on behalf of the company in support of their objection and in opposition to the confirmation of the clearance orders. A note of the evidence given F at such inquiry was taken by Mr. Todd, and after the close of the hearing of the evidence he visited and inspected all the properties included in the clearance orders. On Oct. 5, 1934, the Minister confirmed the clearance orders, only excluding therefrom a portion of the properties belonging to the company. The company applied to this court under s. 11 (3) of the Act of 1930, desiring to question the validity of those orders on the ground that they are not within the powers of the Act, or that some requirement of the G Act has not been complied with, the contention being that the confirming orders were made by the Minister without giving the company an opportunity of seeing the report made to the Minister by Mr. Todd, the person who held the public local inquiry. On their behalf it is alleged that as the Minister confirmed the clearance orders with the exceptions mentioned the company fears that the report contained adverse statements regarding the company's property, which adverse statements (if any) the company has H had no opportunity of contradicting or offering observations upon to the Minister. This application raises quite neatly the sole point whether a person whose property is affected by a clearance order made under the Housing Act, 1930, is entitled to see the report made to the Minister by the person whom he causes to hold a public local inquiry as required by Sched. I, para. 4, to the Act.

On behalf of the applicant, it is said that the Minister is a person exercising quasi- I judicial duties; that he has to decide as between the local authority and the property owners whether a clearance order shall be confirmed or not; that it is, therefore, his duty to hear both sides and not to receive anything behind the back of one side without giving him an opportunity of explaining or controverting such evidence; and that, if he receives a report from someone whom he has appointed to inquire, he must let the parties know what such report is before he acts upon it, so as to give them an opportunity of making such answer as they may desire. The applicants rely upon Errington v. Minister of Health (1) for the proposition that the Minister is a quasi-judicial officer bound by the rules ordinarily applicable to such an officer and that those compel him not to receive any information or to entertain any matter which is not open to all the parties to the dispute which he has to determine.

There is no doubt, as held by the Court of Appeal in that case and admitted before me in argument in the present matter, that once notice of objection has been given to a clearance order the Minister must be regarded as a person exercising quasi-judicial functions, and he is bound by the rules of conduct applicable to such a person as laid down in Board of Education v. Rice (2). In that case, Lord Loreburn, speaking of departments and officers of State invested with duties and powers of deciding questions involving the interests of citizens of the State, said ([1911] A.C. at p. 182):

> "Comparatively recent statutes have extended, if they have not originated, the practice of imposing upon departments or officers of State the duty of deciding or determining questions of various kinds. In the present instance, as in many others, what comes for determination is sometimes a matter to be settled by discretion, involving no law. It will, I suppose, usually be of an administrative kind; but sometimes it will involve matter of law as well as matter of fact, or even depend upon matter of law alone. In such cases the Board of Education will have to ascertain the law and also to ascertain the facts"

—the Government department which was involved in that case was the Board of Education.

> "I need not add that in doing either they must act in good faith and fairly listen to both sides, for that is a duty lying upon everyone who decides anything. But I do not think they are bound to treat such a question as though it were a trial. They have no power to administer an oath, and need not examine witnesses. They can obtain information in any way they think best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who are parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to their view."

I do not think, however, that this disposes of the matter. I do not think it is right to say that the Minister of Health or any other officer of the State who has to administer an Act of Parliament is a judicial officer. He is an administrative officer carrying out the duties of an administrative office and administering the provisions of particular Acts of Parliament. From time to time in the course of administrative duties he has to perform acts which require him to interfere with the rights and property of individuals, and in doing that the courts have said that he must act fairly and reasonably, not capriciously, but in accordance with the ordinary dictates of justice. The performance of those duties entails the exercise of the Minister's discretion, and I think that what was said by Lord Halsbury in Sharpe v. Wakefield (3) is important to consider with reference to the exercise of such discretion. He there said ([1891] A.C. at p. 179):

> "'Discretion' means when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities that that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion: Rooke's Case (4), according to law and not humour. It is to be, not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular. And it must be exercised within the limit, to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself."

In order to describe the qualities which a Minister must exercise in carrying out such part of his administrative duties the courts have referred to them as "quasi-judicial." Although this is a convenient term for describing the principles by which he must be guided in performing certain of his duties, I do not think that it means that he at any time occupies the position of a judge, and what is true of him is, I think, equally true of persons whom he is empowered to obtain assistance from in the discharge of his duties. The Act by Sched. I, para. 4, says that he shall cause an inquiry to be held, and that he shall consider, among other things, the report of the person who held the inquiry, and shall then confirm or refuse the order.

It was argued before me that the person who held the inquiry was not a judicial functionary, but was merely a collector of information, which information the parties were entitled to see and to comment upon before the Minister made his decision. In support of this contention my attention was called to Re Grosvenor and West End Terminus Hotel Co., Ltd. (5) and to the observations of Hamilton, L.J., in R. v. Local Government Board, Ex parte Arlidge (6), where he says in his judgment ([1914] 1 K.B. at p. 194):

> "As the inspector does not perform any judicial function in reporting, the privilege which he could claim for his statements, if sued for libel, would be a qualified privilege only and not absolute."

I do not think that this is the right view to take of the position of the person who holds the inquiry. He is, in my opinion, an administrative officer helping in the administration of the Act, but he comes more nearly to the position of a judicial functionary, or as nearly to that position as the Minister himself does. It seems to me obvious that he, in the discharge of his duties, must be bound by the dictates of natural justice. His inquiry must be one which is fair to all parties interested. He must hear everything which any of them desires to say and should not hear anything without giving an opportunity to the other parties interested to answer that which is said; he should not receive anything from one behind the back of the other. And although he is not bound in any sense by the rules of evidence and procedure which apply to an ordinary court of law, he must, before making his report, comply with the ordinary dictates of natural justice as to the obtaining and consideration of the matters which go to form the opinions or conclusions which he expresses in his report. I have recently dealt with the position of the person holding such a public local inquiry in Marriott v. Minister of Health (7). I do not need to add anything to the views which I therein expressed, and unless and until those views are modified or corrected by some higher tribunal they express my opinion as to the position of such a person.

This being as I conceive it to be the position of the two officers, the Minister of Health and the person appointed by him to hold the public local inquiry, the question arises whether the parties are entitled to see the report which the latter makes to the former as the result of his inquiry. I should have thought that the matter was conclusively decided by the case of Local Government Board v. Arlidge (6), were it not for a distinction which is sought to be drawn on behalf of the applicants between the facts relating to the position of the Local Government Board in that case, and the Minister of Health in the present case. That case was decided upon s. 17 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, which gave to the owner of the dwelling-house dealt with under a closing order made under that Act a right of appeal to the Local Government Board. By s. 39 (1) of the Act, it was provided that the procedure on any such appeal should be such as the Local Government Board might by rules determine, provided that (s. 39 (1) (b)) the rules should provide that the board should not dismiss any appeal without having first held a public local inquiry. It was held in that case that an appellant to the Local Government Board was not entitled as of right as a condition precedent to the dismissal of his appeal either to be heard orally before the deciding officer or to see the report made by the Board's inspector upon the public local inquiry. By s. 39 (1) (b), the duty was placed upon the Board to hold the public local inquiry, and the House of Lords held that in holding such an inquiry the Board was an administrative officer to whom the decision of a question in dispute had been entrusted. Lord Haldane said in that case ([1915] A.C. at p. 132):

> "My Lords, it is obvious that the Act of 1909 introduced a change of policy. The jurisdiction, both as regards original applications and as regards appeals, was in England transferred from courts of justice to the local authority and the Local Government Board, both of them administrative bodies, and it is necessary to consider what consequences this change of policy imported. My Lords, when the duty of deciding an appeal is imposed, those whose duty it is to decide it must act judicially. They must deal with the question referred to them without bias, and they must give to each of the parties the opportunity of adequately presenting the case made. The decision must be come to in the spirit and with the sense of responsibility of a tribunal whose duty it is to mete out justice. But it does not follow that the procedure of every such tribunal must be the same. In the case of > a court of law tradition in this country has prescribed certain principles to which in the main the procedure must conform. But what that procedure is to be in detail must depend on the nature of the tribunal. In modern times it has become increasingly common for Parliament to give an appeal in matters which really pertain to administration, rather than to the exercise of the judicial functions of an ordinary court, to authorities whose functions are administrative and not in the ordinary sense judicial. Such a body as the Local Government Board has the duty of enforcing obligations on the individual which are imposed in the interests of the community. Its character is that of an organisation with executive functions. In this it resembles other great departments of the State. When, therefore, Parliament entrusts it with judicial duties, Parliament must be taken, in the absence of any declaration to the contrary, to have intended it to follow the procedure which is its own, and is necessary if it is to be capable of doing its work efficiently. I agree with the view expressed in an analogous case by my noble and learned friend Lord Loreburn. In Board of Education v. Rice (2), he laid down that, in disposing of a question which was the subject of an appeal to it, the Board of Education was under a duty to act in good faith, and to listen fairly to both sides, inasmuch as that was a duty which lay on everyone who decided anything. But he went on to say that he did not think it was bound to treat such a question as though it were a trial. The Board had no power to administer an oath, and need not examine witnesses. It could, he thought, obtain information in any way it thought best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who were parties in the controversy to correct or contradict any relevant statement prejudicial to their view. If the Board failed in this duty, its order might be the subject of certiorari, and it must itself be the subject of mandamus."

Although the statute imposes on the Local Government Board the duty of determining the appeal, it was recognised that the ordinary procedure of the Board necessitated the actual holding of an inquiry before some individual and Lord Haldane went on to say ([1915] A.C. at p. 133):

> "My Lords, I concur in this view of the position of an administrative body to which the decision of a question in dispute between the parties has been entrusted. The result of its inquiry must, as I have said, be taken, in the absence of directions in the statute to the contrary, to be intended to be reached by its ordinary procedure. In the case of the Local Government Board it is not doubtful what this procedure is. The Minister at the head of the Board is directly responsible to Parliament like other Ministers. He is responsible not only for what he himself does but for all that is done in his Department. The volume of work entrusted to him is very great and he cannot do the great bulk of it himself. He is expected to obtain his materials vicariously through his officials, and he has discharged his duty if he sees that they obtain these materials for him properly. To try to extend his duty beyond this and to insist that he and other members of the Board should do everything personally would be to impair his efficiency. Unlike a judge in a court he is not only at liberty, but he is compelled to rely on the assistance of his staff. When, therefore, the Board is directed to dispose of an appeal, that does not mean that any particular official of the Board is to dispose of it. This point is not, in my opinion, touched by s. 5 of 33 & 34 Vict., c. 70, the Act constituting the Local Government Board to which I have already referred. Provided the work is done judicially and fairly in the sense indicated by Lord Loreburn, the only authority that can review what has been done is the Parliament to which the Minister in charge is responsible. The practice of the Department in the present case was, I think, sufficiently shown by Sir Horace Monro's affidavit to have been followed. In accordance with that practice the Board, in order to obtain materials with which to decide, appointed one of its health inspectors to hold a public inquiry. This was in accordance with the rules it had made under the section of the statute which I have quoted and with its usual practice. It is said that the report of the inspector should have been disclosed. It might or might not have been useful to disclose this

> A report, but I do not think that the Board was bound to do so, any more than it would have been bound to disclose all the minutes made on the papers in the office before a decision was come to. It is plain from Sir Horace Monro's affidavit that the order made was the order of the Board, and so long as the Board followed a procedure which was usual, and not calculated to violate the tests to which I have already referred, I think that the Board was discharging the duty imposed on it in B the fashion Parliament must be taken to have contemplated when it deliberately transferred the jurisdiction, first, from a court of summary jurisdiction to the local authority, and then, for the purposes of all appeals, from quarter sessions to an administrative department of the State."

Under the statute which I am now considering the burden is not put upon the Minister C of Health of himself holding the inquiry. His obligation is to "cause a public local inquiry to be held" (Sched. I, para. 4, of the Act of 1930) and to consider the report made to him as the result of such inquiry. It is contended that the legislature meant to draw a distinction between the position of the Local Government Board under the Act of 1909 and the Minister of Health under the Act of 1930 and a distinction so marked that the report passing from an inspector under the earlier Act differs from the D report made to the Minister of Health under the later Act. I do not think that any such distinction can properly be drawn. It seems to me that in altering the phraseology the legislature meant to make clear that, as was said in Arlidge's Case (6), the Minister was not bound to hold the public local inquiry himself, but I do not think that they have used language which implies that there should be any alteration in the nature of the report made upon such an inquiry. The Minister, like the Local Government Board, E is an administrative officer who has imposed on him the duty of deciding whether an order of the local authority shall or shall not be effective. In deciding this matter, the Minister of Health, like the Local Government Board, must act in accordance with the dictates of natural justice which have been laid down by the courts. If, either by the necessities of their office or the instructions of the statute creating and empowering them, some of their duties have to be carried out by other persons, those other persons F are bound by the like considerations, but I do not think that there is anything in the changed phraseology of the Acts creating these two different authorities which either obliges or entitles me to hold that whilst the report made by one subordinate to his principal is not subject to disclosure, the other is.

I think it was as true to say in 1930 as it was to say in 1915 and as was said by LORD SHAW in Arlidge's Case ([1915] A.C. at p. 136):

> G "My Lords, how can the judiciary be blind to the well-known facts applicable not only to the constitution but to the working of such branches of the executive. The Department is represented in Parliament by its responsible head. On the one hand, he manages its affairs with such assistance as the Treasury sanctions, and on the other he becomes answerable in Parliament for every Departmental act. His board—that is, all the members of it together—may never meet, or they may only H be convened on some question of policy; but a determination, signed and sealed and issued in correct form, stands as the deliverance of the Board as such, for which determination the president becomes answerable to Parliament. This is the general rule, acknowledged and familiar, of departmental action and responsibility. With regard to the making of this rule, however, and on the assumption that the grotesque demand to individualise the Department for private purposes is put on I one side, the next proposition is this, that when a public local inquiry has been held in compliance with statute, the person whose interests are affected is entitled to something more, namely, a disclosure of the views of the inspector written out by him, in jottings or otherwise, for the guidance or consideration of the Department in dealing with the case. My Lords, it is here (and the matter is not a strictly legal one) that I venture to hold an opinion somewhat different from that of LORD SUMNER. I incline to hold that the disadvantage in very many cases would exceed the advantage of such disclosure. And I feel certain that if it were laid down in courts of law that such disclosure could be compelled, a serious impediment might > be placed upon that frankness which ought to obtain among a staff accustomed to elaborately detailed and often most delicate and difficult tasks. The very same argument would lead to the disclosure of the whole file. It may contain, and frequently does contain, the views of inspectors, secretaries, assistants, and consultants of various degrees of experience, many of whose opinions may differ but all of which form the material for the ultimate decision. To set up any rule that that decision must on demand, and as matter of right, be accompanied by a disclosure of what went before, so that it may be weakened or strengthened or judged thereby, would be inconsistent, as I say, with efficiency, with practice, and with the true theory of complete parliamentary responsibility for departmental action. This is, in my opinion, implied as the legitimate and proper consequence of any department being vested by statute with authority to make determinations."

LORD MOULTON said ([1915] A.C. at p. 150):

> "In the present case, however, the legislature has provided an appeal, but it is an appeal to an administrative department of State and not to a judicial body. It is said truthfully, that on such an appeal the Local Government Board must act judicially, but this, in my opinion, only means that it must preserve a judicial temper and perform its duties conscientiously, with a proper feeling of responsibility, in view of the fact that its acts affect the property and rights of individuals. Parliament has wisely laid down certain rules to be observed in the performance of its functions in these matters, and those rules must be observed because they are imposed by statute, and for no other reason, and whether they give much or little opportunity for what I may call quasi-litigious procedure depends solely on what Parliament has thought right. These rules are beyond the criticism of the courts, and it is not their business to add to or take away from them, or even to discuss whether in the opinion of the individual members of the court they are adequate or not. In the present case they appear to me to be abundantly sufficient to secure that the Local Government Board shall be fully seised of the facts of the case in which it is called in, and that it can and will get all necessary guidance as to the law. But even if my opinion were the reverse it would only indicate that I disapproved of the legislation. It could not give rise to any question as to the statutory procedure conforming or not conforming to any notions of my own as to 'natural justice.' I shall not, therefore, deal specifically with any of the points on which the majority of the Court of Appeal have criticised the procedure of the Local Government Board on abstract grounds, but there is one point which needs notice, namely, the claim that the respondent was entitled as of right to see the report of the inspector who held the public inquiry. No such right is given by statute or by an established custom of the Department. Like every administrative body, the Local Government Board must derive its knowledge from its agents, and I am unable to see any reason why the reports which they make to the Department should be made public. It would, in my opinion, cripple the usefulness of these inquiries. It is not for me to express my opinion of the desirability of an administrative department taking any particular course in such matters, but I entirely dissociate myself from the remarks which have been made in this case in favour of a department making reports of this kind public. Such a practice would, in my opinion, be decidedly mischievous."

Taking, therefore, the view as I do that both the Minister of Health and the person whom he causes to hold the inquiry are persons who in arriving at their decision must act judicially in the sense I have mentioned above, I see no reason for holding that such a report is liable to disclosure; on the contrary, I am of opinion that it is not. This being the only point to be determined in this appeal, I am of opinion that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

PAPADOPOULOS v. PAPADOPOULOS

[Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Sir Boyd Merriman, P.), December 19, 1935]

Divorce—Judicial separation—Desertion—Separation after marriage declared void by foreign court on agreement of parties—Order of foreign court held to be illegal in England.

The parties were married in London in 1912. In 1913 the husband, a Cypriot domiciled in Cyprus, left the wife and went to Cyprus. In 1914 the wife sued him in the District Court of Nicosia, Cyprus, for a declaration of validity of the marriage and for maintenance. On May 19, 1914, by consent of the parties the court decreed that the marriage was void, as being contrary to the law of the domicil regarding the essential conditions of marriage, and that the husband should pay the wife £380 in settlement of her claims. In 1929, when the husband was resident in London, the wife obtained from a metropolitan magistrate a maintenance order for £2 a week. The husband appealed on the ground that there had been no marriage, and the Divisional Court held ([1930] P. 55) that the Nicosia court had no jurisdiction to annul the marriage and that the agreement that it should be set aside was unlawful. In answer to a petition by the wife for a decree of judicial separation on the ground of the husband's desertion it was submitted on the husband's behalf that, though the agreement embodied in the Nicosian decree had been declared void, there was, nevertheless, an actual agreement to separate in 1914 for a consideration, that it had been acted upon until 1929, and that, therefore, desertion must be negatived.

Held: the separation of the parties between 1914 and 1929 being due to an agreement which had been held to be illegal according to English law, the husband had been in desertion without cause for two years or more, and the wife was entitled to a decree.

Notes. Section 185 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, was repealed by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, and re-enacted by s. 14 of that Act.

Petition by the wife for a decree of judicial separation.

By her petition dated Oct. 27, 1934, the wife prayed for a decree of judicial separation, on the ground of desertion for not less than two years. By his answer the husband denied desertion and said that the wife and himself entered into an agreement on May 19, 1914, to live separate and apart. The wife, by her reply, denied that there was such an agreement, and said, in the alternative, that the agreement relied on was A obtained by fraud or on the misrepresentation by the husband or his agents that the marriage had been a nullity, and that that agreement had been declared null and void by a Divisional Court of the Probate Division in November, 1929: Papadopoulos v.

Papadopoulos (1). In the judgment of the Divisional Court it was stated that the husband, a Cypriot domiciled in Cyprus, while a medical student, was married to the wife in London in 1912. He was a member of the Greek Orthodox Church, and she B was a Frenchwoman. After obtaining his medical diplomas he left for Cyprus late in 1913. The wife followed him there in 1914, and sued him in the District Court of Nicosia for a declaration of validity of the marriage and for maintenance, and, in the event of the marriage being declared invalid, claimed certain moneys. By consent of the parties the District Court of Nicosia, on May 19, 1914, made a decree declaring the marriage void as contrary to the law of the domicil of both parties regarding the essential conditions of marriage, and that the husband should pay the wife £380 in full satisfaction C of all claims against him.

The wife received the money and went back to France. Meanwhile, the husband had returned to England, and in 1929, when he was practising in London, the wife summoned him at Bow Street Police Court for maintenance. The magistrate made an order against the husband for £2 a week. He appealed to the Divisional Court, which, D in dismissing the appeal, held that the marriage in London in 1912 was valid, that the agreement to set the marriage aside was unlawful and could not be set up in an English court, and that the District Court of Nicosia had no jurisdiction to annul the marriage.

Under s. 185 of the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, a petition for judicial separation may be presented on various grounds, including desertion without cause for not less than two years. E

Noel Middleton for the husband.

Maurice Healy, K.C., and Julian Fuller for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN read the following judgment. This is a wife's petition for a judicial separation on the ground of desertion for two years or upwards. F
The matrimonial history of the parties has already been the subject of investigation by a Divisional Court of this Division, on an appeal from a metropolitan magistrate (Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos (1)). It was then decided that, notwithstanding an order made by consent in the District Court of Nicosia, in Cyprus, on May 19, 1914, declaring the marriage void, the spouses were husband and wife in English law, and that the magistrate had rightly made an order for maintenance at the rate of 40s. a G week on the basis that the husband had wilfully neglected to maintain his wife. The facts stated in that report must be taken as incorporated in this judgment, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to re-state them at length. Issues are raised by the pleadings, however, which were not dealt with on the former occasion, and I will state my findings of fact with regard to these.

Both parties have given evidence before me. The events of which they were speaking H occurred over twenty years ago. The wife had a very imperfect mastery of the English language and gave her evidence partly in English and partly in French through an interpreter. The parties were in violent conflict as to the circumstances of their marriage at an English register office on Nov. 27, 1912, and as to the facts leading up to the decree of the court in Cyprus in 1914. The husband asserted that the ceremony at the register office had never been intended by either party to be a marriage at all, but was I merely a form, known by both parties to be invalid and ineffectual, in order to provide the wife, from whom he was about to part for ever by mutual consent, with some documentary evidence to enable her to satisfy her mother that she had not been leading an immoral life. He asserted, consequently, that her following him to Cyprus, in order to assert her rights as a wife in that country, was an act of blackmail. He pleaded the agreement of May 19, 1914, being the consent order of the District Court of Nicosia of that date, as a valid and subsisting agreement for separation. The wife, on the other hand, while admitting that she had made inquiries at the French consulate with regard to the essentials for a marriage in Cyprus, asserted that the English marriage was intended to be a reality, and that, so far from there being any agreement to part, it was always understood that she should follow her husband to Cyprus so soon as he was in a position to receive her there. She pleaded, and asserted in the witness-box, that her consent to the order in the District Court of Nicosia was obtained from her by fraud.

For the reasons which I have given it is impossible to be certain that one can rely implicitly on the details of the evidence relating to matters which happened so long ago, but I feel able to come to a definite conclusion as to the truth of the matter, speaking generally, with regard to these issues. I find that both spouses intended, on Nov. 27, 1912, to go through a ceremony of marriage which they knew was binding in England, and I reject the suggestion that the whole proceeding was intended to be a mere sham. I find that when the husband returned to Cyprus he already intended to desert his wife, and that the letters written by him and on his behalf were intended to prevent her from rejoining him. I am satisfied that he took advantage of what is stated to be the Cypriot law to give effect to his purpose of leaving his wife. It is clear, however, that at the time when the Nicosian court made the order desertion had not lasted for the statutory period of two years.

With regard to the consent order, I find that both spouses, acting on the assumption that the husband was then domiciled in Cyprus, believed that the proceedings in the District Court of Nicosia were valid. I cannot accept the contention that the wife, advised as she was by the King's Advocate in Cyprus, was the victim of fraudulent misrepresentation. It is worth noting that, when the validity of these proceedings was the subject of the earlier litigation, there is no trace in the report of this contention, and I think it is too late to raise it now. Nor is it possible, as I was at one time inclined to think, to consider her consent to that order as having been based on a mistake of fact common to both parties. It was stated in the report of the case in the Divisional Court that it was common ground that the marriage was invalid according to the law of the Cypriot domicil of the husband, for the reasons given. The Cypriot law on the subject would, of course, be a question of fact in an English court, but as to this there was no mutual mistake. The mistake was with regard to the effect of the Cypriot law on the English marriage, but this was a mistake with regard to the law of England.

The result, therefore, in my opinion, is that in 1914 the spouses parted as a result of an agreement which, however unwilling the wife was to enter into it, both believed was validated by the order of the District Court. But it has already been decided that this agreement was illegal, as well as immoral, and cannot be set up by either of the parties in an English court (per LORD MERRIVALE, P., [1930] P. at p. 67).

I also find that from 1929, when she became aware of her rights in English law, the wife became determined to assert her position as a wife. Indeed, it is impossible to hold otherwise, as the proceedings which she took successfully in the English courts were the exact negation of the consent order in the Nicosian court. But I find that, so soon as the order in her favour had been upheld in the Divisional Court, the husband returned to Cyprus with the definite object, among others, of avoiding the demands of the wife. Indeed, she was obliged to pursue him to Cyprus to obtain the fruits of her order. Effect was given by the Cypriot Court, though I was not informed of the precise details, to the maintenance order, and I understand that the husband has paid regularly under the order. But it was not until 1934, when the husband returned to this country and set up in practice here, that the wife was in a position to begin proceedings for judicial separation. Her petition was filed on Oct. 27, 1934. I need only add that there has been no resumption of cohabitation in any sense of the word since the former proceedings. On the contrary, the husband, in May, 1919, "married" another woman in accordance with Cypriot law. He has had a family by her, he is still living with her, and intends to continue to do so.

On these facts counsel for the husband submitted, first, that there was no desertion at all. I have already found against him as regards the period before the order in the court of Nicosia. But on this assumption he submitted, in the alternative, that I could not, as a matter of law, find that there had been desertion for two years, seeing that nothing like that period had elapsed before that order and the consequent separation of the spouses. He founded his argument on the well-known passage in the judgment of Lord Penzance in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (2) (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 698). He laid particular stress on the two sentences which read as follows:

> "No one can 'desert' who does not actively and wilfully bring to an end an existing state of cohabitation. . . . But if the state of cohabitation has already ceased to exist, whether by the adverse act of husband or wife, or even by the mutual consent of both, 'desertion,' in my judgment, becomes from that moment impossible to either, at least until their common life and home have been resumed."

He argued that the only remedy of the wife lay in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, though he also maintained that the husband would have a complete answer to such a suit.

The passage in Lord Penzance's judgment in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (2) and the corresponding decision in R. v. Leresche (3) have many times been discussed and considered. In both cases the point was that cohabitation had ceased with the full consent of the wife. In R. v. Leresche (3) there was a separation deed. In Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (2) the wife was deliberately refusing to live with the husband under what proved to be the mistaken assertion that he was living in adultery with another woman. It has been pointed out that the passage referred to in Lord Penzance's judgment, while completely accurate in the circumstances of that case, cannot be regarded as an exhaustive test of the meaning of desertion in all circumstances: see, for example, Bradshaw v. Bradshaw (4) ([1897] P. at p. 26) per Sir Francis Jeune, P.; Pulford v. Pulford (5) ([1923] P. at p. 20), per Lord Merrivale; and Huxtable v. Huxtable (6) (68 L.J.P. at p. 85). I have considered a great many of the decisions on this question. It is admitted that none of them are exactly in point. Indeed, the circumstances are wholly exceptional.

I think that the case most in point is Pulford v. Pulford (5). It is true that in that case the physical separation of the spouses began with the wife's removal to an asylum, and, therefore, was not consensual on her part. But she had been finally discharged from the asylum twenty years before proceedings which were the subject of the appeal to the Divisional Court, and for the last seventeen of those years there had been no communication of any sort between the spouses. Meanwhile, during her detention in the asylum, the husband had begun, and continued, an adulterous association with another woman. In those circumstances the wife, in 1922, took out, first, a summons for neglect to maintain, which at that time it was necessary to prove had caused her to live apart from him. No order was made on that summons, but it was succeeded immediately by a summons for desertion, on which the justices found the husband guilty, as from the date of the former hearing. Their decision was upheld by the Divisional Court, Lord Merrivale holding ([1923] P. at p. 22) that the effect of the husband's conduct, and of his adultery, was that the wife might complain of desertion during the whole period because there had been a complete renunciation by him of every conjugal duty.

In the present case I doubt whether the husband's original desertion has ever been interrupted, having regard to the fact that the separation during the period between 1914 and 1929 was due to an agreement which has been held to be invalid and illegal according to English law. However that may be, the wife re-asserted her rights in 1929. The husband has shown in the plainest possible way, and has asserted in the witness-box, that, except in so far as he is obliged to comply with the maintenance order, he does not recognise the wife's existence, and has wholly thrown in his lot with the woman with whom he went through the marriage ceremony in Cyprus in 1919. In these circumstances I hold that, taking the period from 1913 to the date of the petition as a whole, the husband has deserted the wife without cause for not less than two years.

It is to be observed that when this case was dealt with in the Divisional Court, both Lord Merrivale and Hill, J., laid stress on the point that there was no appeal as to amount, and that the magistrate had no jurisdiction in that connection to inquire into the conduct of the parties. Hill, J., anticipated the position which will arise on this decision when, at the end of his judgment ([1930] P. at p. 71), he said that the court would be free to consider the conduct of the parties—the fact that in 1914 the husband had paid the wife £380, and that from then until 1929 they had lived apart without any claim by the wife, and so forth. In the event of an alimony petition the registrar will no doubt take into account the fact that the circumstances of this case are wholly exceptional. I think that, as I have had the parties before me, it is desirable, in the event of either party challenging the registrar's decision in the matter, that any appeal should be reserved to myself.

There will be a decree of judicial separation, with costs.

Decree granted.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Crossman, J.), June 5, 6, 1935]

Company—Winding-up—"Just and equitable"—Share capital held by petitioner and respondent in equal shares—Petitioner ousted from management of company—Companies Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 168 (6).

The D. and C. company was incorporated in 1932. The respondent was one of the two first directors and shareholders of the company and was appointed chairman. Subsequently, he invited the petitioner to become a director. The petitioner agreed, and pursuant to an arrangement between him and the respondent all the share capital of the company became vested in the petitioner and the respondent in equal shares. Subsequently, the respondent, having obtained the appointment of two of his friends as directors of the company, by their votes got himself appointed managing director, and immediately thereafter he ejected the petitioner from his room in the company's offices and ousted him from the management of the company. On a petition by the petitioner for an order for the winding-up of the company on the ground that it was just and equitable that it should be wound-up.

Held: in considering whether it was just and equitable that the company should be wound-up the court was left in the widest possible terms to consider what justice and equity required; as the petitioner and the respondent held the capital of the company in equal shares and were the only members of the company the court was bound to consider the position in the same way as if a question arose as to the right of two partners in a private partnership to have the partnership wound-up; and, the petitioner having been prevented from taking any part in the management of the company, it was just and equitable that the company should be wound-up.

Petition for compulsory winding-up of Davis and Collett, Ltd., based on the general grounds in s. 168 of the Companies Act, 1929, that it was just and equitable that the company should be wound-up.

The company was incorporated on Aug. 17, 1932. It had a capital of £200 divided into 400 shares of 10s. each. W. A. C. Davis, the respondent, who opposed this petition, and one H. Collett, were the first directors. As provided by art. 12 of the articles, each of these persons subscribed for one share in the company, and for some little time £1 appears to have been the only capital of the company. On Sept. 1, 1932, the first directors' meeting of the company was held and at that meeting a resolution was passed that Mr. Davis be appointed chairman. After certain changes in the directorship of the company, Mr. Davis approached Mr. Golding, the petitioner, with the suggestion that he should become a shareholder and director of the company. It was agreed between the petitioner and the respondent that the capital of the company should be increased, and as the result of negotiations between them they were to adopt an equal share basis. The petitioner was appointed a director in Oct., 1933, Collett then retiring and transferring the single share he held to the petitioner. The share capital of the company was subsequently increased, and as the result of allotments of shares to Mr. Golding and Mr. Davis, and ultimately of the transfer of one share on April 27, 1934, by Mr. Golding to Mr. Davis, on this date the entire share capital of the company was held by the petitioner and the respondent equally, each holding 400 10s. shares. Subsequently, Mr. Davis obtained control of the management of the company and prevented Mr. Golding from taking any part in its management. In these circumstances, Mr. Golding asked the court to make an order for the winding-up of the company on the ground that it was just and equitable that it should be wound-up.

CROSSMAN, J. [after dealing with the formation of the company and the appointment and resignation of certain directors and various allotments and transfers of shares, the ultimate result of which was that Mr. Golding, the petitioner, and Mr. Davis, the respondent, from and after April 27, 1934, held all the shares of the company equally between them, continued:] After that we come down to the critical events. I gather from the evidence, and I suppose I may accept it, that things went at first smoothly, and then this followed. On April 15, 1935, notice of a board meeting for April 16 at 11 a.m., was given. I have here in the bundle of exhibits and documents the agenda of that meeting. It was: "Meeting of the board of directors of Davis and Collett Ltd., held at 50, Pall Mall, on Tuesday, April 16, at 11 a.m." The agenda was to confirm the minutes of the previous meeting. On the 16th the board meeting was held. As to the circumstances in which that was held, I am not prepared on the evidence before me to come to a definite conclusion. There is a conflict of evidence. I do not think it is necessary for me to decide it, but it is suggested on behalf of the petitioner that there was a trick played upon him with regard to the meeting. The suggestion of the other side is that it was above board. What happened at that meeting was that Mr. Desmond Davis, the brother of Mr. Davis, was elected a director, though at that date Mr. Desmond Davis held no share in the company, and, therefore, was not a qualified person within the meaning of the article which gives power to the directors to elect qualified persons as directors.

On the 16th a notice was given of a board meeting on April 17, at 2 p.m., and the agenda for that meeting is: "(i) Read and if approved confirm minutes of the last meeting; (ii) discuss and deal with banking arrangements; (iii) appointment of managing director; (iv) discuss and deal with drawing of profits; (v) any other business." The meeting was not held on the 17th; for some reason it was postponed until the 18th, the next day. On the 18th that meeting was held, and at that meeting the minutes were read and there was "proposed by the chairman, seconded by Mr. Desmond Davis, and carried, that Mr. R. O. Cary be elected a director of the company. Mr. R. O. Cary was invited into the board room and took his seat on the board. Mr. Golding objected to the resolution, but did not vote." The same observation as to the previous election of the director applies to that. Nothing was said on the agenda about the election of a director. It is suggested that for that reason there may be some invalidity in the resolution appointing the director. I do not think that, on the authorities, it can be held that it is necessarily invalid because it did not appear on the notice; but, at all events, it is a significant fact that nothing was said either in the notice of the meeting for April 16 or in the notice of the meeting of April 17 about the election of a new director. In each case they purported to elect directors, though neither of those directors was at the time a qualified person within the articles.

At the second meeting there was also a resolution approving a transfer of one share to Desmond Davis and to Mr. R. O. Cary. That was passed, and I am told that they were registered on the same day as holders of those shares, so they became qualified persons; but they were neither of them qualified persons at the moment when the resolutions appointing them directors were passed. The important point of that meeting is Mr. W. A. C. Davis's appointment as managing director. The resolution was "proposed by Mr. Desmond Davis, seconded by Mr. R. O. Cary, that Mr. W. A. C. Davis, the chairman, be appointed managing director of the company with full power as such, as provided in the articles of association, at a salary at the rate of £720 per annum for the period of three years." There were other subsidiary matters. "Mr. W. A. C. Davis refrained from voting. Mr. Golding objected to and voted against the resolution."

That is the end of the history of the matter, because the only other fact I have before me is that subsequently Mr. Davis, purporting to act as managing director, turned Mr. Golding out of the room which he occupied at the offices of the company, saying that he required it for Mr. Cary, who had been appointed a director, and, in fact, Mr. Golding gave up the room.

In those circumstances Mr. Golding asks the court to make an order for the winding-up of the company on the ground that it is just and equitable that it should be wound-up; and I have to consider the question between the parties. It seems to me that, in considering whether the matter is just and equitable, I am left in the widest possible terms to consider what justice and equity require; and I have to form, therefore, an opinion as to what was being done and what is being done with regard to this fact. I find here that Mr. Davis and Mr. Golding hold the capital of this company in equal shares. Their interest, therefore, in the company is exactly equal, and they are the only members—that is to say, it is a private company in the fullest possible sense. On the authorities, and particularly Re Yenidje Tobacco Co. (1), I am bound to consider the position in the same way as I should consider it if the question arose as to the right of two partners in a private partnership to have the partnership wound-up. The same circumstances which entitle a partner to require the winding-up of a partnership entitle a person who is equally interested with one other person in a company to have that company wound-up on the ground that the circumstances render it just and equitable. That, I think, is the effect of the Yenidje Case (1), and I think that the partnership principles apply here. I do not take the Yenidje Case (1) because the facts exactly agree with these, but because of the principles there laid down, where the statement of the law in LINDLEY ON PARTNERSHIP is applied to a company.

I have now to try to arrive at a conclusion as to what is the real position as between these parties. Counsel for Mr. Davis suggests to me that there is nothing wrong here in any way, and that I ought to leave the petitioner in the position in which he now is, turned out, as I think, substantially from anything to do with the management of the company and prevented from taking part in the management of the company, and that he has no remedy at all in this matter. That is a matter which I should be very sorry to find was the position in law—that a person could be treated as Mr. Golding has been treated, and have no remedy at all. I have come to the conclusion that, in effect, the object of the meetings on April 16 and April 18 was to put sufficient power into the hands of Mr. Davis to enable him to get himself appointed managing director, and thereby obtain complete control of the company. If that was the case, I think it may be that that was not effectual, because of the present view which I take of the case. The appointment of these two directors was not valid, they being persons not qualified. What weighs with me very much is that I find the next step he takes is to eject Mr.

A Golding from his room, treating him as a person who was to have no further part in the management of the company, though he was, in fact, a director. Looking at the matter all round, and considering the evidence on the whole, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that this is a case where it is just and equitable that the company should be wound-up. I do not think it is necessary for me to go into the details of the evidence here or to try to sum up the evidence, but I find here that this is a case where, as between partners, I should be bound to come to the conclusion that there ought to be a dissolution of the partnership. B

In those circumstances I think I ought to come to the conclusion that there ought to be a winding-up order made. The parties are not prepared to come to some arrangement between themselves by which they can prevent the company being wound-up, although they are only damaging themselves. In the absence of some arrangement of that sort I must make an order for the winding-up of the company in the usual form. C

[King's Bench Division (du Parcq, J.), January 24, 1935]

Local Government—Superannuation—Contracting out—Legality—Extension of boundary—Compensation for loss of office held before extension—Effect on superannuation—Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922 (12 & 13 Geo. 5, c. 50), s. 3 (1), s. 6 (1). F

In 1921, when the claimant was employed as a surveyor by an urban district council, part of the area of that council was taken over by the appellant corporation under a provisional order confirmed by an Act of that year. Thereafter the claimant was employed by the corporation as divisional surveyor, although it was never admitted by the corporation that the post he occupied was in fact that of divisional surveyor. In 1930 the corporation adopted the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, and passed a resolution designating the post of divisional surveyor as an established post within s. 3 of that Act. G

The corporation and the claimant were unable to agree whether the post occupied by the claimant was that of divisional surveyor, and on Oct. 3, 1932, an agreement was entered into between them whereby, in consideration of the corporation agreeing to continue to employ him, the claimant agreed that he held his employment at the pleasure of the corporation; that the post which he occupied was not, and was not to be deemed to have been, an established post for the purposes of the Act of 1922; and that he was not entitled to receive any superannuation from the corporation. H

In January, 1935, the respondent retired on attaining the age of sixty-five years, and claimed superannuation allowance, based on the period of his service with the district council and the corporation. I

Held: in fact, at the date of his retirement the claimant was occupying a post designated as an established post within s. 3 of the Act of 1922, and in those circumstances, when he agreed that the post was not, and was not to be deemed to have been, an established post, he was in effect contracting out of the Act, which he could not legally do, and, therefore he was entitled to superannuation.

Salford Union v. Dewhurst (1), [1926] A.C. 619, applied.

By the provisional order providing for the extension of the area of the corporation it was provided that "no officer shall be entitled to . . . receive both compensation for any direct pecuniary loss by abolition of office or by diminution of . . . salary and a superannuation . . . allowance in respect of the same period of service and the same pecuniary loss."

Held: the effect of the provisional order was that the period of the claimant's employment with the district council should be excluded for the purpose of calculating the amount of his superannuation.

Notes. The Act of 1922 was repealed by the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, which provides, by s. 1, for the maintenance of a superannuation fund, and, by s. 3, for the classes of persons who shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of the fund.

As to superannuation of local government officers, see Halsbury's Laws, Cumulative Supplement 1956, vol. 21, paras. 123–145, and for cases, see 37 Digest 214, 215. For Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, see 14 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 619.

Case referred to:

Special Case stated by an arbitrator.

The facts found by the arbitrator and set out in the case were as follows:

1. The claimant, Bernard Powell (respondent to the appeal), entered the service of the Erdington urban district in March, 1898, and remained in their employ until August, 1898, when he entered the service of the Birmingham, Tame, and Rea District Drainage Board, where he continued until August, 1901.

2. In June, 1901, the claimant was appointed engineer and surveyor to the Handsworth Urban District Council, and continued in their service until Nov. 9, 1921, on which day there came into operation the Ministry of Health Provisional Order Confirmation (Sheffield Extension) Act, 1921 (11 & 12 Geo. 5, c. lxix), whereby the boundaries of the city of Sheffield were extended so as to include the Handsworth urban district. The claimant's salary and emoluments amounted, at that time, on the average to £830 per annum.

3. On June 18, 1920, a memorandum of agreement was executed by the corporation of Sheffield (the present appellants) and the claimant, which recited that whereas it had been agreed between the corporation and the Handsworth Urban District Council that, in the event of the city of Sheffield being extended so as to include Handsworth, the corporation would provide adequate compensation for certain specified officials of the Handsworth Urban District Council (including the claimant), it was thereby agreed between the parties that such adequate compensation as aforesaid should be in the case of the claimant the sum of £300 per annum, "such annuity to become payable from the day on which the order for the inclusion of the Handsworth urban district within the city of Sheffield shall come into operation and to be in full discharge of all claims to which the said Bernard Powell shall or may become entitled in any respect whatsoever by reason of his said office or otherwise in relation to the said urban district of Handsworth. Provided always that such annuity shall be suspended while the said Bernard Powell shall hold any office under the corporation and shall become payable from the day on which the said Bernard Powell shall cease to be employed by the corporation."

4. In 1921 the corporation offered to the claimant and he accepted an appointment in the department of the city engineer and surveyor at a salary of £600 a year. In September, 1922, the services of the claimant were lent to the Minister of Transport for duties to be carried out in Sheffield, and he remained in that position until July, 1928, when he returned to work for the corporation. During the whole of this period his salary continued to be paid each month by the corporation, and the arbitrator found as a fact that there was no interruption of his employment by the corporation.

5. It was contended on behalf of the claimant that he occupied the position of divisional surveyor throughout the period of his employment by the corporation. In A support of this contention he produced (a) official notepaper supplied to him for his use by the corporation on which were printed the words "Bernard Powell, Divisional Surveyor"; (b) letters written by him on Jan. 2, 1934, and Jan. 15, 1934, to the city treasurer signed on behalf of "Bernard Powell, Divisional Surveyor"; (c) printed statements or lists of the corporation's official staff issued by the town clerk's department in accordance with the corporation's classification and grading scheme for the years 1932 B 1933, and 1934, showing in each case an entry for "Powell, B., Divisional Surveyor"; (d) an extract from the minutes of the meeting of the Highways Committee, held on Oct. 19, 1934, stating that "the town clerk reported on the position of Mr. Bernard Powell, Divisional Surveyor in the City Engineer's Department. . . ." These minutes were confirmed by the city council on Dec. 5, 1934.

The claimant stated in his evidence that the actual appointment which he was to C hold was not specified when he was first engaged by the corporation, but that the city engineer proposed to him that he should be divisional surveyor of the eastern district of the city, and that he agreed to this proposal. The claimant stated that this district included not only Handsworth but also Darnall, Hillsborough, and various other places comprising the eastern side of the city. He further said that he was throughout his actual service with the corporation responsible for this district, although he was also D assigned certain other duties, such as private street works and telephone operations, for the whole city.

The corporation denied that the claimant was appointed divisional surveyor or occupied that office at any time while in their employment. The city engineer and surveyor (Mr. W. J. Hadfield) gave evidence to the effect that he disapproved of dividing the city into territorial divisions, and had abolished the offices of divisional surveyor, E which formerly existed. Mr. Hadfield stated that he merely requested the claimant to carry on in the Handsworth area for the time being, and that there was never any question of his being allocated to the eastern division of the city; indeed, he denied that such a division existed. The claimant's duties, he stated, were in no sense restricted to one side of the city, but were of a general nature.

The arbitrator found as a fact that the claimant occupied the position of divisional F surveyor throughout his period of employment by the corporation, and was at all material times officially recognised by them to be holding that position. It was admitted on behalf of the corporation that there was no person other than the claimant holding such a position.

6. On Feb. 25, 1930, a meeting of the finance committee of the corporation was held G at which the town clerk referred to a previous resolution of the committee instructing that notices be issued calling a special meeting of the council to consider the question of adopting the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, in respect of officers of the council as from April 1, 1930. According to the minutes of the committee, which were confirmed on March 5, 1930, by the city council, the finance committee resolved "that in the event of the council deciding to adopt the Act, the following H list of posts be designated posts, i.e., posts to which the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, shall apply." Then followed a "list of posts to be designated established posts for the purposes of the above Act," to which was prefaced a note stating that the posts designated were those occupied by persons appointed on the permanent official staff of the corporation. The list for the city engineer and surveyor's department expressly mentioned "divisional surveyor." I

7. On March 5, 1930, a special meeting of the Sheffield City Council was held at which the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, was adopted to come into operation on July 1, 1930. The council resolved that for the purposes of the Act the posts set out in the minutes of the finance committee meeting of Feb. 25, 1930, should be designated as established posts.

8. At a quarterly meeting of the city council, held on May 7, 1930, the council confirmed "the resolution of the council passed on March 5, 1930, adopting the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, and that the number of established posts be in accordance with the schedule now submitted." The schedule repeated the note mentioned in para. 6 above and contained the following entry: "Divisional Surveyor.—The resolution with the schedule was forwarded by the town clerk on May 7, 1930, to the Minister of Health for approval."

9. The printed statements of the official staff submitted in accordance with the corporation's classification and grading scheme for the years 1932, 1933, and 1934, and which (as stated in para. 5 (c) above) included an entry relating to the claimant, indicated by means of a capital letter E against the claimant's name that he was an officer occupying an established post under the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922.

10. On June 16 the city engineer sent to the claimant a circular letter in which he stated that the adoption by the corporation of the superannuation scheme necessitated the production by all officers of their birth certificates and certificates of previous service, if any, with other local authorities. When the claimant produced his birth certificate for inspection by the city engineer the latter informed him that he did not come under the new scheme as his superannuation was arranged in another way. When the claimant demurred to this he was referred to the town clerk. On Aug. 1, 1930, the deputy town clerk addressed a note to the claimant headed "Superannuation," in which he enclosed a certificate as to previous service with other local authorities and requested the claimant to fill in the particulars. The certificate was printed as follows: "I, the undersigned, being in your service and the occupier of a post designated by you as an established post for the purposes of the Act, hereby apply to you to reckon for the purposes of the Act my services with other local authorities set forth hereunder."

11. In July, 1930, the town clerk interviewed the claimant and made certain proposals to him. He asked whether he would modify the terms of the agreement of June 18, 1920, so as to reduce the £300 per annum payable thereunder to £156 per annum, and informed him that, if he would not agree to this, the corporation would consider the question whether he was an established officer. The claimant refused to consent to the proposed modification. He was then asked to agree that he was not the occupier of an established post, and in consequence not entitled to superannuation, under the Act of 1922. He was informed that, if he did not so agree, he would be dismissed from the service of the corporation. A sub-committee of the finance committee had made a recommendation to this effect.

12. The claimant protested throughout these negotiations that he was fully entitled to come under the provisions of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, and declared repeatedly that the corporation had already recognised him as a designated officer for the purposes of the Act. As a result of the pressure which was brought to bear on him by the threat of dismissal he entered into a written agreement under seal with the corporation on Oct. 3, 1932. This agreement, after reciting (inter alia) that it was claimed by the claimant and denied by the corporation that the claimant was the occupier of an establishment post designated for the purposes of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, and that the corporation had informed the claimant that they were not prepared to continue to employ him unless he withdraw the said claim, thereupon declared that it was agreed between the parties as follows:

> "In consideration of the corporation continuing to employ the said Bernard Powell as a surveyor the said Bernard Powell agrees as follows: (i) that he the said Bernard Powell holds the said employment at the pleasure of the council; (ii) that the post which the said Bernard Powell occupies is not and shall not be deemed to have been or to be designated as an established post for the purposes of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922; (iii) that he the said Bernard Powell hereby withdraws the claim he has made as hereinbefore recited and hereby agrees that he is not and shall not at any time as of legal right on resigning from or otherwise ceasing to hold his office or employment under the corporation be entitled to receive any superannuation whatsoever from the corporation and that he will not claim to be entitled to receive any such allowance."

13. On July 4, 1932, the claimant's solicitors wrote to the town clerk returning an approved copy of the draft agreement and asking whether the claimant could rest assured that there was no intention of disturbing his then existing employment. No answer was given by the corporation to this inquiry.

14. The claimant remained in the service of the corporation until Jan. 15, 1935, on which date he attained the age of sixty-five years.

15. The claimant stated in evidence that after signing the agreement he still regarded himself as occupying a designated post. On March 30, 1935, his solicitors wrote to the town clerk stating that the corporation had been under a misapprehension as to the claimant's position under the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, and asking what action the corporation proposed to take. The corporation replied that they proposed to take no action, and on April 17, 1935, the claimant's solicitors informed the town clerk that the claimant proposed to submit his claim to arbitration.

At the hearing before the arbitrator, on Oct. 23, and Oct. 30, 1935, it was contended by counsel for the corporation that, the question of the claimant's right to a superannuation allowance having been settled by the agreement of Oct. 3, 1932, there was no dispute in "default of agreement" which could properly form the subject-matter of an arbitration under s. 22 of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922. The arbitrator did not give effect to this contention on the ground that the words "in default of agreement" were not to be construed as meaning that the arbitrator had no jurisdiction where an agreement relating to superannuation was produced, but were intended to refer to a state of difference or dispute between the parties, regardless of whether such difference or dispute arose from agreement or purported agreement, or not.

It was contended by counsel for the corporation that the claimant was not the occupier of a designated post for the purposes of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922, at the time when the corporation adopted the Act or at any time thereafter. He further argued that a local authority might designate a post which was vacant at the moment and that that had been done in the present case. Counsel admitted, however, that, if the claimant was divisional surveyor at the time when the Act was adopted, he was designated for the purposes of the Act.

Having regard to his finding of fact in para. 5 to the effect that the claimant occupied the position of divisional surveyor at all material times, and taking into consideration the evidence set out above, the arbitrator found as a fact that the claimant was at all material times the occupier of a post which the corporation designated for the purposes of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922. Accordingly, he was an "officer" as defined in s. 3 thereof.

Assuming that the claimant was a designated officer the main question of law involved in the reference related to the agreement of Oct. 3, 1932. Counsel for the claimant put forward at the hearing the following contentions:

That the agreement was invalid in itself because the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act neither provided for, nor permitted, a local authority to "de-designate" an officer who had once been designated for the purposes of the Act.

That a serving officer occupying a designated post could not have his status under the Act altered to his detriment either with or without his consent.

That while the Act left it within the entire discretion of the local authority to adopt a superannuation scheme, and, moreover, left the local authority free to designate such posts as they choose, it did not permit any contracting out of the Act in the case of an officer who has once been brought within its provisions.

That Salford Union v. Dewhurst (1) is authority for these propositions.

That what counsel called the common sense of the Act would point to a similar conclusion on grounds of practical expediency.

That no consideration was given or promised by the corporation in the said agreement since the claimant was liable to dismissal at any time and was accorded no assurance of or right to continue employment.

That the agreement could not be regarded as a valid compromise since in the first place it does not purport to be one, and in the second place does not embody a reciprocal abandonment of claim, there being no abandonment of any claim or right by the corporation.

It was contended by counsel for the corporation:

That contracting out of the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act was not only permitted, but, indeed, contemplated by the statute, as shown by the words "in default of agreement" in s. 22.

That the decision in Salford Union v. Dewhurst (1) was not applicable since the Poor Law Officers Superannuation Act, to which that case referred laid down a compulsory system whereas superannuation under the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act was voluntary and within the discretion of the local authority.

That the agreement of October, 1932, constituted a valid contracting out of the Act.

That as the agreement was under seal, no question of consideration could arise, but that if it did, good consideration was given by the corporation in that they continued to employ the claimant for a further period of three years which they would not otherwise have done.

That, alternatively, the agreement constituted a valid compromise since there was at the time when it was made a bona fide dispute between the parties whether the claimant occupied a designated post, which dispute was determined by an agreement that he was never inside the Act of 1922.

That, in deciding whether a compromise should be enforced or set aside, regard should be had to the honesty of the parties, and that here the claimant acted in bad faith since he never had any real intention of carrying out his professed intention of abandoning all claims to a superannuation allowance.

That an agreement of the kind was justified on grounds of public policy since its object was to avoid disputes, and that the agreement in question was equitable, in so far as it sought to prevent the claimants from receiving both compensation for loss of office and a superannuation allowance.

The arbitrator held, first, that the agreement of Oct. 3, 1932, was invalid, and, secondly, that the claimant was entitled to superannuation allowance calculated with reference to the whole period of his service with the Handsworth Urban District Council and the Sheffield Corporation.

By the Local Government and Other Officers Superannuation Act, 1922:

> s. 3: "'Officer' or 'servant' means an officer or servant in the permanent service of the local authority occupying a post designated as an established post for the purposes of this Act by a resolution of the local authority . . ."
> s. 6 (1): ". . . every officer or servant . . . who shall have attained the age of sixty-five years shall be entitled on resigning or otherwise ceasing to hold his office or employment to receive during life a superannuation allowance according to the scale by this Act provided."

DU PARCQ, J.—It is not necessary, I think, that I should state the facts in any detail. The facts have already been found by the learned arbitrator, and I have nothing to do with his decision upon them except to accept it. What I am asked to do and what I am bound to do is to say whether or not the learned arbitrator is right in his view of the law. I shall, therefore, only state enough of the facts to make what I say comprehensible.

The claimant was employed for some years under the Handsworth Urban District Council, having been previously employed by other public bodies. In the year 1920 a representation was made to the Ministry of Health by the city of Sheffield that the boundaries of that city should be altered so as to include neighbouring districts, including the urban district of Handsworth. I think it is plain that at that date it was anticipated that the legislature might give effect to the wishes of the city of Sheffield and that in due course there would be made a provisional order dealing with the Sheffield extension, which would be confirmed by the legislature; and I think it was anticipated, probably with very good reason at that time, that provision would be made by the legislature for the compensation of any officials of the Handsworth Urban District Council who either found themselves deprived of their employment by the abolition of office or deprived of some of their emoluments by diminution or loss of fees or salary.

On June 18, 1920, an agreement was entered into between the lord mayor, aldermen and citizens of Sheffield and the claimant, whereby, after reciting the fact that the representation to which I have referred had been made, and that an agreement had been made between the corporation of Sheffield and the Handsworth Urban District Council, and that the claimant had submitted particulars of his salary and emoluments to the corporation, it was agreed between the parties "that such adequate compensation as aforesaid"—that is to say, looking back at one of the recitals, adequate compensation for the official—"shall be the sum of £300 per annum, such annuity to become payable from the day on which the order for the inclusion of the Handsworth urban district within the city of Sheffield shall come into operation, and to be in full discharge for all claims to which the said Bernard Powell shall or may become entitled, in any respect whatsoever, by reason of his said office or otherwise in relation to the said urban district of Handsworth, provided always that such annuity shall be suspended while the said Bernard Powell shall hold any office under the corporation and shall become payable from the day on which the said Bernard Powell shall cease to be employed by the corporation." That agreement was under seal. In fact the claimant passed at once, without any interval of time, from the employment of the Handsworth Urban District Council to the employment of Sheffield Corporation.

In 1922 was passed the Local Government and Other Officers' Superannuation Act, which made provision for payment of superannuation allowances to certain officers. It was an adoptive Act, and in 1930 it was adopted by a resolution of the Sheffield Corporation of March 5 of that year, the adoption to come into force on July 1, 1930. In s. 3, which is the definition section of the Act, this definition occurs:

> "'officer' or 'servant' means an officer or servant in the permanent service of the local authority occupying a post designated as an established post for the purposes of this Act by a resolution of the local authority and whether in receipt of salary or wages."

The post of divisional surveyor was designated by a resolution duly passed as an established post for the purposes of the Act.

A dispute arose in July, 1930, between the claimant and the Sheffield Corporation. The claimant said that he was divisional surveyor, that that post was his, and that, therefore, he was occupying a post designated as an established post for the purposes of the Act of 1922. The council said that that was not so, and on Oct. 3, 1932, an agreement was entered into, such agreement being stated to be supplemental to the agreement of June 18, 1920, to which I have already referred. That agreement recited the Sheffield Extension Order of 1921, recited the fact that the claimant entered the service of the Sheffield Corporation at a salary of £600 a year, recited the adoption of the Local Government and Other Officers' Superannuation Act of 1922, and went on in this way:

> "And whereas it is claimed by the said Bernard Powell and denied by the corporation that he the said Bernard Powell is the occupier of a post under the corporation (and, therefore, entitled to superannuation as an established post for the purposes of the said Act) and the corporation have informed the said Bernard Powell that they are not prepared to continue to employ him unless he withdraws the said claim, Now it is hereby agreed as follows: In consideration of the corporation continuing to employ the said Bernard Powell as a surveyor the said Bernard Powell agrees as follows: (i) that he the said Bernard Powell holds the said employment at the pleasure of the council; (ii) that the post which the said Bernard Powell occupies is not and shall not be deemed to have been or to be designated as an established post for the purposes of the Local Government and Other Officers' Superannua-> he had made as hereinbefore recited and hereby agrees that he is not and shall not at any time as of legal right on resigning from or otherwise ceasing to hold his office or employment under the corporation be entitled to receive any superannuation whatsoever from the corporation and that he will not claim to be entitled to receive any such allowance."

That agreement was under seal.

In 1935 the claimant attained the age of sixty-five. He was given notice that on attaining that age his employment would cease, as it would, I think, necessarily cease unless it was extended by the corporation, and he made a claim under the Act of 1922 to superannuation allowance. He was met with two answers. The first, if it is right, goes to the whole of his claim. The learned arbitrator has held that it is not an answer to the claim at all. The agreement of Oct. 3, 1932, was under seal, so that it is not necessary to consider whether or not there was consideration for it. Counsel for the corporation, however, says that there was consideration for it, because the corporation said: "At any rate, we shall not at once cease to employ you, as we should if you do not give up your claim." Treating it as an enforceable contract, counsel says: This is a case in which the corporation and the claimant were at odds: they did not agree as to a question of fact—it might possibly be in part a question of law; but it is, I think, in this case mainly a question of fact—whether the claimant was an officer occupying a post designated as an established post or not, and, in order to settle their differences, they entered into an agreement with him by which they gave some consideration and he agreed that the post that he occupied was not and should not be deemed to have been or to be designated as an established post.

On that point I agree with the learned arbitrator. One thing is plain, and counsel did not argue the contrary. A man who is entitled to a superannuation allowance under the Act of 1922—I am not limiting what I say to that Act, of course; but it is the only Act with which I have to deal to-day—has a vested and inalienable right to that superannuation allowance. He cannot, as it is sometimes put, contract himself out of that right. He cannot by entering into any agreement divest himself of that right. The principle is established in Salford Union v. Dewhurst (1), and, as I have said, counsel accepts that view of this case. He agrees that an agreement by which the claimant has given up his rights would be unenforceable and worthless. If the claimant had said: "Although I am an officer occupying a post designated as an established post, I will, for good consideration, abandon the right to superannuation allowance which that position gives me," it is not suggested that the agreement would be enforceable. I do not think that the distinction which counsel suggests can be drawn. At the date when the agreement was entered into the claimant either was or was not occupying a post designated as an established post. We now know that he was occupying such a post. That is the fact, and, even though he had doubts whether he was occupying such a post, and even though Sheffield Corporation may have felt no doubt that he was not occupying such a post, it does not affect the fact, which nothing can alter when it is once granted that it was the fact, that he was occupying such a post. In my view, if a man who does occupy an established post, if I may so call it for brevity's sake, says: "I am willing to agree that I am not occupying an established post or that I shall be deemed not to be occupying an established post," he is only saying in other words: "I am willing to give up the vested and inalienable right which the occupation of the post which, in truth, I do occupy gives me." I cannot draw the distinction which I was asked to draw between contracting out and contracting that you are not to be deemed to be in. I do not think that the distinction is one which ought to be drawn, and I do not think that the courts ought to try to find ways of enabling people to give up rights of such importance as the right to a superannuation allowance. Therefore, upon that point I agree with the contentions of counsel for the claimant and with the decision of the learned arbitrator.

The second point is this. Counsel for the corporation says that that agreement of June 18, 1920, provided for the payment of compensation for pecuniary loss by abolition

Order, confirmed by the Provisional Order Confirmation (Sheffield Extension) Act, 1921, which is in these terms:

> "Subject to the provisions of this order, no officer shall be entitled to claim or receive both compensation for any direct pecuniary loss by abolition of office or by diminution of loss of fees or salary and a superannuation or retiring allowance in respect of the same period of service and the same pecuniary loss."

This contention, which was also rejected by the learned arbitrator, does not provide a complete answer to the claimant's claim to superannuation allowance. He is claiming to be compensated with regard not only to his service to the Sheffield Corporation, but also his service to the Handsworth Urban District Council. Counsel says that he cannot have the latter; he is claiming or receiving under that agreement compensation in respect of the abolition of his office with the Handsworth Urban District Council or diminution or loss of fees or salary owing to his transfer to the Sheffield Corporation, and, that being so, he cannot in respect of that same period of service and the same pecuniary loss, to use the words of the Act of Parliament, which I think need a little gloss put upon them to be comprehensible, whichever view one takes of the section, have both compensation and superannuation or retiring allowance. That seems at first sight fairly plain. At least, so it seemed to me at first sight; but the matter is not a simple one, and needs consideration.

Counsel for the claimant says, first of all, that it is to be borne in mind that in 1920 when this agreement was entered into and in 1921 when the Provisional Order Confirmation (Sheffield Extension) Act, 1921, was passed, neither the claimant nor anyone else could have any claim to a superannuation allowance under the Act of 1922, which had not then been passed; he had no right, vested or otherwise, until 1922, and it may be that, apart from that Act of 1922, he would not have been entitled to any superannuation allowance at all under any Act. Counsel says that art. 52 of the Provisional Order of 1921, confirmed as it was by the Act of 1921, could not take away a right which only vested in the claimant in 1922, and that art. 52, when it provides that an officer is not to have both compensation and superannuation allowance, means compensation under the order assessed in accordance with the order, which, by reference, sends one back to sections of the Local Government Act, 1888, including s. 120 of that Act. He says that art. 52 means that, whereas an officer was entitled to say that he was to have payment forthwith of compensation and be at once compensated, he could not, if he had reached the age of sixty and done forty years' service, which would entitle him to superannuation allowance (assuming for this purpose that one has to consider what he became entitled to under the Act of 1922) go to the authority and say: "Now I am sixty; I have done enough service to entitle me to superannuation allowance; I will take it and my compensation, too." He says that that at the most is what the section means, and that it is only referring to compensation paid at once and in a lump, as I understand him, and calculated in accordance with the Act of 1922.

I have come to the conclusion that upon this part of the case the learned arbitrator has not taken the right view and that the contentions of counsel for the corporation are right. It is to be observed that the learned arbitrator, when dealing with the provisional order, which came into operation on Nov. 9, 1921, in para. 22, sub-para. (1) of the Case, says:

> "The corporation had in effect compounded in advance for any right to compensation which might be conferred by the provisional order and the confirming Act. It was not suggested at the hearing that there was anything illegal in the corporation taking this step, nor has either party to the dispute impugned the validity of the agreement of June 18, 1920."

I understand counsel for the claimant not to dissent from that view. Therefore, one starts with this, that the agreement of 1920, as is conceded, is one which could quite properly be made, on the assumption that it means that the corporation are, to use the learned arbitrator's phrase, compounding in advance for any right to compensation.

A agree with you what you are to have by way of compensation." There is nothing in that in the least comparable to an attempt to contract out of a right to superannuation allowance. On the contrary, when the provisional order was made and confirmed it was made clear that the corporation in the first instance, applying the Act of course, could say what compensation was to be payable, and, unless that was objected to by the claimant, the matter would remain there. It is plain enough, as I think I have said B already, that the parties knew pretty well what was going to happen or what was likely to happen, and I have no doubt, looking at this agreement, that they were saying: "The claimant will be entitled to compensation. If what we expect to happen does happen, we do not know exactly what compensation he will be entitled to" [though I dare say they might have added that they could make a fairly accurate surmise]. We may be giving him too much; we may be giving him too little; but, at C any rate, we agree that he is to have £300 a year, but that, while he is employed by us (if he does enter our employment) he shall not receive the £300 per annum." I am not concerned in the least, when once it is conceded that that is a legal and enforceable agreement, with the question whether the £300 a year, payment of which was suspended as it was suspended, was too little or too much—whether it was a provident or an improvident agreement for the plaintiff to enter into. Those questions are quite irrelevant. D Having entered into that agreement it appears to me that when in 1921 the provisional order was confirmed the claimant was in the position of having received, in the sense that he had an enforceable promise to pay money, and that he was in a position to claim and was intending to claim the compensation for direct pecuniary loss, and his position to-day is that he is receiving, I suppose, that compensation of £300 a year for the rest of his life. It seems to me that it is impossible to hold that "compensation" there E refers only to compensation assessed subsequently to and in accordance with the provisions of the Order and Act of 1921, and that it must also include compensation assessed in anticipation of such an order and in respect of the matters dealt with by art. 52.

Counsel for the claimant says that there is one conclusive answer to the contention put forward on behalf of the corporation, even if he is wrong on every other point. He F says: "Whatever was enacted in 1921 cannot affect a right which is vested in the claimant under the Local Government and Other Officers' Superannuation Act, 1922." Counsel for the corporation replies to that by referring me to s. 30 of the last-mentioned Act, which provides:

> "Nothing in this Act shall prejudice or affect any express provision contained in G any act of Parliament or any order confirmed by or having the effect of an Act of Parliament relative to any superannuation or retiring allowance or any other allowance of a similar character in the case of any officer or servant referred to in such provision."

I think counsel is right in saying that by that saving clause the legislature have made it H plain that, although the right to a superannuation allowance did not exist in 1921, a provision such as is contained in art. 52 of the Order of 1921 is to have the effect of preventing a man from getting superannuation allowance in respect of the period with regard to which he had already received compensation. I do not know that art. 52 is very happily worded, but I think it is reasonably plain that it means, as counsel for the corporation suggested, that, having regard to the fact that compensation is to be assessed I with reference to the length of period of service with a particular employer in accordance with the Local Government Act of 1888, when a man has had compensation in respect of such a period he cannot also have superannuation allowance in respect of that period in respect of which his pecuniary loss has already been made up to him.

For these reasons I think that the learned arbitrator was wrong as to the second point.

The result is that, dealing with para. 25 of the case, I say as to the question whether the agreement of Oct. 3, 1932, was valid and binding that it is not, and as to the question whether, if the claimant is entitled to superannuation, the period of his employment with the Handsworth Urban District Council should be excluded for the purpose of calculating the amount of his superannuation, I answer that it should be so excluded.

Shipping—Charterparty—Ice clause—Charterers to arrange for provision of icebreaking assistance—Liability of charterers where assistance intermittent and inadequate—Operation of exceptions clause where obligations under principal clause unsatisfied—Exception of charterers from responsibility for loss of time during passage through ice.

An ice clause in a charterparty provided, inter alia (by cl. (1)), that if the loading port were inaccessible by reason of ice or in case ice set in after the ship's arrival at the port, the charterers undertook to arrange for the provision by the port authorities of icebreaker assistance if required, and (by cl. (4)) that the charterers should not be responsible for any loss of time during passage through the ice and (or) any loss or damage caused to the ship by ice or for any detention on passage through ice. The ship was delayed because, although full icebreaker assistance was required, the port authorities gave only intermittent assistance. On a claim by the shipowners for damages, the charterers contended that (i) their obligation under cl. (1) was limited to the making of arrangements with the port authorities, (ii) they were excused responsibility by cl. (4).

Held: the shipowners were entitled to damages because (i) cl. (1) imposed an obligation to provide continuous and full icebreaker assistance throughout the ship's passage through the ice, and that obligation was not fulfilled by the making of ineffective arrangements with the port authorities.

Appeal by charterers from a judgment of BRANSON, J., dated April 10, 1935. The facts are stated in the judgment of LORD WRIGHT, M.R.

H. I. P. Hallett for the charterers.
Cyril Miller for the shipowners.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of BRANSON, J., given on an award stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court by a very experienced city solicitor, Mr. Douglas Garrett. The case is one of a type which in the last few years has been frequently before the courts of this country, and I will indicate in the most general terms the nature of it. The appellants were the charterers of a vessel, owned by the respondent, called the Spidola. The appellants are the White Sea Timber Trust, Ltd. of Paris, and they were the charterers of the steamship Spidola, owned by P. Danneberg, of Riga. Both parties are foreigners, but the contract was entered into on the Chamber of Shipping Baltic Wood Charter, 1926, a form of contract prepared by the London Chamber of Shipping. The matter comes before the courts of this country because that contract contained an arbitration clause, cl. 39. For that reason it went before an arbitrator in the city.

The vessel was chartered in November, 1933, to proceed to Leningrad below Bridges and to load a cargo of timber to be delivered to Antwerp or Ghent. It is well known that, at that time of the year, or at least at the time of the year when the vessel was due outside the port, the port would be icebound, and equally it would be icebound when, having loaded her cargo in the ordinary way, the vessel was prepared to proceed to sea. In order to induce shipowners to send their vessels to Leningrad while it was icebound, a clause has been arranged called the ice clause; it is a clause which has taken different forms, but the object of that clause is to ensure that the shipowner will have the benefit of the assistance of icebreakers, in order to enable the ship to enter port with as little delay as possible, and to leave the port when the ship is loaded, also with as little delay as possible, and it provides that in certain events compensation, if there is undue delay, is to be payable to the shipowner by the charterer. In each case the precise rights and obligations of the parties must be determined by the exact terms of the clause which they have agreed upon. I am merely indicating the general nature of the position.

This vessel was delayed, or at least the owners complained that she had been delayed, because the requirements of the ice clause had not been properly fulfilled by the charterers, and thereupon proceedings at arbitration took place before two arbitrators and an umpire, and the umpire made his award in the form of a special case. Certain points which were raised in that award are not now material, but I shall read a few passages from the case which will indicate sufficiently, first, what are the findings on the part of the umpire, and, secondly, what are the questions of law upon which he has required the opinion of the court. The facts as stated by him may be summarised in this way. The vessel "arrived at the edge of the ice"—that means the point outside the harbour at which it becomes impossible to proceed through the ice without the help of an icebreaker—

> "in the Gulf of Finland at about midnight on Dec. 12, 1933. She did not arrive at her loading berth at Leningrad until 1.15 p.m. on Dec. 18, 1933, and the period intervening between these two times was occupied by her in getting through the ice in the Gulf of Finland and Kronstadt Bay with the intermittent assistance of an icebreaker supplied by the harbour master or port authority of Leningrad, which is a department of the People's Commissariat of Water Transport and a governmental organisation. The icebreaker Ermak arrived at the vessel's position at 6 a.m. on Dec. 13, 1933, but her assistance or attendance was intermittent, and > during this period" [that is the period between her arrival at the edge of the ice and her arrival at the harbour] "the Spidola was frequently lying immobile in the ice. Exercising the best judgment I can upon the evidence, I find that the periods for which on the voyage to Leningrad the vessel was delayed owing to non-attendance or intermittent attendance upon her by the icebreaker and her consequent immobility in the ice were as follows," A

B and then he sets out the periods and finds a total delay of ninety-one hours, fifty minutes. Then he turns to the other part of the voyage, refers to the facts that the charterers did not produce the logs of any icebreakers, nor did they give any evidence in explanation of the delays which admittedly occurred in the vessel's passage through the ice, and says:

> C "As regards the voyage from Leningrad to the port of discharge, basing myself upon the evidence above mentioned, I find that the vessel began loading her cargo at 8 a.m. on Tuesday, Dec. 19, 1933, and completed her loading at 4.40 a.m. on Saturday, Dec. 23, 1933, and at 8 p.m. on the same date received her sailing orders from the shippers. As, however, no icebreaker assistance was then provided for her, the master took the opportunity of taking in some additional bunker coal, and this operation lasted from 9.45 p.m. on Dec. 23 until 4 a.m. on Dec. 24, 1933, D and I find that it was not until 7.30 p.m. on Dec. 24, 1933, that the vessel was actually ready to leave. She did not reach open water in the Gulf of Finland until 5.35 p.m. on Jan. 12, 1934, and much of the period intervening between these two dates was occupied in waiting for the icebreaker, whose assistance was again intermittent. I find that the periods at Leningrad and during the passage from Leningrad to open water for which the vessel was delayed owing to non-attendance E or intermittent attendance upon her by the icebreaker and her consequent immobility in the ice were as follows," and then he sets out a number of periods of delay amounting to 393 hours, 45 minutes. Later in the award the umpire finds that there was no evidence given by either party of the mutual relationships of the charterers, Sovtorgflot, Sovfracht, and Exportles, F nor of the connection (if any) of any of these bodies, with the Russian Government. That finding, in my judgment, although I quite appreciate why it was put in, is immaterial for the purposes of this case.

Those facts having been found by the umpire, he goes on to discuss at length the various contentions on one side and the other, and then the question he puts is this: "If the charterers' obligations under the ice clause had in fact attached and become G operative"—that clause may be disregarded because it is not now disputed that the obligations do in fact attach and become operative, whatever they are—"what were those obligations and have the charterers fulfilled them?" Then the umpire proceeds to hold, in cl. 16 of the case:

> "I hold, subject to the opinion of the court, that the words in para. 1 of the ice clause 'undertake to arrange for the provision by the port authorities of icebreaker H assistance if required by the captain free of expense to the steamer, the steamer complying with official instructions and rules issued by the authorities concerning icebreaker assistance' constituted an unqualified undertaking by the charterers to procure the port authority to provide icebreaker assistance, within the meaning assigned to that term by the House of Lords in Ugleexport Charkow v. Anastasia (Owners), Russian Wood Agency, Ltd. v. Dampskibsselskabet Heimdal (The Asko) (1), I to which I shall refer later, that is to say, assistance which should not be casual or intermittent, and that the latter part of the words quoted means that upon such assistance being provided the master must comply with the regulations. It does not appear to me to be material, having regard to the language of the clause, to consider what (if any) measure of connection with or control over the port authority existed in the charterers. The words above quoted are not, in my view, apt words to express nothing more than an obligation on the part of the charterers to give the instructions necessary to set in motion the free icebreaker assistance which > existed by law at Leningrad, and which the master could have procured for the ship merely by complying with the regulations, and without the assistance of any express provision such as this in the charterparty. I further hold, subject to the opinion of the court, that by necessary inference from the ice clause and the charterparty as a whole, the object of assistance was to enable the vessel to reach her loading berth and after loading to reach open water, and that the assistance called for by the ice clause must be construed accordingly; as regards para. 4 of the ice clause, I hold, subject to the opinion of the court, that the effect of this is merely to protect the charterers from liability for any delay which might (and doubtless would) be inseparable from a passage through the ice even with non-intermittent icebreaker assistance."

Then the umpire proceeds to find that, if that view is correct, the charterers are to pay to the owner the sum of £252 11s. 4d.—I need not enter into the details as to how that sum is arrived at—and he asks the court to uphold that view if they think that the opinions on this question of law which he expresses are correct. Then he proceeds in the alternative to find that, if the court should be of opinion that "the obligations of the charterers under the ice clause were as contended for by them," that is to say, the contentions which he set out earlier and to which I shall refer

> "I find that the charterers are under no liability to the owner, and I hereby award that there is nothing due from the charterers to the owner."

That award as made by the arbitrator, subject to the opinion of the court, was upheld, in the form in which he made it, by Branson, J., and it is from his judgment that the matter now comes before this court.

In considering the ice clause it is necessary to bear in mind the decisions which had been given by Roche, J., the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords on a form of ice clause which is similar to that now in question. Perhaps it would be convenient at this stage if I were to read the ice clause which is to be found in this charterparty and then to refer to such passages in the judgment of the House of Lords as seem to throw light upon its construction. The ice clause for present purposes contains four clauses. Clause (1) is:

> "In the event of the port of loading being inaccessible by reason of ice, or in case ice sets in after vessel's arrival at port of loading, the charterers undertake to arrange for the provision by the port authorities of icebreaker assistance if required by the captain, free of expense to the steamer, the steamer complying with official instructions and rules issued by the authorities concerning icebreaker assistance. . . . (2) Icebreaker assistance to be rendered free of expense to the steamer within forty-eight hours of receipt by the captain of port (at loading port)"—I think "of" is missed out here—"master's or owners' notification of arrival at the edge of ice, or when leaving port forty-eight hours after notification by the master of readiness to leave. (3) Time lost by the vessel in waiting for icebreaker assistance at the edge of ice, and when leaving the loading port in the excess of the time provided for in cl. 2 to count as demurrage and (or) detention and to be paid by charterers at the rate of £20 per day or pro rata, from which time days saved in loading and (or) discharging shall be deducted. (4) The charterers shall not be responsible for any loss of time during passage through the ice and or any loss or damage caused to the steamer by ice or for any detention on passage through ice."

The main arguments which have been put forward very clearly by counsel for the charterers may be summarised thus. He contends, first of all, that the obligation under cl. (1) is merely an obligation to arrange for the provision by the port authorities of icebreaker assistance; that is to say, they have to take steps which in the ordinary course would secure that provision, and once they have taken those steps, their responsibility is discharged and they are not in any way responsible for any delay, neglect, or default in the actual provision by the port authority of the icebreaker assistance. In other words he says that cl. (1) is limited to an obligation merely to do something towards the form of arrangement. He did not put any stress upon the words:

> "the steamer complying with official instructions and rules issued by the authorities concerning icebreaker assistance," A

because he frankly admitted that he could not distinguish the words, in the qualification in which they stood, from those which were discussed by the House of Lords in the case of the Anastasia (1), and which were held not to limit in any way the charterers' obligations. He further argued that the words, "icebreaker assistance," meant something different from "icebreaker assistance to enter or leave the port," and that they were B satisfied by the provision of an icebreaker which might or might not give assistance; in other words, he argued that there was no definition of the purpose or object for which the icebreaker assistance was to be provided, and a fortiori no provision which would involve any obligation if that purpose or object was not secured by the assistance which was provided. So much for cl. (1).

As to cl. (2), counsel for the charterers' contention was that it was not absolute or C peremptory in its terms; it was merely inserted as an answer to such obligation as might be embodied in cl. (1), and was to fix a time at which the icebreaker assistance—in the sense which I have just explained—was to be available.

Then with regard to cl. (3), "Time lost by the vessel in waiting for icebreaker assistance," there was no special argument advanced, except this, that cl. (3) was used in order to find a distinction between cl. (3) and cl. (4). Counsel for the charterers' con- D tention was that cl. (4) was absolute, not only in language, but in effect, and reading it with cl. (3) and also with cl. (1), it amounts to this: If there had been such an arrangement as he contemplated to be required under cl. (1), for such icebreaker assistance as he contemplated was involved on his construction, and that icebreaker assistance appeared and was available for the steamer within forty-eight hours of the receipt of the notification of arrival in the one case, and the notification of readiness to leave in the E other case, no delay of any kind, or due to any circumstance which occurred after the icebreaker assistance was rendered free of expense to the steamer, would involve any responsibility on the charterers, even though the delay and the loss of time and the detention—I put aside the damage as involving rather different considerations—was due to the fact that the icebreaker absented itself for indefinite periods, or indeed, went away altogether, because that was a matter which was foreign to the obligations or the F responsibility. Such is the argument of the charterers.

Before dealing with the contentions of counsel for the charterers in detail it may be convenient to look at the decision of the House of Lords in the cases of the Anastasia and the Asko (1) of which I have already given the reference. There were two appeals and they were heard together, I think I will sufficiently indicate the broad distinctions between the contract in those cases and the contract in the present case by pointing to G certain differences—I do not say there are no other differences—but the differences I am going to point to are sufficient. In the first case, the case of the Anastasia (1) the charterers undertook to provide > "icebreaker assistance to enable the steamer to reach, load at, and leave loading port, steamer being free of expense for icebreaker assistance."

There the difference was obviously this: that the charterers undertook "to provide," H and not "arrange for the provision by the port authorities," and that icebreaker assistance is further defined as being to enable the steamer to reach, load at, and leave loading port. Then there is a clause in the Anastasia Case (1) which is identical with cl. (2) in the present contract, and there is a clause which is almost identical with cl. (3). In the other case, the case of the Asko (1) the clause was, so far as is material:

> "Charterers to supply the steamer with icebreaker assistance if required by the I captain to enable her to enter or leave the port of loading free of all expenses to the owners. . . . Icebreaker assistance to be rendered within forty-eight hours after steamer's arrival at the ice edge or readiness to leave the port of loading. Any time lost in waiting ice-breaking beyond forty-eight hours after readiness to proceed to be for charterers' account."

There again the differences, so far as material here, are comparable to those in the other case.

The principles which were laid down by the House of Lords for the construction of those words in those charterparties may be quite shortly summarised. In the first place, the House of Lords held that the language of cl. (2) to supply the steamer with icebreaker assistance is peremptory. It was said

> "That stipulation does not mean that the obligation is merely to make arrangements with the port authority or any other person for that supply. It is, I think, immaterial whether or not the charterers and the port authority can be treated as parts of one and the same juridical entity, whether the Soviet Government or any other person; as to this the evidence does not seem to me sufficient to justify my expressing any opinion; in either case the charterers have contracted to supply the assistance, and that, in my opinion, means either by themselves or by others, so that they cannot justify a failure to do so on the pretext that they had not the icebreakers under their control and could not get them supplied by those who controlled them. In that sense the obligation is absolute. The charterers assumed the obligation and the risk. It follows equally that the charterers' obligation is not limited to an obligation to do their best to supply. The language of the clause is peremptory."

The next point upon which I want to refer to the opinion of the House of Lords deals with another matter, and that is the position, in the opinion of the House of Lords, of the charterers in respect of the obligation to render icebreaker assistance after the specific time at which that obligation attaches; that is to say, forty-eight hours, in this case, after the notification, and, in the other cases, after readiness. There is, of course, a provision for the period of delay if icebreaker assistance is not rendered within the forty-eight hours, and in that respect I can see no difference between the cases which were before the House of Lords and the present case, and I do not think any is suggested. Then the opinion of the House of Lords goes on in this way:

> "But once the assistance has been supplied there is no stipulation as to time. The exact character of what is meant by the icebreaker assistance is not particularised save that it is to enable the ship to enter or leave the port free of all expense to owners. The judge has found in this case that for a period of six days after the Oktober first came the steamer had only icebreaker assistance for nine or ten hours, and that she then lay unassisted in Kronstadt Roads for three days, and again was left for some periods without icebreaker assistance between Jan. 9 and 12, 1931. The appellants did not explain why the assistance was so intermittent; in effect they contended that their obligation could not in any case be put higher than an obligation to do their best or to do what was reasonable, and that the onus lay on the respondents to show that they had not done their best or had not done what was reasonable. I think this contention is erroneous; there is in the clause a positive undertaking to render icebreaker assistance, which, I think, means primâ facie, assistance which is not casual or intermittent, and in order to justify a failure in that respect the charterers must show some excuse. The absence of icebreakers for such periods in the aggregate as the judge has here found is primâ facie a breach of the undertaking. I do not say that after the inception of the service absence of icebreaker assistance at some period or periods may not be justified; but I think the words of the clause are primâ facie not satisfied by intermittent assistance. I have already stated my opinion that it is immaterial whether or not the icebreakers are controlled by the charterers, because their responsibility is the same in either event. But it seems to me that there may be contingencies, such as perils of the seas, which, without anyone's fault, hinder or interrupt the service, without any liability attaching to the charterers in those respects. . . . The express obligation to render icebreaker assistance to the chartered vessel—that is, assistance sufficient or satisfactory for the specified purpose—involves a due regard both to her safety and her dispatch, and is paramount; hence the convoy system can only be justified so far as it can be reconciled with this paramount obligation."

Then there is a discussion with regard to proceeding in convoy, which is not material here, because no one has been told whether the absence from time to time of the icebreakers, which was found by the umpire, was due to the fact that they had too A many vessels in convoy or due to any other particular reason.

That was the decision of the House of Lords upon the construction of the contracts which they had before them, and although it is perfectly well recognised that the views of any tribunal, however exalted, upon the construction of a particular contract do not necessarily determine the construction of any other contract, because each contract is a thing by itself and has to be considered according to its own terms and B according to the totality of its conditions, yet in the present case, even if the two sets of contracts are not treated as identical, still there is such similarity in the general conditions under which they are entered into and such similarity in phraseology and their specific provisions, that the opinion of the House of Lords upon the construction of the contracts before them in the case to which I have referred, must afford great assistance in construing this particular contract. C

I have come to the conclusion that the views arrived at on the construction of this particular contract, both by the umpire and by the learned judge, are correct, and I find, in arriving at that conclusion, the greatest possible assistance by considering the previous decision of the House of Lords in the case to which I have referred. The first point which strikes one is a distinction in the language of cl. (1). I have, however, come to the conclusion that, according to its true construction, cl. (1) is quite clear and D unambiguous, and that it imports an obligation as absolute and peremptory as the obligation which was held to have been embodied in the cases of the Anastasia and the Asko (1). In the cases of the Anastasia and Asko (1) as I have already pointed out, the House of Lords held that the charterers had contracted to supply assistance either by themselves or by others. In this particular case they had undertaken to arrange for the provision of icebreaker assistance, if required by the captain. It is not unim- E portant to remember that there is, as was found in this case, a right under Russian law of any captain coming to the port to require himself icebreaker assistance. The provision, therefore, in cl. (1) is intended to give him a right against the charterers in excess of that right which he has at general law, and, in my opinion, the argument on behalf of the charterers would insert words qualifying "arrange." In my opinion "arrange for the provision of icebreaker assistance" means, not merely that the char- F terers are bound to take steps or to ask or to suggest to the port authorities that icebreaker assistance should be provided; they have to "arrange"—that means sufficiently or successfully—for the provision of icebreaker assistance; that means to secure the provision by the port authorities. If that is the true construction, then the obligation is on the charterers that that should be done—that the icebreaker assistance should be actually provided—and by that line of reasoning the result on the true construction G of cl. (1) is exactly the same as the result on the construction of the corresponding clauses in the cases of the Anastasia and the Asko (1). It is an obligation to provide icebreaker assistance, which, it is true, is not to be provided by the charterers personally, but they undertake that they will effectively and successfully arrange for that provision by the port authorities; that is to say, they undertake that, through the agency of the port authorities, icebreaker assistance will be provided. H

The next point which has been emphasised is that the words "icebreaker assistance" are used here without the addition of the words which are found in these other two cases, "to enable the vessel to enter or leave the port of loading." In my opinion, the absence of those words makes no difference. I think they are quite otiose. "Icebreaker assistance" means the assistance of an icebreaker, and not merely the physical presence of an icebreaker which does nothing; it means assistance for some purpose. I The only possible purpose under a contract of this nature and in those circumstances for which icebreaker assistance would be required to be given is to enable a vessel to enter or leave the port, and I therefore treat as quite immaterial the absence of those words. I think it constitutes no distinction at all.

Clause (2), in my judgment, strongly supports my conclusion that cl. (1) is clear and unambiguous. It is quite unqualified in its terms. It is peremptory in its terms:

> "Icebreaker assistance to be rendered free of expense to the steamer within 48 hours > of receipt by the captain of port (at loading port) of master's or owner's notification," and so on. That is subject to no qualification at all. It does not say if the port authorities had been able to satisfy our request, then icebreaker assistance will be rendered, and if it is not rendered within forty-eight hours, we will pay certain compensation. It says in terms "icebreaker assistance is to be rendered free of expense to the steamer," and that is the whole of the clause, which is absolute in its terms. It is perfectly true that in the third clause there is a provision as to the damages or compensation which are payable in the event of cl. (2) not being complied with. Clause (3) is in these terms:

> "Time lost by the vessel in waiting for icebreaker assistance at the edge of ice and when leaving the loading port in the excess of the time provided for in cl. (2) to count as demurrage and (or) detention and to be paid by charterers at the rate of £20 per day or pro rata from which time days saved in loading and (or) discharging shall be deducted."

That is treating the obligation under cl. (2) as a firm obligation, not qualifying it in any way, but providing liquidated damages in the event of any breach being committed of that obligation. As I have said, I think the language of cl. (2) supports the view I have arrived at, that cl. (1) is clearly a peremptory clause imposing an obligation.

Then comes cl. (4), which has been very much relied upon by counsel for the charterers. He uses cl. (4) as showing that the obligations resting on the charterers under cl. (1) were limited to doing something by way of arrangement with the port authorities, and then he says that view is corroborated and confirmed by cl. (4), which, following out that idea, provides in terms that > "the charterers shall not be responsible for any loss of time during passage through the ice and (or) any loss or damage caused to the steamer by ice or for any detention on passage through ice."

He does not hesitate to say that that clause is to be read in its full scope and meaning, without any qualification at all, and the result, therefore, would be that the charterers, having fulfilled, as he says, the conditions of cl. (1), and the icebreaker having appeared within forty-eight hours, no liability attaches to the charterers even though the icebreaker went away having broken a little ice and got the vessel inside the ice and on its passage through the ice, and even though under those circumstances the icebreaker went away and left the vessel peacefully in the ice until the spring came and released it. Of course, if those words are to be taken in their widest sense, without any qualification or any other limitation, then, no doubt, that view is right. "Any detention on passage through ice," if unqualified, would cover anything of that sort. However, not only do I disagree with the suggested construction of cl. (1), but I also think that cl. (4) is to be read subject to a qualification which is almost certainly, in the majority of cases, to be implied wherever you have an exceptions clause. I accept the statement of principle which was given by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Gibaud v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (2), a case which on the facts is considerably removed from this case. Indeed, the statement by SCRUTTON, L.J., evidently cannot be regarded as anything but a matter of observation, but, coming from so great a lawyer, in any view what he says is worthy of serious consideration, and I venture to think that the passage I refer to is so well expressed as to be of great value in a case like this, which is different on its facts. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1921] 2 K.B. at p. 435):

> "The point argued here was that the appellant was not bound by the conditions relieving the company from liability, because the company had not kept the bicycle in the place in which they had contracted to keep it."

The question in that case was whether a bicycle could be kept in a cloakroom or could be kept in a station. The learned LORD JUSTICE goes on to say this:

> "The principle is well known, and perhaps Lilley v. Doubleday (4) is the best illustration, that if you undertake to do a thing in a certain way, or to keep a thing in a certain place, with certain conditions protecting it, and have broken the contract > by not doing the thing contracted for in any way contracted for, or not keeping A the article in the place in which you have contracted to keep it, you cannot rely on the conditions which were only intended to protect you if you carried out the contract in the way in which you had contracted to do it. In Lilley v. Doubleday (4) the defendant had contracted to warehouse certain goods at the main warehouse. He warehoused part of them at another place, and, without negligence on his part, they were lost from the other place. It was held that though he would have been B protected if the goods had been lost without negligence from the place where he had contracted to keep them, he lost that protection when he warehoused them in a place where he had not contracted to keep them."

ATKIN, L.J., in a later case, the Cap Palos (3) quoted these words with approval. That was a case where under a towage contract the vessel was lost because the defendant had either taken away the tugs, or not taken proper steps to send them back, and left the C sailing ship on the shore so that she was lost; at any rate he had temporarily given up any attempt to continue the towage, and left the performance of his duties to others. It was held in that case that a similar limitation to that expressed by SCRUTTON, L.J., must be put on the very sweeping words of exception in that contract.

In this case, if I am right in holding that cl. (1) is clear and unambiguous in the sense in which I have indicated, then it cannot be cut down by cl. (4), because from the very D nature of things cl. (1) is established as a dominant and overriding clause, and cl. (4) is merely a clause of exception and as such must be construed with that limitation, which always applies to a clause of exception in a case like this where it is sought to apply it to cases where the provisions of the dominant clause are not being fulfilled; in other words, cls. (1) and (4) must be read together so that they can receive harmonious effect. In other words, freedom from responsibility only applies to cases in which there E is a performance of, or an attempt to perform, the conditions of cl. (1). If the conditions of cl. (1) are not being complied with, then cl. (4) will not relieve from responsibility for any breach of cl. (1), because cl. (4) might have been quite differently expressed. However peremptory cl. (1) might be in itself, you might have in cl. (4) words of exception so precise and so sweeping as to excuse any breach whatever of cl. (1), but that is not the effect of cl. (4) in the present case. Again, it might be that if cl. (1) was ambigu- F ous and uncertain, then the language of cl. (4) might be brought in in order to explain the ambiguity and to give a more limited effect to cl. (1). Taking the view I do of the effect of both these clauses, I think they can only be read together by giving the dominant effect to cl. (1) and the more limited effect to cl. (4).

There is only one other point I need note, and that is that cl. (4), it was said by counsel for the charterers, is clearly supererogatory in view of the decision of the House of G Lords, in the passage to which I have referred to the Anastasia Case (1) indicating that there may be difficulties in performance, but which are not inconsistent with a due regard to cl. (1) in which no liability would attach to the charterers. That may or may or may not be so, but in any view the broad ruling which was given in the House of Lords was not given until this clause was settled. In effect, I do not question that the charterers have sought to minimise the liabilities which have been declared to attach H to them under the former ice clause, but no doubt they have had to deviate as little as possible from the language which the shipowners had accepted, and would be willing to accept, and I think the changes which have been made in the ice clauses in this case have not relieved them of the obligation under which the shipowners in the earlier cases were held to be.

In those circumstances, I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs. I

ROMER, L.J.—The question which falls to be decided in this appeal is whether the obligation of the charterers, under the ice clause contained in the charterparty, is merely an obligation to arrange for the provision of icebreaker assistance at the ice edge when the ship is going into port and at the wharfside when the ship has completed her loading, or whether it is an obligation to arrange for the provision of continuous icebreaker assistance while the ship is passing in the first case through the ice to the wharfside, and in the second case from the wharfside to the open sea. If the obligation is the former

A of those two, then this appeal is entitled to succeed; if, on the other hand, the obligation is the latter of the two which I have mentioned, then I think it has failed. Having regard to the decision in the House of Lords in Ugleexport Charkow v. Anastasia (Owners) and Russian Wood Agency, Ltd. v. Dampskibsselskabet Heimdal (the latter case referred to as the Asko) (1), and the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Cap Palos Case (3) to which my Lord has referred, this appeal must be dismissed.

B If cl. (1) of the ice clause be ambiguous in its terms, that is to say, if it will admit of a construction which will place either the one or the other of those two obligations upon the charterers, there is a great deal to be said on the part of the charterers, because if there be that ambiguity it may well be argued that cls. (2) and (4), and probably (3), resolve that ambiguity in favour of the charterers. Clause (2) provides as follows:

> C "Icebreaker assistance to be rendered free of expense to the steamer within forty-eight hours of receipt by the captain of port (at loading port), master's or owner's notification of arrival at the edge of ice, or when leaving port forty-eight hours after notification by the master of readiness to leave."

It is quite plain that if the icebreaking assistance be of the continuous nature to which I have referred, it cannot possibly be rendered within forty-eight hours after the ship's D arrival at the ice edge, or within forty-eight hours after the ship has completed her loading. It might be said that that clause, therefore, indicates that the obligation of affording the icebreaker assistance required by cl. (1) is an obligation of the more limited assistance and not of the continuous and full assistance to which I have referred. That construction would then be assisted by a consideration of cls. (3) and (4) inasmuch as by cl. (3) it is found that sanctions are provided for in the event, and in the event E only, apparently, of a failure to render icebreaker assistance at the edge of the ice and at the wharfside, and that no express sanctions are mentioned in the event of failure on the part of the charterers to render continuous assistance until the ship has got through the ice, in the one case to the wharf and in the other case from the wharf to the open sea. On the contrary, cl. (4) in express terms provides that:

> F "The charterers shall not be responsible for any loss of time during passage through the ice and (or) any loss or damage caused to the steamer by ice, or for any detention on passage through ice."

That argument, if cl. (1) be ambiguous in its language, strikes me as being a very forcible one, but in my opinion cl. (1) is not ambiguous. It was indeed suggested at one time, that no two business people would agree that a charterer should provide means of assistance at the edge of ice and at the wharf, and that the shipowner should be G responsible for the provision of the giving of assistance during the passage through the ice. I do not myself understand that, because in the vast majority of cases the charterer has no more control over the icebreaking vessels than has the owner of a ship. I do not know why a priori the obligation should be thrown on the charterers rather than on the shipowners, but, however that may be, it appears to me that cl. (1), when properly read, admits of one construction, and one construction only. It says:

> H "In the event of the port of loading being inaccessible by reason of ice" what does that mean? It means in the event of the ship being unable, by reason of ice, to reach the port. Then it goes on:

> "Or in case ice sets in after vessel's arrival at port of loading" what does that mean? In case after loading, the ship is unable to reach the open sea I by reason of ice. Then:

> "The charterers undertake to arrange for the provision by the port authorities of icebreaker assistance"

what is that assistance? It must be the assistance to enable the ship to overcome the difficulties which are referred to in the words I have already read, difficulties arising from those two events. If, as I think is the case, those words are unambiguous—that is to say, if it is plain from that language that the obligation is to provide continuous assistance until the ship reaches the wharf in the one case, and the open sea in the other case—it is our duty as a court of construction to put such a construction on the subsequent clauses, if that construction is proper, as will not render them repugnant to cl. (1). A

Remembering that, I see whether it is possible to construe cl. (2) and cl. (4) so as not to be repugnant to the obligation in the plain terms imposed by cl. (1). Clause (2) says:

> "Icebreaker assistance to be rendered free of expense to the steamer within forty-eight hours," and so on. It is to be observed that it does not say: The icebreaker assistance which is referred to in cl. 1, but merely "icebreaker assistance." In other words, the assistance must begin at the ice edge within forty-eight hours of the arrival of the ship, and that icebreaker assistance must begin again when the ship is ready to leave the wharf. Clause (2) is not necessarily referring to the full assistance which has to be rendered under cl. (1). Then when we come to cl. (4) we are entitled and bound, I think, to put C a construction upon it which will have the effect of inserting in the clause the words: Performing their obligation. The words are these: "The charterers shall not be responsible," and so on. I think the proper construction of that clause, having regard to the decision in the Cap Palos Case (3) is: The charterers performing their obligations under cl. (1) shall not be responsible for any loss during passage through the ice and (or) any loss or damage caused, and so on. I will not read again the case of the Cap Palos (3), D but in the course of giving his judgment in that case Atkin, L.J., quoted a statement of a principle which is to be applied in such cases, which was a statement of principle made by Scrutton, L.J., in an earlier case. The Master of the Rolls read out that passage, and I do not propose to read it again. Applying that principle to cl. (4), as I think in the circumstances we are obliged to, it follows that this appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

E

EVE, J.—I agree entirely with the judgments which have just been pronounced, and the conclusions to which they take us, and I have nothing to add.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I should have said that we attach no importance to the fact that in cl. (3) there is a specification with regard to the liquidated damages, and that there is no reference to the measure of damages in cl. (4). It is very common F in contracts of affreightment to append a clause with regard to liquidated damages with regard to one particular breach, and to say nothing about the damages in regard to another class of breach. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Will—Revocation—Will exercising power of appointment—General revocatory clause in later will—Effect on exercise of power—Burden of proof.

Although a general revocatory clause in a will does not of necessity revoke an earlier exercise of a power of appointment by will, the burden of proof to show that the clause does not revoke the exercise of the power is heavy upon the party who asserts such a proposition. There must be sufficient evidence to establish that the testator did not intend to revoke the previous exercise of the power.

Probate Action.

The plaintiffs, two children of the testator, propounded a will dated June 18, 1917, a codicil dated June 17, 1920, and a will of April 27, 1925, of Colonel Ernest Frederick Lowthorpe-Lutwidge, late of Holmrook Hall, Cumberland, and the Devonshire Club, Eastbourne, who died on Sept. 20, 1929. By the two former instruments the testator had exercised powers of appointment in favour of the plaintiffs. On June 2, 1924, the testator entered into a deed of family arrangement, and made other instruments all disposing of his property in a manner inconsistent with the earlier will and codicil. His only estate remaining at the date of the will of 1925 which was not affected by the earlier testamentary papers or the deed of family arrangement and other instruments executed in 1924 did not exceed £40 in value. The later will of 1925 was a holograph one as follows:

> "I revoke all former wills, this being my last will and testament. I give and bequeathe everything I die possessed of to Major Hugh Owen Swanston. Should he predecease me I give everything I die possessed of to my daughter, Mrs. Marjorie Spooner"

(one of the plaintiffs). No executor was named in this will, and on Nov. 12, 1929, administration with that will alone annexed was granted to the residuary legatee, Major Swanston, save and except settled land. On March 19, 1930, a grant of administration limited to the settled land vested in the testator at his death was granted to Major Swanston and certain other parties trustees of the settled land as executors thereof. Major Swanston died in 1933.

The first defendant, who was the eldest son of the testator and tenant for life of the settled land by his defence said that the earlier will and codicil was revoked by the later will of 1925. The other defendants, the executors of Major Swanston, by their plea, submitted to the judgment of the court.

Clifford Mortimer and F. S. H. Bryant, for the plaintiffs.—There was no animus revocandi as to the earlier testamentary papers when the testator made the will of 1925 with the assistance of lay friends, and therefore probate should be granted in respect of all three papers. The revocation clause in the will of 1925 did not operate to revoke provisions in the earlier will and codicil which were of two kinds, an exercise of a power A of appointment in a marriage settlement, and changes made in the will by the codicil for the benefit of the testator's younger children. It was held by his Lordship in Smith v. Thompson (2), that a revocatory clause in a will did not revoke the previous exercise in a former will of a special power of appointment. There it was sought to show that a general revocatory clause in a will which dealt with a merely nominal question of property revoked the previous exercise of a power of appointment over the bulk of the B estate. It was a matter of intention whether it was in the mind of a testator to revoke a former provision. In Gladstone v. Tempest (3) it was laid down that probate might be granted of a testamentary paper which was earlier in date than a paper with a revocatory clause provided that the court was satisfied that there was no revocatory intention. The cases of In the Goods of Oswald (4) and In the Goods of Moore (5) also support my proposition. C

Roxburgh, K.C., and H. W. Barnard, for the first defendant.—The rule that a capable testator knows and approves of the contents of a will (Gregson v. Taylor (1)) so that clear evidence is required to exclude any part of it, has been extended to words of revocation in Collins v. Elstone (6). It has been finally established in Re Kingdon; Wilkins v. Pryer (7) that a general clause of revocation revokes an earlier exercise of a power of appointment by will. In that case KAY, J., relied on Sotheran v. Dening (8), D in which BAGGALLAY, L.J., said:

> "It has been decided that a general revocation of wills does not necessarily revoke an appointment by will. . . . But it must be shown that it is entirely unreasonable that it should have that effect; otherwise it will be a revocation."

Both cases were approved by Sir F. JEUNE, P., in Cadell v. Wilcocks (9). Smith v. E
Thompson (2) is distinguishable, because there was evidence that the testatrix adhered to her intention to benefit the party in whose favour she had previously exercised the power. That case, in my submission, cannot be regarded as laying down a proposition contrary to the well-established principle.

Bush James, for the other defendants.

Bayford, K.C., and W. T. Elverston, for an investment company, incumbrancers on F the interest of the first defendant.—I adopt Mr. Roxburgh's argument and refer to the judgment of SALTER, J., in Beech v. Public Trustee (10) in support of it. Further administration has already been granted, and the investment company has lent money on that basis.

T. Bucknill, for trustees of the will of the earlier settlor creating the powers exercised by the testator. G

Cur. adv. vult.

April 17.—LANGTON, J., reviewed the facts and continued:

The point for determination, and the only point, is this: whether the testator, in the clause in the will revoking all former wills, intended to revoke a will of June 18, 1917, and a subsequent codicil of June 17, 1920. H

Now, it is convenient, in most cases, to establish the facts first and to apply the law afterwards; but in this case I think perhaps it will be convenient to reverse that procedure. A decision of my own in a case of Smith v. Thompson (2) was much pressed upon me by counsel for the plaintiffs, and quite properly so, as being an authority for what he wanted to do in the present case, that is to say, to establish that there was no animus revocandi on the part of Colonel Lowthorpe-Lutwidge on April 27, 1925. Now, I upon that matter, I think it is most material to examine what has been laid down in this court upon that broad proposition, animus revocandi, and the first case which it is most important to keep in mind is Gregson v. Taylor (1), in which HILL, J. ([1917] P. at p. 261), said:

> "Assuming that it is no longer a binding rule in cases where there is no fraud or suspicion of fraud that a capable testator who reads or has read to him a testamentary paper which he thereafter executes must be taken to know and approve of its contents, yet the direction which a judge should give a jury or himself must > be put at least as high as this, that when it is proved that a will has been read over to or by a capable testator and he then executes it, these circumstances afford a very grave and strong presumption that he knew and approved all the contents, a presumption which can be rebutted only by the clearest evidence. The presumption is that the words which have been read over to and then signed by a capable testator as his will do represent his will, his whole will, and nothing but his will. And if it is said that they represent his will and something more, then before that something more can be rejected as not being his will, it must be established beyond all doubt that it is not his will."

That is most material to bear in mind in dealing with this class of case.

What I said in the case of Smith v. Thompson (2), which was an unusual case in every way, was this (146 L.T. at p. 17):

> "For the defendants it was submitted that the court could not look inside the terms of the document and must not speculate on what was in the mind of the testatrix. I think in the main that principle is a safe guide, and the court should be very slow to endeavour to interpret words in an instrument which are not ambiguous in a sense contrary to natural sense. As was said in one case, that process comes very near to making a new will. But here the instrument omits to deal with what is practically the bulk of the testatrix's property. On the authority of the cases cited it is possible to look at the surrounding circumstances and consider whether the general revocatory clause was intended to revoke the earlier exercise of the power of appointment."

I think that counsel, for the defendants in this case, was a little nervous or apprehensive that that last statement goes a little too far, but, it must be taken in its context, was intended to apply to that case and to the facts of that case, and should not be taken out of it as being a general dictum that it is possible in every case to look at all surrounding circumstances and make a kind of vague and unlimited inquiry into what the testator intended. I then went on to say this: "Mr. Mortimer impressed on me the dictum of Sir Herbert Jenner in Gladstone v. Tempest (3)." I then cited what Sir Herbert Jenner said there. I have looked at it again, and I think that is as closely a worded statement as one could wish upon this matter, because what Sir Herbert Jenner said there was (2 Curt. at p. 653):

> "It has been over and over again laid down that probate of a paper may be granted of a date prior to a will with a revocatory clause, provided the court is satisfied that it was not the deceased's intention to revoke that particular legacy or benefit."

That is quite concisely stated and exactly what has been pressed upon the court here, that the court should say it was not the intention of the testator to revoke the legacies and benefits contained in the earlier will of 1917 and the codicil of 1920.

I think there is power to act in that way if the court is satisfied that it was not the intention of the testator to so revoke. The burden, in that case, however, is heavy. It is a heavy burden upon a plaintiff who comes into this court to say: I agree that the testator was in every way fit to make a will, I agree that the will which he has made is perfectly clear and unambiguous in its terms, I agree that it contains a revocatory clause in simple words; nevertheless, I say that he did not really intend to revoke the earlier bequests in earlier wills. I think quite obviously the burden must be heavy upon anybody who comes to assert a proposition of that kind.

I need not, perhaps, refer to Collins v. Elstone (6), a decision of Lord St. Helier in which he refused entirely to allow words of revocation to be, as it were, erased even though the testatrix had been specifically advised that they meant something different from what they really did mean. If it is necessary to make any distinction, it may be said that that case was more a statement of the law than of fact. It really is a question in each case for the court to decide: is there evidence, and sufficient evidence, to establish that the testator did not intend to revoke? I do not think really the law is more complicated than that. I hold as a fact in the present case that the deed of family arrangement was intended by the testator to be a final disposition of his property, and that he no longer intended when he made the will of 1925 that the bequests he had made by the earlier will and codicil should take effect. There was no evidence that the testator was incapable or that the document of 1925 was beyond his comprehension. It was also clear that he thought he had dealt in the deed of family arrangement with all his property except chattels of small value.

It would require strong evidence to assist the plaintiffs to discharge the burden on them, and the evidence, so far as I can approach it, is rather strongly the other way. I think the bulk of the evidence in this case, and the result of it is in favour of the defendants' contention. It is not necessary for them to establish that the testator intended to revoke. If I had to determine it, I should say that there was evidence, and quite strong evidence, to show that he did intend to revoke, and, whether or no he had the will of 1917 and the codicil of 1920 present to his mind, he intended what he said in his will of 1925. That being so, the plaintiffs, to my mind, fail to establish the burden that is upon them, and the action fails. I pronounce for the will of April 27, 1925, and against the two earlier dispositions.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Porter, J.), November 7, 1935]

Hire-Purchase—Distress—Notice to terminate hire-purchase agreement sent by post—Agreement terminable "thereupon"—Notice posted before, but received after, distress levied—Goods no longer comprised in hire-purchase agreement—Date from which notice speaks—Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 53), ss. 1, 4 (1).

A hire-purchase agreement contained a clause entitling the owners of the goods hired to terminate the agreement in certain events (which had happened) "by written notice sent by post (or otherwise) to, or left at, the hirer's last known address" and providing that "thereupon the hirer shall no longer be in possession of the goods with the owners' consent."

Held: a notice sent by post pursuant to that clause operated to terminate the agreement from the moment when it was put in the post for delivery to the addressee, and, therefore, from that moment the goods were no longer comprised in a hire-purchase agreement within the meaning of s. 4 (1) of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, and so could not be distrained on by the hirer's landlord for arrears of rent.

Browne v. Black (1), [1912] 1 K.B. 316, distinguished.

Notes. In this case there was no evidence whether the goods were liable to distress as being "in the possession order or disposition of the tenant by the consent and permission of the true owner"; but in Times Furnishing Co., Ltd. v. Hutchings, [1938] 1 All E.R. 422, it was said, obiter at p. 428, that notice to the hirer, similar to that in this case, would determine any such consent or permission.

Action

The plaintiffs, owners, Drages, Ltd., of Oxford-street, W., claimed the return of certain furniture and damages for its detention from the defendants, Mr. Owen, of D Stockwell-road, the landlord, and Mr. L. Samuel, of Newington-causeway, the bailiff.

The furniture in question had been let by the plaintiffs under a hire-purchase agreement to a Mr. Narciso, who was tenant of premises in Stockwell-road of which the first defendant was landlord. The agreement contained a clause which entitled the owners, in the events which had happened, to terminate it by sending a written notice by post to the hirer, and the question in issue was whether such a notice operated from the E moment when it was put in the post or only from the moment when it was received by the hirer. On June 26, 1934, the hirer was in arrears with his rent to the extent of £3 19s., and the landlord instructed Mr. Samuel, a certificated bailiff, to levy a distress. The bailiff did so at 8.5 a.m. on June 26, and seized and impounded certain furniture. The goods seized were the property of the owners and were, up to June 25, comprised in a hire-purchase agreement dated Feb. 9, 1934, made between the owners and the hirer. F On June 25 the hire-rent was more than seven days in arrear. The owners on that day signed a notice addressed to the hirer stating that "our agreement with you, dated Feb. 9, 1934, is absolutely determined and ended for all purposes pursuant to cl. 5 thereof," which notice was posted to the hirer at his last known address by registered post on that day. The registered letter was delivered at the premises in Stockwell-road at 8.20 a.m. on June 26—a quarter of an hour after the distress had taken place.

G By cl. 4 of the hire-purchase agreement the owners were entitled to terminate the hiring at any time without notice if, inter alia, the hire-rent was seven days in arrear. By cl. 5:

> "Whenever the owners be entitled to terminate the hiring . . . [they] may by written notice sent (by post or otherwise) to or left at the hirer's last known address forthwith and for all purposes absolutely determine and end this agreement as well H as the hiring hereby constituted and thereupon the hirer shall no longer be in possession of the goods with the owners' consent. . . ."

By the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, s. 4 (1), the protection from distress given by that Act to the goods of third parties does not apply to goods comprised in a hire-purchase agreement, nor to goods in the possession, order, or disposition of the I tenant by the consent and permission of the true owner in such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof.

If, therefore, the hire-purchase agreement had been terminated at the moment the notice was put in the post the owners were entitled to recover the goods. But if the notice only operated from the moment of its delivery at the premises in Stockwell-road, the goods fell within s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1908 and the landlord and the bailiff were entitled to distrain on them.

PORTER, J.—This is an action brought by Drages, Ltd., the well-known furnishers, A the owners of the goods here in question, and I suppose I may take judicial notice of the fact that they are accustomed to supply considerable quantities of furniture on the hire-purchase system. In this particular case their claim is in respect of certain furniture, which I need not specify, which was let on the hire-purchase system to a Mr. Narciso, the hirer, under an agreement dated Feb. 9, 1934. I will come to the terms of the agreement at a later stage, but the claim is made not against the hirer but against B the two defendants, Mr. Owen the landlord and Mr. Samuel the bailiff. The claim arises in this way: the furniture which was so hired to the hirer was to be kept at his house in Stockwell-road, South-West London. That house belonged to the first-named defendant, Mr. Owen, who was the landlord. At a time when the hire-purchase agreement was still in force the rent of those premises fell into arrear, and the landlord was minded to distrain on the furniture in order to secure his rent. For that purpose he C employed the second defendant, the bailiff, to seize the furniture and distrain for the rent. At the same time that the rent fell into arrear the payments under the hire-purchase agreement also fell into arrear, with the result that there were certain rights, which I will come to more particularly later on, vested in the owners, entitling them to determine the hire-purchase agreement.

The case has been argued without any evidence owing to the convenient arrangement, D very properly made between the parties, by which certain admissions of fact were made. Those admissions specified the facts which I have stated, and they also specified that the levy for the rent was a levy for £3 19s.; that that levy was made by the bailiff at 8.5 a.m. on June 26, 1934; that the property seized was part of the furniture let under the hire-purchase agreement and belonged to the owners; that up to at least the day before the seizure—that is, up to June 25—those goods were all comprised in the hire- E purchase agreement; that on June 25, the hirer, being in arrear with his payments, the owners had, as they were entitled to do under the hire-purchase agreement, signed a written notice determining the hire-purchase agreement and put it in the post. The admission of facts then adds that that particular notice, which was sent by registered letter, was not delivered at the premises of the hirer until 8.20 a.m. on June 26, 1934. That means that, although the notice was sent the day before the seizure under the dis- F traint for rent, it was not delivered until fifteen minutes after that distraint had been put in force.

In those circumstances the question which I have to determine is whether the landlord was entitled to make the seizure and to retain the property, or whether the owners were entitled to the property as being theirs. No difficulties would have arisen before the Law of Distress (Amendment) Act, 1908, because before that time the landlord G would have been entitled to seize property which he found on the premises and to hold it for his own, although it belonged to a third party. But the Act—if I may put it generally, without being considered to be entirely accurate in my statement, but sufficiently accurate for the case before me—allowed those third persons to avoid the difficulties of seizure of their furniture and to claim the furniture, despite the distress. There are, however, certain limitations on that right. One limitation is if the furniture H be held under a hire-purchase agreement; another is that it does not apply to goods

> "in the possession, order, or disposition of such tenant by the consent and permission of the true owner under such circumstances that such tenant is the reputed owner thereof."

In this particular case there is no doubt that the owners were third parties whose I property the goods were, but it is equally plain that at some time the property was held under a hire-purchase agreement, and it is claimed on behalf of the landlord and the bailiff that at the time of the seizure under the distress the property was held under a hire-purchase agreement, or was, to use the phraselogy of the Act, in the reputed ownership—if I may use that as a truncated phrase for the purpose of this judgment—of the hirer. So far as the ownership is concerned I indicated in the course of the argument of counsel that that must be proved in evidence, and that unless it was proved by evidence given on behalf of the landlord and the bailiff that part of the defence was not established. The landlord and the bailiff elected thereupon not to give evidence and, in accordance with the view which I expressed in argument, I find it has not been proved that the goods were > "in the possession, order, or disposition of such tenant by the consent and permission of the true owner under such circumstances that such tenant is the reputed owner."

It may be—and as to this I do not express any final opinion—that the goods were being held under a hire-purchase agreement and were > "in the possession, order, or disposition of such tenant by the consent and permission of the true owner," but the landlord and the bailiff have to go further and show that they were in such possession in such circumstances that the tenant was the reputed owner, and that, I think, has not been proved.

Now I come to the second and more difficult part of the case. What is the true view with regard to the hire-purchase agreement? Had that been determined before 8.5 a.m. on June 26, 1934? I ought to add this further fact to the statement of facts, that it is agreed that the furniture has found its way back into the possession of the owners. It is not agreed how it found its way back, but it has, and the position is that if the owners are wrong they agree that they should pay the sum of £3 19s. rent; but if they are right they say that they ought to pay nothing and are entitled to retain the furniture.

There is no doubt that the hire-purchase was determined, and was properly determined; but the question which I have to decide is at what time that determination took place. That must depend on the terms of the agreement between the parties. The agreement, by cl. 1, provides for the payment of hire by the hirer. Clause 2 provides that the hirer shall be the owner of the property on due performance of the agreement and payment of the whole amount of the sums payable. Clause 3 I need not trouble about except that it is a provision that the furniture shall be kept at the particular address given in the hire-purchase agreement. Clause 4 becomes more material because, after specifying that the hirer may, on giving seven days' notice in writing, terminate the hiring, it provides that with regard to the owner of the furniture he may at > "any time without notice terminate the hiring if either (a) hire-rent be in arrears seven days or there be any breach of this agreement committed or suffered by the hirer."

So far as that is concerned, the hire-rent was in arrears for seven days and there was, therefore, a breach of the agreement. By cl. 4 the owner can terminate the hiring, but that clause does not terminate the whole agreement. It leaves open certain matters to be done, and it therefore leaves the agreement in force. So far as that is concerned, if that were the only clause, I should hold that the principles applied in Hackney Furnishing Co. v. Watts (2), and in the case of Jay's Furnishing Co. v. Brand & Co. (3), applied here and that the hiring was still in existence.

But the hire-purchase agreement goes on to deal, in cl. 5, with a further state of affairs, and it is on cl. 5 that my judgment must be given. That clause states:

> "Whenever the owners be entitled to terminate the hiring" —and that is this case, because they were entitled to terminate the hiring—they may enter and seize, and so on. It then goes on, in words which require careful consideration:

> "Alternatively or if on any such entry the furniture be not delivered up the owners may by written notice sent (by post or otherwise) to or left at the hirer's last known address forthwith and for all purposes absolutely determine and end this agreement as well as the hiring hereby constituted, and thereupon the hirer shall no longer be in possession of the goods with the owners' consent nor shall either party thereafter have any rights hereunder."

The steps set out in cl. 5 were taken by the owners, the agreement was completely terminated, and it seems to me that a complete ending of the hiring took place, so that A there was no longer any hire-purchase agreement in existence.

In those circumstances, under the decision of Smart Bros., Ltd. v. Holt (4), there is no hire-purchase agreement, and, therefore, as soon as the date on which the hire-purchase agreement ended had been reached, the owners of the goods would be entitled to say: "You may not distrain on these goods because they are my own goods and there is no hire-purchase agreement in existence in respect of them." That, of course, leaves B open the question at what moment the hire-purchase agreement ended. In considering that matter it is to be observed that primarily cl. 5 of the hire-purchase agreement is not dealing with time at all but with method. I think that is what the parties are there concerned with. They are concerned with the method by which the hiring may be terminated—that is to say, by the sending of a notice either by post or by leaving it at the hirer's last-known place of abode. But, of course, time is brought into the clause, C because it goes on to say:

> "Thereupon the hirer shall no longer be in possession of the goods."

It has then to be determined what "thereupon" means—upon what? Reading that with the part of the clause which goes before, I think it means upon written notice by post or otherwise being sent to or left at the hirer's last-known address.

The question then is, so far as the words "sent to" are concerned, from what time those D words speak. On behalf of the plaintiffs it is maintained that "notice sent to" must speak from the time at which the notice is sent; if it be put into the post, it is the moment at which it is put into the post; if it be otherwise sent, it is the moment at which it is dispatched. On behalf of the defendants it is said that the time at which they speak is the time at which either the notice reaches the address or the time at which in E the ordinary course of post, if it is sent by post, or the ordinary course if sent by messenger, it will reach that address. I do not find myself able to speculate as to any question of what time it would take to reach the address if sent either by post or by messenger. I am impressed by the argument that it would be difficult to say at what moment either a letter or a message might be expected to reach the address at which the notice had to be delivered. I do not think I can go outside the words themselves, and, F when the wording of the document says "sent to," I think that that means at the moment it is sent; just as when it uses the phrase "left at" that means the moment at which the notice in fact is left. I think that the true construction of "thereupon" would be—and upon the sending by post or otherwise of the notice or leaving it at the hirer's last-known address the rights under the agreement come finally to an end.

Certain cases have been quoted in the course of the argument on the matter. In the G first, Browne v. Black (1), the question arose on the Solicitors Act, 1843, and the decision there was that > "a bill is not 'sent by the post' to the party to be charged one month before action unless it was posted at such a time that it would in the ordinary course of post be delivered to the party to be charged one clear calendar month before the commencement of the action."

H

The decision there was made, as all decisions of construction must be made, in the light of the surrounding circumstances. I have always had a certain amount of sympathy for the decision of BUCKLEY, L.J., as he then was, but I am bound by, and must loyally follow, the decision of the other two members of the court in a case where that decision applies. But this case appears to me to differ from Browne v. Black (1) in that here there are no surrounding circumstances such as giving a notice so that the hirer of I the goods might have a particular time in which to do something. Indeed, the whole object of cl. 5 of the hire-purchase agreement is to enable the owner to put an end to the hiring and to protect himself. Perhaps one of the matters from which he wants to protect himself is the seizure of the furniture by the landlord. I am not at all sure, although I do not found my judgment on this, that the primary object of the clause is not for that very purpose. In that case there is no particular reason that I can see in the surrounding circumstances for making the notice speak only as from the time when in the ordinary course it would be delivered at the address. In the case of Browne

A v. Black (1) there was good reason for that, because, although it could be shown that the notice under the Solicitors Act reached the client within one month from the date of the posting, it was decided that it was desirable to give him an opportunity of considering it for one month. It was from that angle that the decision in the case of Browne v. Black (1) was given, and it was for that reason that words which might normally speak at the time of the posting of the letter did not speak until the time at which the letter B would be received in the ordinary course of post.

I think that the present case much more nearly conforms to Retail Dairy Co., Ltd. v. Clarke (5), although, as was pointed out quite rightly on behalf of the landlord and the bailiff, the wording in that case is not "left at" but simply "sent to." When I consider the analogy of the words "left at" I do not find myself assisted to come to a conclusion in favour of the landlord and the bailiff by those words. Indeed, if "left at" were the C vital words, then I do not see any real need for the provision with regard to sending "by post or otherwise." If the whole object was that the notice should reach the hirer, then I should have thought "left at" itself would be sufficient. At any rate, I do not see that that provision is a reason for saying that the moment at which the hiring is terminated is to be concluded by one limb of the alternative given and not by the other.

In those circumstances I find that the owners are entitled to recover their furniture. D I ought to add this, that I do not find myself assisted either way by the cases of offer and acceptance, or withdrawal of offer after acceptance has been sent through the post. Those cases seem to me to give rise to different considerations and do not assist me to come to a conclusion in the present case. In my view, on the true construction of the hire-purchase agreement, the hire-purchase agreement came to an end at the moment that the registered letter was delivered to the post office, when it was sent by post to E the hirer. In those circumstances the hire-purchase agreement was determined before the distraint for rent took place, and the owners are entitled to recover the furniture.

INVESTMENT TRUST CORPORATION, LTD. v. SINGAPORE TRACTION CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer and Maugham, L.JJ.), May 1, 1935]

Company—Capital—Payment out of—Payment in consideration of surrender of management agreement—Benefit to revenue.

In 1925, on the formation of the S. T. company, a contract was entered into for the management of the undertaking by the S. E. company, it being agreed that the S. E. company should be given a controlling voting power in the S. T. company, C and should be entitled to receive 50 per cent. of the profits of that company. After some years the directors of the S. T. company thought it in the interest of their company that those management powers should be determined, one of the grounds of that decision being that at that time the boards of directors of the two companies were quite distinct and in places far distant from one another. As a result, it was proposed that the S. E. company should cease to manage the D S. T. company and should surrender its voting rights and its right to a half share of the S. T. company's profits and that the S. T. company, in consideration thereof, should pay to the S. E. company £100,000 which it proposed to raise by an issue of debentures. On a motion by a shareholder for an injunction restraining the S. T. company from entering into the proposed agreement.

Held: under that agreement the S. T. company would be getting an advantage, E which the directors of the company had bona fide valued at £100,000 and so would be getting money's worth for their expenditure, and, therefore, the company would be entitled to provide the £100,000 out of its capital resources even though, as a result, the revenue of the company would benefit.

Appeal from an order of EVE, J. H

The plaintiff company, a shareholder in the Singapore Traction Co., Ltd., the first defendant, applied to EVE, J., for an interlocutory injunction restraining the Singapore company until judgment in the action from entering into an agreement by which, in consideration of the second defendant, the Shanghai Electric Construction Co., releasing all rights of management of the Singapore company, the Singapore company should pay the Shanghai company £100,000 to be raised by an issue of debentures. The I Shanghai company, in consideration of managing the Singapore company, had received each year of its management one-half of the profits of the Singapore company. EVE, J., granted the injunction, taking the view that he was bound to do so by the decision in Famatina Development Corpn., Ltd. v. Bury (1).

The facts appear in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Gavin Simmonds, K.C., and Gordon Brown for the Singapore company.

Lionel Cohen, K.C., and A. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the Shanghai company.

Harold Christie, K.C., and J. G. Strangman for the Investment Trust company.

A The judgment of the Court of Appeal was agreed to be treated as the judgment on the trial of the action.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This appeal raises an important and interesting point. It is an appeal against an order by EVE, J., granting an interlocutory injunction restraining the Singapore company until judgment from entering into an agreement with the B Shanghai company, in the terms of a draft agreement which is exhibited to an affidavit.

In order that the points may be elucidated, and our judgment made plain, it is necessary to state the facts with some little care. It appears that before 1925 there was a company operating tramways or some means of transit at Singapore. That company was known as the Singapore Electric Tramways Co., Ltd. It was not very successful, and ultimately a receiver and manager had to be appointed in the person of the distinguished C accountant who is now Lord Plender. But, at that time, an efficient arrangement was proposed, and there was an ordinance granted, authorising the transfer to a new company of the undertaking of the Singapore Electric Tramways Co.

The way in which the matter was carried out was this. An ordinance, known as the Singapore Traction ordinance, was passed by the governor on May 30, 1925, and that gave a concession for the working of trolley vehicles, omnibuses, and other vehicles D within the settlement of Singapore. The concession contained what might be called the usual powers of borrowing, and so on, which are contained in a private Act of Parliament, granting the powers of operating a tramway; but it also contained certain important clauses one of which was cl. 31 which empowered commissioners to purchase the undertaking and provided:

> ". . . the company shall, until the purchase takes place, have exclusive privilege E of using the trolley-vehicles on the road, and power to control roads."

It also contained clauses which were intended to secure British control which declared that

> "if at any time the company be or become a foreign company or a company under foreign control or if the powers and authorities by this ordinance conferred become F vested in any foreigner or foreign company or company under foreign control, the said powers and authorities shall forthwith cease and determine and shall be no longer exercisable."

That concession ordinance was followed by another which recited:

> "Whereas prior to the passing of the Singapore Traction Ordinance the Singapore G Electric Tramways Company, which was incorporated in England in the year 1905 under the English Companies' Acts of 1862 to 1900, . . . was authorised to construct, equip, and maintain tramways in Singapore along the routes specified in the old ordinance. And whereas before and since the passing of the later ordinance of 1925 the Shanghai Electric Construction Co., Ltd., was to be formed and to acquire these powers,"

H and then authorised that there should be a transfer from the old company to the Shanghai company of its property and assets under the terms of an agreement which was scheduled to the ordinance. That agreement was made between Sir William Plender as the receiver and manager of the Singapore Electric Tramways, Ltd., and by him representing the old company and the Shanghai Electric Construction Co. was a party to that agreement. Then there is provision made for the transfer to a new company, and that I contains the term that the undertaking of the new company shall be managed by the Shanghai company.

The new company was formed, provision being made, in accordance with the agreement, for the management of the undertaking by the Shanghai company. The Shanghai company had a voting power, which would always exceed by one the total number of votes which could on any poll be influenced by all the other shareholders. The purpose of that was to give the control to the Shanghai company. The Shanghai company also were, in the case of a winding-up, to have half the surplus assets, and they were to have what was called one management share.

Those documents that I have read do not provide for the payment to the Shanghai company for their services as managers. That was provided for under a different agreement, a management agreement, which provided by cl. 9 that:

> "As remuneration for their services under this agreement the managers [the Shanghai company] shall be entitled to receive in respect of each financial period of the company 50 per cent. of a sum equal to the amount of the net profits of the company for such financial period calculated before deducting the remuneration payable to the managers hereunder, and before charging any British taxation which shall be imposed upon the company in respect of profits and for the purpose of which taxation the remuneration of the managers hereunder shall be liable to be brought into the managers' assessment of profit, but after making proper and usual provision for depreciation and renewals. . . ."

Pausing there, after this agreement was made on Sept. 23, 1925, the position was that the Shanghai company were the managers of the new company which had been formed to work the new concession. They were to receive very considerable sums in respect of their services, and they had that right secured to them by means of the management share and the voting power which was granted to them of always having one vote beyond any possible combination of opposing voters.

Things went on all right from 1925. One may pause to make the observation that it seems as if the Shanghai company had secured a very large share of the profit of the undertaking, but I do not stop to criticise the terms of that agreement. It was entered into by persons who were completely competent to form a proper measure of their own interests. Exactly how far the Shanghai company had been responsible for the clearing-up of the difficulties which surrounded the Electric company previously—and I dare say, providing capital for the new company, and so on—is not a matter for us to inquire into; but it is noticeable that at first sight it would seem as if the Shanghai company were being paid a very considerable sum for what it called management, the management, of course, being one which would control policy. So far as actual expenses were concerned, those would be met in the ordinary course as running expenses of the company which the Shanghai company were to manage. We are told that over the years from 1926 to 1933 the total sums received by the Shanghai company were £152,000, or an average of nearly £22,000 per annum.

The position of the Shanghai company was modified in 1933. Shortly put, they gave up the overriding voting power which had been originally conferred upon them, and they were placed in a position in which they could prevent the passing of any special resolutions of the company. They also gave up their interest in the surplus assets. But those alterations still left the Shanghai company with an interest in the profits of the company in the measure and to the tune which I have described in the paragraph I have alluded to, or thereabouts.

Certain difficulties have arisen. It is not certain that the Shanghai company will always be controlled in the same way as it has been. There has now occurred, as I understand, a divergence between the Shanghai company and the Singapore company, and it is thought wise to get rid of the management powers of the Shanghai company. There was also some resentment arising in Singapore against the management by the Shanghai company of a concern which was operated entirely within the limits of Singapore, which might cause some powers to be given to a rival corporation or body of persons who might have, by competition, altered the profits which were being made by the Singapore company.

The various considerations which led to the agreement I am coming to in a moment, are set out in the evidence as follows:

> "In addition to the reason mentioned in the preceding paragraph, which makes the termination of the existing management desirable in the interests of the Singapore company, the termination of such management is [in the opinion of the directors] desirable, if not essential, in the best interests of the Singapore company for the following additional reasons: (a) Now that the boards of directors of the two companies are quite distinct and are in places far distant from one another,

> A the likelihood of differences and disputes arising between the two companies with regard to the management of the Singapore company by the Shanghai company must be very greatly increased and serious difficulty is likely to arise in adjusting any differences. . . ."

I need not recapitulate all the reasons which are given. At any rate, those reasons led B to the proposed agreement being entered into, and, quite shortly put, it is that the Shanghai company should agree to the termination of their management and receive compensation for giving up their rights in the sum of £100,000. The clause in the agreement which provides that is as follows:

> "In consideration of the Shanghai company agreeing to determination of the management agreement and as compensation to it for its loss of office as manager of the C Singapore company, the Singapore company shall pay to the Shanghai company the sum of £100,000, such payment to be made within one month after this part of this agreement becomes operative."

Incidentally, it is recited in the agreement that:

> "The termination of the management agreement involves as incidental thereto D the alteration of the Singapore company's articles so as to extinguish the special right at present attached thereby to" what was originally the management share, which had become, when the alteration of the articles was made in 1933, called the reversionary share.

That is the agreement which is the subject-matter of the present proceedings. The writ was issued asking for an injunction to restrain the Singapore company from entering E into this agreement on the ground that it was ultra vires the Singapore company to pay, or enter into an agreement to pay, to the Shanghai company, the capital sum of £100,000, and consequential restriction of the powers under an injunction. EVE, J., considered the matter very carefully, and he came to these two conclusions. He says first of all:

> "I want to say at once that there is no suggestion that that conclusion is anything F but a perfectly honest conclusion, founded upon facts which are stated with exactitude, and I have no doubt in perfect good faith, in the affidavit which has been filed on behalf of the Singapore company. The question is how can this arrangement be made, an arrangement which one approaches from the point of view, so far as one is entitled to do it, of desiring to uphold it, and not destroy it, because here is a business arrangement entered into with propriety, and with perfect G honesty, and which involves nothing which strikes one at first sight as either contrary to law, or as being any excessive remuneration, or payment, for the obtaining of that which the Singapore company desires."

He indicates that, too, when he says:

> "I should have been very glad to have sanctioned the arrangement if I could have H seen my way to do so,"

but he grants an injunction restraining the conclusion of the agreement by reason, or practically by reason, of the decision in Famatina Development Corpn., Ltd. v. Bury (1).

I pause for a moment to make a short survey of the position at the time when this agreement was proposed. The Singapore company had come to the conclusion that it was no longer to their interest to be managed by the Shanghai company, and there I are valid reasons set out, which nobody controverts, for their coming to that conclusion. There are possibilities, whether approximate or remote does not matter, that it might endanger the success of the company if their present concession was cut into by some rival enterprise, a possibility which must not be ignored; and I think it is sufficient to say that on neither side is it suggested that this proposal is anything other than a business arrangement suggested by perfectly honest considerations of the present and future possibilities and prosperity of the Singapore company. It is, therefore, as EVE, J., says, an agreement to which, if he could, he would wish to give validity. I think it is also important to bear in mind that this form of agreement for getting rid of a director, a management, or an agency, is one which has come before the court in a A different form recently more than once, and it has been found that such a proceeding, such a change of management or agency or the like, is one which may enure to the benefit of the company. I give as a couple of illustrations of that the cases which came before this court on a question whether or not a deduction ought to be made in respect of the expense involved to a company in ascertaining their assessment to income tax. In Mitchell v. Noble, Ltd. (2), it was held that a considerable sum £19,000 paid to a B director whose services the company no longer wished to retain, was money wholly and exclusively laid out and expended for the purposes of the trade. Another case was Anglo-Persian Oil Co. v. Dale (3), in which £300,000 was paid to terminate a particular agency. There again it was held that that was a sum which could be deducted as money wholly expended in the carrying out of trade; it was a sum which was expended to bring back into the hands of the company a necessary ingredient of their existing C business.

I have only given those illustrations for the purpose of indicating that as a matter of business there seems to be no objection to the making of this agreement. What may have seemed some years before to be beneficial to the company, either in the matter of an agency then constituted or in the matter of management then constituted, may after the passage of years prove to be indefensible to continue; but whether we are D considering the conclusion of an agreement for management or of an agreement of agency, it appears that it is a matter on which directors may justly and legitimately exercise their discretion.

What then is the objection which is taken to the carrying out of this agreement? It is that it is proposed to find the £100,000 by means of the issue of debentures, in other words, that the company will borrow the money which would be necessary to cover the E £100,000, payable as it is within one month of the conclusion of the agreement, and it is then said that that operation comes within the principle, and indeed within the decision of Famatina Development Corpn., Ltd. v. Bury (1). One has therefore to consider very carefully whether or not the Famatina Case (1) does govern the present case, and does prevent the carrying out of what may be called a legitimate piece of procedure in carrying on a company and its legitimate business most advantageously according to the F opinion of the directors who are charged to so carry it out.

The Famatina Case (1) to my mind does not govern the present case. It is, I think, to be remembered in reference to that decision that the operation which was proposed was one of a somewhat extraordinary nature. It was not an ordinary piece of procedure in carrying on the business of the company. The company had been in serious difficulties, and in order to get money they had borrowed it upon what were called G income bonds; the straits in which they were is indicated by the fact that the lender lent a principal sum of £10, and was to receive by way of bonus for his somewhat slender loan a sum of £25 in respect of each £10 that he lent. That was to be paid exclusively out of the net profit from time to time of the company over a period of seven years. Therefore, every lender would be entitled to a total sum of £35 made up of the £10 advance and £25 bonus, and, if he was paid over seven years £5 a year, he would be H getting back his money with the interest, which was capitalised in the sense of the bonus. There was a clause, cl. 13, endorsed on the bond enabling the company to pay off the bonds upon expiration of six months' notice as a whole, and there was a proposal that the holders of the bonds should receive a certain number of shares in return for giving up their income bonds. What was proposed to be done was to pay off those bonds, and it was held by the Court of Appeal, and by the House of Lords that cl. 13 did no more I than give the company the right to advance the date of payment from seven years to six months after the notice had been given. I think it is quite plain, from an examination of the case both before PARKER, J., in the Court of Appeal, and in the House of Lords, that the operation, both in its origin and in its proposed conclusion, was one that was exceptional. It was not a method or a part of the ordinary carrying on of the business of the company. It was a special effort directed to raise money when the fortunes of the company urgently needed it and a method of repaying that money, and was not connected with the ordinary operations of the company's business. Here we are dealing with the ordinary management of the company, which is to be in the hands of either the Shanghai company or the board of the Singapore company, but is a necessary ingredient of the procedure of the company.

Lord Macnaghten comes to the conclusion that the proposal made in the Famatina Case (1) cannot be carried out, because it would have involved the issue of shares without payment in money or in money's worth. The company proposed to extinguish a bond by issuing in exchange for it twenty fully paid-up new shares of a nominal value of £1 each. That was a new issue of shares to the income bond holders. Lord Macnaghten examines what was the real charge on the income bond holders, and he says that the charge that they retained when they lent the money was ([1910] A.C. at p. 443)

> "a charge on net profits only; that is, it is a charge on money which the company earns, but which, by the declaration of a general meeting on the recommendation of the directors is, or would be, but for the charge upon it, the property of the shareholders, as individuals, and not the property of the company. The company as a corporation would be receiving nothing whatever in return for the extinction of the charge."

It is important to consider what that involves. The income bond holder, who has not got the right to receive a return from the capital of the company, but has got a charge upon income only, has a right to dip into the pool of money which belongs to the shareholders as individuals and is not the property of the company. The scheme suggested is that the income bond holder who gives up his bond shall receive from the company new shares, and the company itself is to get nothing in return for those new shares. When the facts are examined the Famatina Case (1) seems to me merely an illustration of the circumstances in which a company ought not to issue shares unless it gets either money or money's worth for them. Lord Macnaghten obviously holds that the operation did not give to the company anything in the nature of money's worth.

I turn back to consider the facts of the present case. The company will be getting control back into its own hands. It will be enabled to carry on its business without any prospect of immediate danger. It will have less friction than might arise between two separate boards, one sitting in London and the other at Singapore, and it is dealing with what might be called an ordinary piece of the business of the company. Can it be said that the Famatina Case (1) lays down some principle which would be trespassed upon by the proposed agreement? To my mind, in the Famatina Case (1), the operation was not in the ordinary course of business, but in the present case it is. The present proposal does not prevent the company getting what is money's worth, whether the company carry it out by raising money on debentures, or whether they pay it over a period of time, or whether they dip into some of their resources which it is possible they could do upon the figures which are before the court. That is a matter for the company to consider, but in every circumstance the facts of the present case seem to diverge so largely from those of the Famatina Case (1) as to prohibit that case preventing the carrying out of the agreement, and compelling Eve, J., as he thought he was compelled, to grant the injunction. For those reasons it appears to me that the appeal must be allowed, and the injunction discharged.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. The evidence and documents have been fully referred to by the Master of the Rolls, and it is unnecessary that I should refer to them further. The one fact that emerges from the documents and from the evidence is that it is essential in the interests of the Singapore company to get rid of this managing agreement and to pay a sum of £100,000 for this purpose, not because the managers are receiving too large a salary, nor because, in the event of a winding-up, the managers have certain rights as holders of the reversionary share in the surplus assets, but purely and solely for the reasons that are set out in the evidence which has been read by the Master of the Rolls. If the company had been an individual—if we were dealing with an individual who was carrying on the business now being carried on by the company—it cannot be doubted that it would be a wise and proper thing for the individual to pay this sum of £100,000 for the purpose of getting rid of this manager, and, that being so, I confess I find it difficult to understand why it should be illegal to make such a payment because the company which is carrying on the business is a limited company and not an individual.

The circumstances in which a company may deal with its capital, and the purposes for which it may deal with its capital, were stated by LORD WATSON in full in his speech in Trevor v. Whitworth (4) (12 App. Cas. at p. 423), which has been so often referred to. What he said was this:

> "Paid-up capital may be diminished or lost in the course of the company's trading; that is a result which no legislation can prevent; but persons who deal with and give credit to a limited company, naturally rely upon the fact that the company is trading with a certain amount of capital already paid, as well as upon the responsibility of its members for the capital remaining at call; and they are entitled to assume that no part of the capital which has been paid into the coffers of the company has been subsequently paid out, except in the legitimate course of its business."

I should have thought myself that in the circumstances that I have mentioned it would be legitimate for a company such as this, in the course of its business, to make this payment. But it is said, and this contention found favour with EVE, J., that we are compelled to hold that this proposed payment of £100,000 is ultra vires the company by reason of the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Famatina Development Corpn., Ltd. v. Bury (1).

I think it is desirable to see both what the Famatina Case (1) did not decide and what it did decide. It did not decide that a company can never spend its capital in any way which would result as a necessary incident of the payment in an increase of the company's revenue available for dividend. Neither any member of the Court of Appeal nor any member of the House of Lords laid down any such proposition, nor could they have intended to lay down such a proposition. It is perfectly plain that if a company—to take an illustration which I ventured to give in the course of the argument—has a leasehold office for which it is paying a rent, and thinks it desirable in the interest of its business as a whole to acquire the freehold of the premises, the expenditure of its capital for the purpose is legitimate, although one result of such payment is that revenue will no longer be debited each year to the annual rent of the offices, rent which might be, and probably would be, larger than the interest earned by the capital expended in acquiring the freehold reversion. Again, it cannot be doubted that if a company has a manager whom it thinks it desirable to get rid of, in the interests of governing principles, it may pay him a lump sum out of its capital in satisfaction of all his claims under his agreement, and, in consideration of his putting an end to that management agreement, although the result, or one of the results, of so doing will be that revenue will benefit in the future to the extent of the manager's salary, and the result must surely be the same, even though the manager's salary is a salary that depends upon and is contingent upon the existence of profits being earned by the company. The Famatina Case (1) certainly did not decide that in such a case the payment would be illegal. The truth of the matter is that the advantage to the company in the one case as a whole is just as great as it is in the other. If it be worth, say, £10,000 for a company to get rid of a manager whose salary is not contingent upon the profits, it would be also worth £10,000 for them to get rid of a manager whose salary is contingent upon the profits. In both cases the company would get the advantage of £10,000, and in order to get that advantage is entitled to spend £10,000 of its capital.

What the Famatina Case (1) did decide was that the company in that case were getting no advantage whatsoever by the proposed expenditure of money, or, rather, allotment of fully-paid shares, which was proposed to be done there. The facts of the case have already been referred to by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, and it would appear from that statement that what the company was doing was to anticipate revenue. The bonds that had been issued were payable out of profits, and out of profits only, and the company were proposing to use capital, by the issue of fully-paid shares, for the purpose of getting rid of the right of the bondholders to receive in the future part of the profits earned by the company. To the company it did not matter one penny—or so the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal thought—whether the bondholder was paid out at once or whether he was paid by instalments out of future revenue. So that by paying the bondholder at once, no advantage was coming to the company; the only persons, who would get any advantage out of the proposed payment, were the shareholders for whose benefit revenue would be set free available for dividend. That being so, it seems that the Famatina Case (1) is not an authority which would prevent us from upholding the proposed scheme in the present case. The company here as a whole is getting an advantage which the directors have bona fide estimated to be worth £100,000, and they are, therefore, in my opinion, entitled to provide that £100,000 out of their capital resources, even though, as a necessary expense of getting rid of the management agreement, revenue will benefit to the extent of the salary paid to the managers, which was a salary equivalent to 50 per cent. of the revenue in each year, and even although the rights attached to the management share, or the reversionary share, held by the managers will no longer be attached to that share, which is going to be turned into an ordinary share with all the incidents pertaining to such a share. It is true that there is nothing to be found either in the management agreement or in the articles of association providing that in the event of the managers ceasing to be managers the right attached to that share shall be modified or taken away. But, throughout, the parties appear to have realised that the termination of the management agreement would necessarily involve the change of the rights of capital conferred by the management share, and no part, as I have already pointed out, of the consideration being paid to the Shanghai company, is in truth being paid for the purpose of getting rid of those rights in the surplus assets.

For those reasons, with all respect to Eve, J., who felt himself bound by the Famatina Case (1) to decide the other way, I think that the appellants are entitled to succeed, and that the injunction must be dissolved.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. The facts have been stated by the Master of the Rolls, and I do not think it is necessary for me to add much in relation to them. I should like, however, to point out that the present arrangement involves among other things, a new issue of debenture stock carrying interest at a rate of 5 per cent. instead of 6 per cent. per annum, and the procuring of a further ordinance from the Straits Settlement government, and also the alteration of the company's articles, as well as the transaction of terminating the management agreement which the Master of the Rolls has already mentioned.

The proposed agreement which it is suggested would be ultra vires the company states that:

> "In consideration of the Shanghai company agreeing to the termination of the management agreement and as compensation to it for its loss of office as manager of the Singapore company the Singapore company shall pay to the Shanghai company the sum of £100,000, such payment to be made within one month after this part of this agreement becomes operative."

That is, after certain resolutions of the Singapore company have been duly passed, and the ordinance to which I have referred has become law, and the shareholders have approved of the agreement at a meeting to be held for the purpose. As has been pointed out, the proposed agreement involves the alteration of the articles of association so as to extinguish the special rights at present attached to what is now called the reversionary share of the Shanghai company. That, I think, as pointed out by my brother Romer, is no more than something ancillary or incidental to the main substance of the agreement as between the Singapore company and the Shanghai company which involves the termination of the management agreement so that the Singapore company becomes at liberty to carry on its own concern in such way as it may think proper.

The effect has various advantages, of which I think the two most important may be mentioned. They are not quite visible on the face of the transaction, and they are these. First, that the proposed agreement obviates any risks of the forfeiture of the Singapore company's ordinance in the event of the Shanghai company becoming foreign controlled, and, secondly, it will remove a cause of growing local resentment which might well give rise to friction with the municipal commissioners who, I may mention incidentally, are largely natives, on whose goodwill and co-operation the fortune and future prosperity of the Singapore company are in large measure dependent.

I approach the problems which are raised in this appeal as closely connected with the question of the payment of compensation for the loss of the office of manager, which the Shanghai company is willing to agree to, for consideration. The Singapore company pays nothing, in terms, at any rate, and I think in substance, for the surrender of rights attached to the reversionary share which the Shanghai company owns. I think the terms of the agreement in that respect, and, in particular, cl. 8 of the proposed agreement which I have in effect read, demonstrate that fact. It follows from that that the company is not here proposing to traffic in its own shares, or the single reversionary share, in any true sense.

The questions that remain are not without difficulty, but, like my brethren, I have come to a clear conclusion upon them. The first question which, I think, may be formulated is in these terms, taking a case not exactly like this, but simplified for the purpose of consideration. Suppose A. has a contractual right to be paid the sum of, say, £10,000 a year out of, and only out of, the future profits of a company, if any, is it a transaction ultra vires the company for the company to agree to pay to A. the sum of £50,000 in consideration of the extinguishment of this right? It is said that one or two passages in Famatina Development Corpn., Ltd. v. Bury (1)—and my brethren have referred to them—may be thought to have lent some support to the proposition that such a release, being a release of a liability to pay a sum only out of future profits, does not create a new asset, and that there is nothing to show in the balance sheet as the result of such a transaction. In a sense, in my opinion, that is true; but it is also undeniable that the result of the bargain would be to increase the value of the undertaking as a whole, and this for the benefit of the company as a corporation.

Many illustrations can be given of that, and the simplest that occurs to me is that if a company has acquired a valuable property by purchase, the consideration payable to the vendor being an annuity for his life, it is obvious that if the life annuity were extinguished by a capital payment, there would not be any fresh asset that you would enter into the balance sheet. The value of the property would be increased by reason of the fact that no longer was there the necessity to pay as a charge upon the property an annuity for the rest of the life of the vendor. It is, however, contended that the Famatina Case (1) shows that such a transaction would be improper, and, as I understand it, ultra vires the company, because it is said that that case decides that the extinguishment of a charge on future profits is a transaction by which the company, as a corporation, receives nothing.

I do not think the Famatina Case (1) decides anything of the kind. It has to be remembered in considering it that there was a very curious set of facts. The company, as has already been said, borrowed £50,000 by the issue of 5,000 bonds at £10 each, but the terms were that the principal money of £10 had got to be paid, so far as there were net profits available for the purpose, together with the sum of £25 by way of bonus. The registered holder was entitled to convert any ten bonds of the series into a first mortgage debenture of the company for £150, without prejudice to his right to the bonus. Practically the whole of the bondholders exercised that right, and the result was that there were £50,000 first mortgage debentures outstanding, and rights to bonuses amounting to £125,000 charged on income only. The proposal was, not to create £50,000 first mortgage debentures, but to extinguish all the bonus rights, amounting to £125,000, by the issue of 100,000 fully-paid shares; and that, it was suggested, was ultra vires, and it was so held by the Court of Appeal and by the House of Lords in a judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN, which the other Lords accepted. I think one cannot consider the decision in the Famatina Case (1) without observing that their Lordships were faced with a somewhat alarming possibility. They were unwilling to give currency to the view that money could be borrowed by a limited company on terms of a huge bonus payable out of future profits, and that the bonuses could then be released or extinguished in consideration of fully paid-up shares. If that could properly be done, the device afforded a method of issuing shares at a discount by a very simple process. It has also to be remembered that the rights to bonus were not held by persons who had any obligation towards the company at all. The bonus had been given to them when the original bonds were subscribed for, and, accordingly, if the bonuses were extinguished by the issue of so many fully paid-up shares, the company as a corporation would not be getting anything directly from the holders of the bonds, though, no doubt, the future profits of the company would be relieved from an obligation, and the shareholders of the company, including the people who got shares in return for the extinguishment of the bonds, would be getting larger dividends than they otherwise would. The decision of the House of Lords was, I think, that expressed by Lord Macnaghten when he said ([1910] A.C. at p. 443):

> "The company as a corporation would be receiving nothing whatever in return for the extinction of the charge. Nor would the position of the company's creditors be improved in any respect" and if you add to that his statement that

> "The directors would be issuing shares without payment either in money or money's worth,"

I think you have an explanation of what was the view of the House of Lords in deciding that case in the way they did. The words to be emphasised in that last sentence are:

> "Without payment either in money or money's worth";

because I do not think that Lord Macnaghten pledged himself to the view that there was no consideration whatever for the issue of the shares. He is saying there would be no payment for the shares, and I have no doubt that he held the view that Farwell, L.J., had expressed in the court below ([1909] 1 Ch. at p. 762), after citing the passage of Lord Watson's speech in Trevor v. Whitworth (4), that it was not a usual and legitimate way of carrying on the business to dispose of contingent profits in futuro in the manner there proposed.

However that may be, let me now somewhat alter the terms of the question which I suggested and present it in these terms. Supposing A. is appointed a manager of a company for life at a salary of, say, £10,000 a year, payable out of, and only out of the future profits of the company, if any. Is it ultra vires the company if the company should pay to A. the sum of £50,000, say, in consideration of the termination of his management and all his rights as manager being extinguished? In my opinion, the Famatina Case (1) has nothing directly to do with such a problem. If that question be put, it cannot be affected by answering that the company and the corporation would be receiving nothing whatever in consideration for the extinction of the charge. It would be receiving something. It would be receiving in consideration for the extinguishment of the charge a release of the right of A. to continue to manage the company. In other words, it would receive freedom from the obligations on that agreement.

As I have already said, the £100,000 is paid on the terms, or would be paid on the terms, of cl. 8 of the proposed agreement. It is, in my opinion, beyond dispute that the company as a corporation is getting a true consideration in return for the £100,000. On what ground can we then demand to say that such a transaction is ultra vires? As I have already said, it is not a trafficking in the company's shares. It is obviously not an issue of shares at a discount, because no shares are being issued in connection with the transaction. It is admitted that the transaction is not an unfair one, and upon the evidence it is clear that it is in the interests of the company. In my opinion, then, there is nothing in the Famatina Case (1) which prevents the transaction or binds us to hold that it is one which cannot be entered into by an ordinary trading company in its own interests; and in saying that I accept the evidence that the object of the proposed payment is not solely to discharge a charge on the future profits of the company and of the assets distributable among the members in a winding-up, but to procure the termination of the existing management of the Singapore company by the Shanghai company, and to give the Singapore company unfettered control and management of its own undertaking, and that in the interests of the Singapore company itself as distinguished from its shareholders. On those grounds I agree that the judgment of EVE, J., who was endeavouring loyally to follow the decision of the House of Lords in the Famatina Case (1) must be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

MARCELINO GONZALEZ Y COMPANIA v. JAMES NOURSE, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Branson, J.), November 13, 14, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 565; 105 L.J.K.B. 158; 154 L.T. 497; 80 Sol. Jo. 93; 41 Com. Cas. 94; 18 Asp. M.L.C. 590]

Shipping—Bill of lading—Stipulation to deliver cargo at wharf—Liberty to tranship—Discharge into lighters—Custom of port—Cargo lost through sinking of lighters.

A bill of lading, which provided for the discharge of cargo at a wharf, contained a clause providing as follows: "With liberty to tranship or land and re-ship on board the same or any other vessel or vessels," and an undertaking to deliver the goods from the ship's tackles. It also contained an exception for dangers and accidents of the seas and of navigation. The goods were not discharged at a wharf, but into lighters. A hurricane arose, and the lighters were sunk and the goods lost.

Held: (i) by reason of the liberty to tranship, the ship was entitled to tranship into lighters and not only into another ship alongside; that the goods were lost through an accident of the seas and, therefore, the ship was not responsible.

(ii) the clause was not null and void by reason of the provisions of the Indian Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1925, Sched., art. III, rr. 1, 8.

(iii) a custom at the port of discharge to discharge into lighters was not inconsistent with the stipulation that the cargo should be discharged at a wharf.

Notes. The Indian Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1925, is in the same terms as the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

As to transhipment of cargo see 30 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 491 et seq. and as to stipulations as to mode of delivery see ibid. p. 532 et seq. For cases see 41 DIGEST 499 et seq. and 531 et seq. For Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, see 23 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 884.

Action tried by BRANSON, J., in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs were the consignees of a shipment of 500 bags of Burma rice shipped at Rangoon for delivery at Havana in the defendants' ship Tapti, and were holders of a bill of lading, dated June 4, 1933, signed by the defendants in respect thereof. The bill of lading contained a provision as follows: "With liberty to tranship or land and re-ship on board the same or any other vessel or vessels," and also contained an undertaking by the defendants to deliver the goods "in like good order and condition from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease)," subject (inter alia) to the following exception, "The act of God . . . and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas . . . and of navigation of whatever nature or kind." The bill of lading contained a further clause providing that the cargo was to be discharged at a wharf to be designated by the ship's agent, and incorporating the terms of the Indian Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1925. By art. III, r. 1, of the rules relating to bills of lading in the schedule to that Act the carrier was bound to exercise due diligence in the performance of his duties, and by r. 8 of that article:

> "Any clause, covenant or agreement in a contract of carriage relieving the . . . ship from liability for loss of . . . goods arising from negligence, fault or failure in the duties and obligations provided in this article or lessening such liability otherwise than as provided in these rules, shall be null and void and of no effect."

During the voyage the ship struck a submerged object and was damaged. On arrival at Havana it was found necessary to put her in dry dock to effect repairs, and there was no such accommodation available at that port. She proceeded to a wharf and began to discharge, but before the plaintiffs' goods were discharged, she was obliged to stand off again in order to make room for a vessel belonging to the wharfowners. That was in accordance with a recognised practice of the port, giving precedence to the wharfowner's vessels over others. The plaintiff's goods were then discharged into lighters for conveyance to the wharf. On the next day the lighters were sunk in a hurricane, and the plaintiffs' goods were totally lost.

The plaintiffs brought this action claiming damages for breach of the undertaking to deliver the goods contained in the bill of lading. They contended that the defendants had failed to deliver the goods at the wharf designated by the ship's agent; that, in discharging into lighters, they had committed a breach of contract; and that they had failed to deliver the goods from the ship's tackles. The defendants contended that the loss was due to an excepted peril of the sea, and that they were entitled to discharge into lighters by reason of the proviso giving liberty to tranship.

David Davies, K.C., and Stevenson for the plaintiffs.
Willink, K.C., and Holman for the defendants.

BRANSON, J.—The plaintiffs allege that the contract contained in the bill of lading involves that the goods should be taken alongside the wharf and delivered from the ship's tackles, and that the placing of the goods in lighters was a breach of the contract. The defendants allege that the contract provided that they should take the goods to the port of Havana and discharge them there in any usual way, and that the practice there of discharging them into lighters was, in those circumstances, a usual way of discharge. It has been repeatedly held that where there is a custom of the port in regard to the discharge of the cargo, unless that custom is excluded by the contract, delivery in accordance with that custom is proper. Similarly, where, as in the present case, a well-known practice as to discharge of cargo has been followed by a line of steamers at a particular port to the knowledge of the receiver of the goods, then, unless there is something in the contract or elsewhere which excludes that practice, it is not open to the receiver to object to it.

It was said on behalf of the plaintiffs that there were matters here which did exclude the practice. In the first place it was said that the provision in the bill of lading that the defendants should have "liberty to tranship" applied only to transhipment to a steamer alongside, and not into lighters. There is nothing in the bill of lading which so restricts the meaning of the words, and it is not possible so to restrict it. Either practice is a usual performance of the contract. The expression "liberty to tranship" covers the putting of the goods into lighters in order to complete the voyage. It is also said that the whole of the clause giving liberty to tranship is rendered null and void by art. III, r. 8, of the rules appended to the Indian Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1925. That is an article which provides that the carrier shall be bound to exercise due diligence in the performance of his duties, and I do not see how a clause giving liberty to tranship can come within that rule.

It is further said that the expression in the bill of lading that the goods shall be delivered from the ship's tackles excludes delivery of the goods into lighters. The answer to that contention is to be found in Marzetti v. Smith (1), where it was held that a custom of the port of London for ships to discharge goods on to the quay and thence into lighters was not inconsistent with an exactly similar provision in the bill of lading there in question. In the present case the contract, when fairly read in the light of the circumstances, was not broken by placing the goods in lighters as a step in the delivery of them, and the defendants are protected from liability for the loss of the goods by the exceptions in the bill of lading.

Judgment for defendants.

Compulsory Purchase—Notice stating effect of order—Inclusion of owner of easement among "owners or reputed owners" of land—Sufficiency of notice—Duty of Minister in considering objections—Public Works Facilities Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 50), Sched. I, Part II, paras. 3 (b), 4.

A local authority made a compulsory purchase order under s. 2 (1) of the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, and the name of the applicant, who was the owner of an easement to take water from certain land to which the order related, was included under the heading "owners or reputed owners" in a schedule to the notice stating the effect of the order served under Sched. I, Part II, para. 3 (b), of the Act. On objection being made by the applicant, a public local inquiry was held under Sched. I, Part II, para. 4, of the Act, and the applicant there desired to put forward objections to the effect that the order purported to authorise the purchase of something which was not land, but merely an easement over land, and that the statutory notice had not sufficiently specified what was to be purchased. The holder of the inquiry declined to entertain these objections on the ground that they were legal matters to be considered by the Minister and not by him. The order was duly confirmed by the Minister. On application by the applicant to the High Court under Sched. I, Part III, para. 2, of the Act,

Held: (i) the order was not invalidated by the inclusion of the applicant's name under the heading "owners or reputed owners" in the schedule to the notice as that document did not necessarily indicate that anything was to be purchased from him, but only referred to the acquisition of any interest in land held by him, and not that of an interest which could not be properly described as "land."

(ii) the notice which the acquiring authority served, under Sched. I, Part II, para. 3 (b), need not bring home to the recipient what effect would be produced on him or his property if the order became effective. It was sufficient if the notice indicated what the order contained.

(iii) the Minister had sufficiently discharged his duties under the Act by considering the report of the holder of the inquiry and the written objections submitted by the applicant, and was not bound to give the applicant the further opportunity of submitting legal arguments to him orally.

Notes. The Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, was repealed by the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, but para. 3 (b) and para. 4 of Part II of Sched. I to the Act of 1930 are reproduced in para. 3 (1) (b) and para. 4 (1) respectively of Part I of Sched. I to the Act of 1946. Paragraphs 3 (b) and 5 of Sched. I to the Housing Act, 1936, and paragraphs 3 (b) and 5 of Sched. III to that Act are in the same terms.

Application under Sched. I, Part III, para. (2), to the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, to quash an order of the Minister of Health confirming a compulsory purchase order made by the Isle of Wight Rural District Council.

By an agreement dated Aug. 18, 1904, Sir John Simeon's predecessors in title had, in consideration of a payment of £500, granted the above council, for a term of 999 years, the right to go on Pitt's farm, Calbourne, for the purpose of taking water. Certain additional rights to take water were granted to the council by subsequent agreements. By a conveyance dated July 14, 1932, Sir John Simeon conveyed Pitt's Farm to one P. R. Strickland in fee simple, subject to a reservation of the right to percolating water and of all easements necessary to enable the council to exercise their rights under the above agreements. After negotiations for the sale to the council of the sole right to obtain water from the farm had failed, the council, in March, 1934, gave statutory notice of intention to purchase, and on April 17, 1934, made an order authorising them to purchase compulsorily, for the purpose of obtaining water, fifteen-and-a-half acres of meadow land forming part of Pitt's Farm. The order contained a schedule, in one column of which the land was described, and in the other column, under the heading "owners or reputed owners," the names of Sir John Simeon and P. R. Strickland were set out. A similar statement had appeared in the statutory notice of intention to purchase. On May 15, Sir John Simeon gave notice of objection to the confirmation of the order, and on June 14 a public local inquiry was held. The applicant appeared and objected to the order on the grounds that it authorised the purchase of something which was not land and that the statutory notice of intention to purchase did not sufficiently specify what was to be bought, but the holder of the inquiry said that he could not inquire into legal questions, which were for the Minister and not for him to deal with, and refused to consider the objections. On Aug. 11, 1934, the Minister confirmed the order. No request had been made by the applicant for a further opportunity of putting forward his objections.

The applicant applied to the court under Sched. I, Part III, para. (2), to the Act of 1930 to quash the Minister's order. The grounds of the application were: (i) that the order was not within the powers of the Act; (ii) that the requirements of the Act had not been complied with (a) because the property proposed to be acquired had not been sufficiently described in the order, (b) because the applicant's objection had not been sufficiently considered by the Minister.

By the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, s. 2 (1): "Any local authority . . . may be authorised to purchase land compulsorily for any of the purposes specified in Part I of Sched. I to this Act by means of an order (in this Act referred to as "a compulsory purchase order") made and submitted to the appropriate Minister and confirmed by him in accordance with the provisions of Part II of that schedule. . . ."

By Sched. I, Part I, para. (1), the purposes for which the purchase of land may be authorised by a compulsory purchase order include "any purpose for which the local authority . . . with respect to whom the order is made could be authorised to acquire compulsorily the land with respect to which it is made by an order having effect (either with or without approval by Parliament) under some enactment in force immediately before the commencement of this Act."

By Sched. I, Part II, para. (1), provision is made for a compulsory purchase order being in a prescribed form. By para. (3) it is provided that, before the order is submitted to the Minister, it shall be published by the local authority in local newspapers, and that notices in a prescribed form shall be served on owners and occupiers of land in the area to which the order relates. These notices are to state the effect of the order and to specify the time and manner of making objections.

By para. (4): "If no objection is duly made by any of the persons upon whom notices are required to be served, or if all objections so made are withdrawn, the Minister may, if he thinks fit, confirm the order with or without modification, but in any other case he shall, before confirming the order, cause a public local inquiry to be held, and shall consider any objection not withdrawn and the report of the person who held the inquiry, and may then confirm the order either with or without modification."

By Part III, para. (2), a right is given to "any person aggrieved by an order" to "question its validity on the ground that it is not within the powers of the Act or that any requirement of the Act has not been complied with" by application to the High Court within twenty-one days after the publication of the notice of confirmation.

By para. (3): "Subject to the provisions of the last preceding paragraph, an order . . . shall become operative at the date on which notice of its confirmation is published."

BRANSON, J.—This is an application under Part III, para. 2, of Sched. I to the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930. It arises as an appeal against the compulsory purchase order made by the rural district council of the Isle of Wight on April 17, 1934, for the purchase of certain lands at Calbourne in the Isle of Wight and confirmed by the Minister of Health on Aug. 11, 1934, under Part II, para. 4, of Sched. I to the Act. By it Sir John Walter Barrington Simeon, Baronet, moves that the compulsory order should be set aside upon the following grounds. The first ground is that the order is not within the powers of the Act, and the second ground is that the requirements of the Act have not been complied with in two respects, first, because the property proposed to be acquired is not sufficiently described in the compulsory purchase order, and, secondly, that the objection of the applicant to the order has not been sufficiently considered by the Minister.

The first of these objections arises in the following way. It is said that the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, authorises the acquisition of land, but does not authorise the acquisition of any property or proprietary right in or over land, which is not land, and it is said that this order has authorised the purchase of something from the applicant which is not land, and, therefore, the order is ultra vires. The situation out of which this dispute arises is that the applicant, Sir John Simeon, having been the owner of certain land at Calbourne, disposed of it some years ago to Mr. Percy Strickland, but reserved certain water rights—rights to deal with percolating water and rights to allow the local authority for a royalty or payment of so much a gallon to take the water which percolated through to the subsoil under the land. The notice which was served under Sched. I, Part II, para. 3, to the Act applies, not to the whole of the land sold by Sir John Simeon to Mr. Percy Strickland, but to a portion, to wit, fifteen-and-a-half acres, and the order and the notice under the order contained Sir John's name in a column headed "Owners or reputed owners." It is argued that the order is ultra vires because, by putting in Sir John's name, it purports to acquire something from him which is not an interest in the land described, and, therefore, it must be purporting to acquire from him something which is not land, and, as the Act only authorises the acquisition of land, the order is ultra vires. The whole of that argument depends upon the assumption that the insertion of Sir John's name in the column "Owners or reputed owners" means that the order is authorising the acquisition of something from him. I do not think that that assumption is justified. It seems to me that the effect of the completed document is to say that, if Sir John has any interest in this land which is described, that interest may be bought, but if what he has got is some kind of a right which is not an interest in the land and not "land" within the meaning of that word in this Act, then the fact that his name appears there effects no more as against him than would be effected if the name of somebody who did not happen to be the owner of land was put in this column of owners or reputed owners. The presence of the expression "reputed owners" is enough to show that the insertion of the name in the column does not of necessity indicate that anything is being purchased from the person whose name appears there. For these reasons I think that the first point taken by counsel for Sir John Simeon fails, and the order is not ultra vires the statute.

The second point is that the notice does not sufficiently state the effect of the order. It has been stated a little differently on different occasions. The notice of motion puts it in this way, that the property proposed to be acquired is not sufficiently described. Here again it is only by assuming that the notice is intended to be a notice purporting to acquire such rights as Sir John Simeon reserved for himself under the deeds which have been referred to, that the point can be made at all. The property is described in the second column as approximately fifteen-and-a-half acres of pasture land, bearing a number on the ordnance survey, which is given, and the description of the land is unobjectionable and defines it perfectly. Unless one is to assume that the notice is intended to refer to something other than what it says, no complaint can be made of the description at all. But counsel took a rather different point in the argument before me. He said that the notice was bad because it did not state the effect of the order, and that the expression "effect of the order" means that the notice should bring home to the person receiving it what effect is going to be produced upon him or his property if the order is carried through. I do not so read the expression in para. 3 (b) of Part II of Sched. I to the Act. Where it says that "a notice in the prescribed form stating the effect of the order" shall be served, I think it means that the notice is to give an indication of what the order contains. It is to be in the prescribed form, and when one looks at the form in the Public Works Facilities (Procedure, Ministry of Health) Order, 1930 (S.R. & O. 1930, No. 1057) which has been prescribed and the prescribed form which was adopted in the present case, it appears to me that the statute has been fully complied with. The prescribed form reads: "Take notice that," and so forth, "made a compulsory purchase order which is about to be submitted to the Minister of Health for confirmation authorising them to purchase compulsorily for the purpose of" so and so "the lands described in the schedule hereto," and then there is the schedule with the description of the lands. Here the schedule contained a description of the lands by reference to an ordnance number and a coloured patch upon the ordnance survey map, making it clear beyond peradventure what the land referred to was. I think, therefore, that the second objection which has been raised also fails.

That leaves only the third objection, which is that the objection of the applicant to the order has not been sufficiently considered by the Minister of Health. It is said that, the applicant having raised certain objections before the inspector, to wit, first of all the objection that the section only authorises the purchase of land and the order was authorising the purchase of something which was not land, and, secondly, that the notice did not sufficiently specify what was to be bought from Sir John, the inspector said that they were legal matters which he could not very well deal with himself and they must be considered by the Minister. It is argued that, the inspector having said that, it became incumbent on the Minister under the statute to appoint a day and to give an opportunity for representatives of the applicant to come and put before him the legal arguments in support of those two objections. It is said, on the other hand, that there is no such obligation upon the Minister. The obligation, if any, must arise under Part II, para. 4, of Sched. I to the Act, and that paragraph reads:

> "If no objection is duly made by any of the persons upon whom notices are required to be served, or if all objections so made are withdrawn, the Minister may, if he thinks fit, confirm the order with or without modification, but in any other case he shall, before confirming the order, cause a public local inquiry to be held, and shall consider any objection not withdrawn and the report of the person who held the inquiry, and may then confirm the order either with or without modification."

It seems to me that the submission of the Solicitor-General upon that paragraph is the right one. The paragraph provides for a public inquiry before which parties can appear and be heard. It does not provide for any second hearing before the Minister, who has only got to consider the report of the person who held the inquiry and any objection not withdrawn. It seems to me that the language used indicates an intention on the part of the legislature to confer the right upon the Minister, having held the public inquiry, to deal with the report which comes from the holder of the inquiry, and to give his own consideration to objections which are not withdrawn, and nothing more. It is to be observed that there is nothing in the Act or the schedule which prevents reasonable objections being put forward, and there is no evidence here—and, indeed, it is agreed that it was not so—that there was any application made to the Minister to consider any further arguments in support of the objections which were made. According to the affidavit the point that was specifically reserved for the consideration of the Minister was the validity of the reservations in these various conveyances—a matter, it seems to me, which might be very material if the question which was being considered was a question of how much compensation the applicant was to receive, but which does not seem to have any real bearing on the question whether the order authorising the compulsory purchase of this land should or should not be confirmed.

For these reasons I think that this application should be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Administration of Estates—Counsel's fees—Solicitor's estate insolvent—Right of counsel to prove for fees—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 34 (1), Sched. I, Part I, r. 2.

In a creditors' action for the administration of the insolvent estate of a deceased solicitor a barrister applied to be admitted as creditor for a sum of money in respect of fees due to him as counsel, such fees having been received by the deceased solicitor from the lay clients but not paid to the applicant. In the alternative the applicant asked that the personal representative of the solicitor should be ordered to pay to him a dividend on the sum due, rateably with the other creditors.

Held: (i) during the lifetime of the solicitor there could have been no cause of action against him, either at law or in equity, by a counsel for his fees, and, therefore, the applicant was not entitled to be admitted as a creditor of the estate for the sum in question.

(ii) it was impossible to apply the doctrine in Re Condon, Ex parte James (1) (1874), 9 Ch. App. 609 (as to payment to a person entitled of money received by a trustee in bankruptcy), to the case of an executor, he not being an officer of the court, and, therefore, the applicant was not entitled to the rateable dividend which he claimed.

Summons.

This summons was taken out by a member of the Bar in a creditors' action for the administration of the estate of Henry Gilbert Sandiford, who carried on business as a solicitor under the style of Calder Woods and Sandiford and died on Nov. 19, 1932. The applicant claimed to be admitted as a creditor for the sum of £84 14s. 6d. in respect of fees due to him as counsel, such fees having already been received by the deceased solicitor from the lay clients, but not paid to the applicant. CLAUSON, J., found as a fact that the lay clients paid the fees to the solicitor upon the faith of such solicitor's representation to them that he had actually paid to the applicant such fees, whereas, instead of having paid them, he had kept them for himself. In the alternative the applicant asked that the personal representative of the solicitor should be ordered to pay to the applicant a dividend on the above sum rateably with the other creditors.

G. P. Slade for the applicant.

J. D. Casswell for the defendant, the personal representative of the deceased solicitor.

CLAUSON, J.—This is a summons taken out in an action for the administration of the estate of the deceased by a member of the Bar, who claims to be a creditor of the estate for a sum of £84 14s. 6d. described in the summons as being fees due to him as counsel, and he asks that he may be admitted as a creditor of the estate for the said sum of £84 14s. 6d., or, in the alternative, that the personal representative of the deceased may be ordered to pay to him a sum equal to the dividend on the said amount rateably with the other creditors of the estate and as if he had a legal right of proof in respect of the said sum.

I will deal first of all with his claim to be admitted as a creditor in respect of that sum. The facts are that counsel advised certain clients through the solicitor, but did not take the precaution of requiring payment of his fees before the advice was given, or before, as it was in one case, he appeared for the client in court; that at some subsequent date the solicitor received payments from the client on the representation, as I understand the facts, that he had in fact paid counsel's fees and that the client ought to reimburse him the payments he had made. In the one case, that of Dent v. Baldwin, t is quite plain that that was the position, because I have before me the bill of costs which was rendered to the client, which contains under the date on which the brief was delivered the entry: "Attending counsel with brief, paid his fee and clerk," and accordingly, the lay client was justified in supposing, on the delivery of that bill, that what he was being asked to do was, not to provide the solicitor with money to pay counsel's fees, but to repay to the solicitor a fee which he had in fact paid to counsel. The facts are not quite so clear in the other case of Re Mark Martin (deceased), for what happened in that case was that the solicitor wrote to the client's husband admitting that he had received a sum of £2000 on account, which he proposed to apply in paying his own costs and then comes the word—which is possibly ambiguous—"disbursements." Under that heading he mentions, among other items, counsel's fees, with the name of the applicant and of another counsel, and the respective amounts of their fees. At that date the applicant had been paid some fees in the matter, but not nearly as much as the sum which is put down there under "disbursements." However, I think I must treat the facts of that case as the same as the facts in the first case I mentioned, and that I must attribute to the word "disbursements" as it appears in that letter, the meaning that the solicitor is in effect saying to the client: "I am going to apply the moneys by paying myself my own costs and re-imbursing myself my disbursements, i.e., what I have paid to the counsel."

I, therefore, propose—not that I am satisfied that it will make any difference—to treat this as a case in which a solicitor has represented to the client that he has paid the fees, has then received from the client the amount which would reimburse him the payment that he had made, and, instead of using that money to pay the fees, which he had in fact not paid, he appears, without paying the fees, to have put the money

A into his own pocket. Whether or not in any true sense this dishonest conduct on the part of the solicitor has had any practical result which is reflected in the quantum of his estate distributable is by no means clear, for the one transaction took place as much as thirteen or fourteen months before the death of the solicitor, and the other transaction, as I understand it, was only about a couple of months before the solicitor's death.

B However, in those circumstances, the first question I have to determine is: Is counsel entitled to be admitted as a creditor of the estate for the sum in question? In my view, it is quite clear that between the dead man and the counsel there subsisted no obligation enforceable by the counsel at law or in equity, and accordingly it would seem very remarkable that the death of the solicitor should give the counsel a right to prove, whereas before the death he had no right to recover the sums at all. I need C refer to no other case than that of Wells v. Wells (3), a decision of the Court of Appeal in 1914, which amply justifies the proposition that during the lifetime of the solicitor there was no cause of action by counsel against him at law or in equity. That being the position, it seems to me clear that the applicant cannot be admitted as a creditor.

There is, however, the alternative claim, which is "that the personal representative may be ordered to pay to him a sum equal to the dividend on the said amount rateably D with the other creditors of the estate and as if he had a legal right of proof in respect of the said sum." That claim, which is in rather unusual form, is traceable to the fact that in Re Hall (2), bankrupt solicitors admitted that they had actually received from clients a specific sum in respect of fees payable by them on behalf of those clients to counsel previously to the bankruptcy. Mr. Commissioner FANE expressed the opinion that this was sufficient to entitle counsel to prove for this sum, as money had and E received to his use. The proposition put forward on behalf of the applicant in the present case was that, in view of Re Hall (2), he is entitled in a bankruptcy either to prove, as the commissioner seems to have thought in that case, or to have a quasi right of proof; and I will explain later, by reference to the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in Wells v. Wells (3)—commenting on Mr. Commissioner FANE's decision in Re Hall (2) —upon what principle this quasi right, which the commissioner allowed in that case, F is based.

Section 34 (1) of the Administration of Estates Act of 1925 provides certain rules for the administration of a deceased person's estate where that estate is insolvent, and the rules which are applied (and are to be found in Part I of Sched. I to this Act) are those which would be applied if this estate were being administered in bankruptcy. The relevant rule (r. 2) says:

> ". . . the same rules shall prevail . . . as to debts and liabilities provable . . . as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the assets of persons adjudged bankrupt."

If it were the law, as Mr. Commissioner FANE, if correctly reported, said, that in the circumstances of that case counsel had a right of proof, the argument would be unassailable that in the administration of this insolvent estate the same rule as to debts H provable would be applied. But Re Hall (2) has been considered, and, in particular, has been considered in Wells v. Wells (3), and SWINFEN EADY, L.J., there indicated that the commissioner was wrong in holding that there was a right of proof and that, if the view taken by the commissioner, as reported, is to be supported at all, it must be supported on the footing that the court of bankruptcy may, in certain circumstances, treat a man who has no legal right of proof as though he had such a right. Let me I assume that that view is correct and that in certain circumstances, such as those dealt with in Re Hall (2), counsel has what I may call a quasi right of proof in bankruptcy for his fees. I can find nothing in the rules in Part I of Sched. I to the Administration of Estates Act which would justify me in treating such a practice of the court in bankruptcy as being in any way applicable or extendable to the administration of a deceased's insolvent estate.

The passage in the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in Wells v. Wells (3), to which I referred is:

> "There is another case upon which we ought to say a word, that is the case of Re Hall (2) which was with reference to the right of counsel to prove in bankruptcy for fees. In that case, the solicitor for the assignees of a bankrupt undertook to hand over in full to the counsel any fees which might come to the hands of the assignees."

That has no application to the present case, because I am not dealing with any moneys handed over by a client to the executor of the solicitor after his death. His Lordship goes on:

> "But in the same case Mr. Commissioner Fane held that as regards counsel's fees received by the bankrupt solicitors before their bankruptcy, and admitted by them to have been so received, counsel could prove for this sum as money had and received to his use. This case is very shortly reported, but in our opinion the decision cannot be supported upon the ground on which it appears to have been rested. No action for money had and received would have lain against the solicitors at the suit of counsel, and no proof upon that ground could be sustained."

In other words, if Mr. Commissioner Fane decided that counsel had a right of proof, he was wrong. Swinfen Eady, L.J., adds:

> "The decision can only be supported, if at all [those words are very significant] on the principle of Ex parte James (1) that the estate of the bankrupt having been increased by the fees of counsel paid to and improperly retained by the solicitors, and this amount having been mixed with and become indistinguishable from the rest of the bankrupt's property, all that the court can do by way of acting honestly is to order the trustee to pay to counsel a sum equal to the dividend on the amount so received, rateably with the other creditors, and as if he had a legal right of proof."

It will be observed that Swinfen Eady, L.J., takes great care not to approve the decision of Mr. Commissioner Fane even on that ground. He says it "can only be supported, if at all," on that ground. As it is not necessary for the decision of this case, I propose to speak with some caution, but I think I am justified in saying that, while the application of the principle in Ex parte James (1) is familiar in the Bankruptcy Court, it is a principle to be applied with the greatest caution. I do not know of any authority, and counsel has not brought before me any authority, for the proposition that such a doctrine could be applied to an executor who is not an officer of the court. Further, it will be found on investigating the cases that the principle of Ex parte James (1), so far as the reported cases go, is that, where the trustee in bankruptcy, during the bankruptcy, has received certain moneys which in the view of the court it is not honest for him to hold, the court will, in certain circumstances, make him refund them.

There is, further, one case, Re Thellusson (4), where the money which the trustee was ordered to refund was not actually received by him; it was paid into the bankrupt's banking account at a moment at which, as it ultimately turned out, by reason of the doctrine of relation back, the assets of the debtor were vested in the trustee. When the trustee came into office that sum so paid to the bankrupt was, in fact, there, subject to some diminution occasioned, no doubt, by the per contra account of the bank. It was a specific sum upon which the court could lay its hands and about which a particular order was made as appears in the report of that case. My attention at present has not been drawn to any case in which the principle of Ex parte James (1) has been applied so as to order a trustee in bankruptcy to return money which, before the bankruptcy began, came into and became mixed with and indistinguishable from the rest of the bankrupt's property. It is not for me to say what are the limitations in such a case of the application of the doctrine, but if my view as to the reported cases is right, it may throw some light upon the phrase used in Wells v. Wells (3), by Swinfen Eady, L.J., when he says: "The decision can only be supported, if at all. . . ." It is significant that there does not appear to have been in bankruptcy such a case as Swinfen Eady, L.J., envisages at the top of p. 167 of the report, where the doctrine of Ex parte James (1) has been applied so as to order the trustee in bankruptcy to return money which, before the bankruptcy, had become indistinguishably mixed with the rest of the bankrupt's property. In my judgment, it is impossible for me to apply, as I am invited to apply, the doctrine of Ex parte James (1) in this case.

I will leave the case with this observation only—it was suggested to me that, in bankruptcy, where it is found that a client has paid a solicitor money to meet counsel's fees and counsel's fees have not been met, there is a practice of treating counsel as though he had a provable right and paying him a dividend pari passu with the other creditors on the sum in question, and it is no doubt with a view to that that the alternative claim in the words which I have read appears in the summons. It must be borne in mind that in those cases it must often happen that the client who has paid the money for the purpose of it being paid to counsel, or on the representation that it was to reimburse the solicitor money paid to counsel which in fact had not been so paid, might have some claim in the bankruptcy in respect of that money which had been so obtained from him; and it may be that the practice, if it exists, may be justified by the fact that the client would be in a position to put in a claim to prove in respect of the moneys so obtained from him, and obviously, as a matter of ordinary business dealing, should he recover a dividend, he would hand it on to the counsel, as it was always his intention that counsel should be paid. There may be that justification for what is said to be the practice in such cases; but that justification, if it exists, does not proceed upon any principle which would enable counsel himself to prove in the administration of the estate of a deceased person. Whether that practice be right or wrong and whether that justification is sound or not, is a matter of argument. None of these considerations is, however, relevant to the present application. I find it impossible to accede to the application and can deal with it only by dismissing it with costs.

Coal Mine—Prosecution of manager—Personal commission of offence—Failure to keep register of times of descent and ascent of workers—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 57), s. 2 (1)—Coal Mines Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 50), p. 102 (5).

By the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 102 (5): "No prosecution shall be instituted against the owner, agent, manager, or under-manager of a mine for any offence under this Act, not committed personally by such owner, agent, manager, or under-manager, which can be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction, except by an inspector or with the consent in writing of the Secretary of State . . ."

By s. 126 (e): "This Act shall apply to offences under such of the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Acts, 1887 to 1908, as are unrepealed by this Act in like manner as if they were offences against this Act, and expressions in those provisions shall have the same meaning as in this Act."

By the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, s. 2 (1): "The . . . manager of every mine . . . shall cause a register to be kept in the form prescribed by the Secretary of State, and containing the particulars prescribed by him with respect to the times at which men are lowered into and raised from the mine, and the cases in which any man is below ground for more than the time fixed by this Act, and the cause thereof. . . ."

The offence of failing to cause a register to be kept in accordance with the provisions of the last-named subsection is one committed personally by a manager, &c., and may, accordingly, be prosecuted by a private individual.

Case Stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Pontypridd.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Pontypridd, an information was preferred by the respondent, May, against the appellant, Hannaford, for that the appellant on March 9, 1934, at Pontypridd, did not cause a register to be kept in the form prescribed and containing particulars prescribed by the Secretary of State, with respect to the cases in which men were below ground for more than the time fixed by the Coal Mines Acts and the cause thereof, contrary to the Coal Mines Acts, 1887–1931.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:—

(a) The appellant was on March 9, 1934, and had been for four years, manager of the Lewis Merthyr Colliery, Forth, Glamorganshire. (b) On the above day certain workmen employed at the colliery were below the ground in a mine for more than the number of hours specified by the Coal Mines Acts, 1887–1931. (c) The register which the manager of the mine was required to cause to be kept under s. 2 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, was produced, and in respect of the above day no entries were made by the appellant or by anyone giving particulars of the cause and (or) causes of the aforesaid workmen being below ground on that date for more than the time fixed by the above Acts. (d) The respondent was a miners' agent and in preferring the information he was not acting for or on behalf of an inspector of mines, and the prosecution was instituted without obtaining the consent in writing of the Secretary of State. (e) The entries in the register were usually and by the custom of the mine made by an official of the mine, known as "the banksman," whose duty it is to make the necessary entries.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the failure to cause the register to be kept in accordance with the requirements of s. 2 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, was not an offence committed personally by the manager, but was of the class of offences which were required to be prosecuted, if at all, by an inspector of mines or by some person with the consent in writing of the Secretary of State, in accordance with the provisions of s. 126, proviso (e), and s. 102 (5) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, and that, therefore, the information, having been laid otherwise than in such manner, was improperly and wrongly laid, and the proceedings were outside the jurisdiction of the court. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, inasmuch as a personal duty of supervision was imposed by s. 3 (1), and s. 24 (2) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, the failure to cause the register to be properly kept was an offence committed personally by the manager, and that, therefore, the information was rightly laid by the respondent as a private individual and was within the jurisdiction of the court.

The magistrate held that there was an absolute obligation under s. 2 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, upon the manager of the mine to cause a register to be kept in the form prescribed and containing the particulars prescribed by the Secretary of State, and that, having regard to s. 3 (1) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, there was a personal obligation on the manager to cause the register to be properly kept in accordance with the aforesaid statutory provisions. He, therefore, decided that the offence charged was one which might be prosecuted by a person other than an inspector or a person having the consent in writing of the Secretary of State, and that the information against the appellant was rightly laid. He imposed a fine of £2, and the appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

The material provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, and the Coal Mines Act, 1911, appear in the judgments.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Pontypridd.

The Case arises out of a prosecution under the Coal Mines Acts, 1887 to 1931, in which the magistrate gave judgment against the present appellant and fined him the sum of £2. The question before this court is whether in finding as he did the magistrate came to a correct determination in point of law.

It was not disputed that on the day named in the information men had been below ground for a time which exceeded the statutory time. It was not disputed that, although a register was kept purporting to be the register satisfying the requirements of s. 2 of the Act of 1908, that register contained no entry whatever either of the fact that three men were below ground for more than the time which the statute prescribes, or of the cause or causes of their so being below ground. As appears from the arguments made to this court, the real question, and ultimately the only question, which had to be decided by the magistrate was whether it was true to say that the failure or non-compliance exhibited by the facts of the case, in contravention of the statute, was such a failure as could truly be described as an offence committed personally by the manager.

The leading contention on behalf of the appellant in the court below, as here, was that the failure to cause the register to be kept in accordance with the requirements of s. 2 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, was not an offence committed personally by the manager and was of the class of offences which are required to be prosecuted, if at all, by an inspector of mines, or by some person with the consent in writing of the Secretary of State. The importance of that contention is derived from the fact that the prosecutor here (the respondent) was a miners' agent who was not employed in the mine, and was not authorised, either by an inspector or by the Secretary of State, to begin the prosecution. It became, therefore, an essential ingredient of the case for the prosecution that, if conviction there might be, it should be shown that the offence referred to was an offence of such a kind as to come within the range of offences personally committed by the manager.

That proposition depends on the provisions of s. 102 (5) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. That subsection states:

> "No prosecution shall be instituted against the owner, agent, manager, or under-manager of a mine for any offence under this Act, not committed personally by such owner, agent, manager, or under-manager, which can be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction, except by an inspector or with the consent in writing of the Secretary of State."

The magistrate had, therefore, to determine the question whether the offence here alleged was committed personally by the manager. He came to the conclusion that it was, and the only question which this court has to decide is whether, in coming to that conclusion, he made an error in law.

It is obvious, when one looks at the scheme of this legislation, which has sometimes been called the Miners' Charter, that many steps are taken to accentuate the personal responsibility of owners, agents, and managers in coal mines. Their responsibility is evidently regarded by the legislature as a matter of supreme importance, regard being had to the welfare of the persons employed in this difficult occupation. Again and again one finds in these statutes provisions that in certain circumstances not one but all of the three persons—the owner, the agent, and the manager—shall be held liable. By s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1911 it is provided that:

> "Every mine shall be under one manager, who shall be responsible for the control, management, and direction of the mine, and the owner or agent of every mine shall appoint himself or some other person to be the manager of such mine."

Section 3 (1) of that Act states that:

> "In every mine required to be under the control of a manager, daily personal supervision shall be exercised by the manager, and, where an under-manager has been appointed by the owner or agent of the mine, also by [not 'by,' but 'also by'] that under-manager."

In like manner one finds again and again in this legislation such a provision, for example, as is contained in s. 3 (3) of the Act:

> "If in any mine there is a contravention of or non-compliance with the provisions of this section, the mine shall be deemed to be not managed in conformity with this Act," and where that inference is drawn the responsibility automatically falls on various individuals. Moreover, by s. 126, proviso (e), of the Act of 1911, it is provided that that Act

> "shall apply to offences under such of the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Acts, 1887 to 1908, as are unrepealed by this Act in like manner as if they were offences against this Act, and expressions in those provisions shall have the same meaning as in this Act."

The particular provision which is said to have been contravened here is the provision contained in s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1908. That subsection is to be construed in close connection with the Act of 1911 and, the prosecutor below being the person he was, we have to decide whether in law it is incorrect to say that the offence alleged was committed personally by the manager.

The scheme of that Act seems obviously to contemplate three different things. At one end of the scale there are offences clearly committed by the manager personally. At the other end of the scale are offences committed by some person other than the manager. Then there is an intermediate class—offences not personally committed by the manager and yet of such a kind that, by an inspector, or with the consent in writing of the Secretary of State, a prosecution may be instituted against the manager. It was argued by counsel for the appellant that, if it should indeed be the case that the offence here charged was committed personally by the manager, it must follow that every offence committed in a coal mine, at any rate against the provisions of this legislation, must be an offence committed personally by the manager. To rebut that argument it was necessary to find some instance or instances of offences where, although at first blush one would say that it was not the manager who personally committed them, nevertheless, within the true interpretation of this statute, the manager might have a properly instituted prosecution launched against him with reference to them. It seems to me that counsel for the respondent has filled that lacuna. He has satisfied me that under various provisions of the Act of 1911, not least ss. 101 and 27, there may be offences which, if the matter were tabula rasa, one would say were not personally committed by the manager, and yet are offences for which the manager may properly find himself a defendant in proceedings. More than that, and apart from any particular instance, I am impressed by the fact that throughout this legislation there is scattered here and there the provision that in certain circumstances, where certain things have been done or omitted, the mine is to be deemed to be a mine not managed in conformity with the provisions of this statute. In those circumstances it follows that the manager may find himself convicted of an offence. Therefore, without entering further on a difficult and interesting case, it seems to me that the magistrate was right.

I would add only one observation. Reference has been made to a recent Scottish case in the House of Lords—Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'Mullan (1)—which arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and in which it was alleged that there had been a breach of statutory duty on the part of the employer under s. 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. It was with reference to that subject-matter that LORD ATKIN in the course of his speech, speaking of provisions for safety in the Coal Mines Act, said ([1934] A.C. at p. 8):

> "It is further beyond question that these provisions impose a special duty upon the employer towards those for whose safety they are designed" and, having referred to certain reported cases, his Lordship went on to say:

> "And in an action founded on a breach of such a duty . . . it is irrelevant whether his servants [that is, the employer's servants] had disregarded his instructions or whether he knew or not of the breach."

That passage is cited, not as concluding the present matter, but as throwing light on it; not as laying down some universal affirmative proposition, but as exhibiting the principle which is to be collected from this legislation. I think that the judgments in that case pro tanto support the view which the magistrate took in this case.

Looking at the whole of the matter, and paying the greatest attention to the able argument which we have heard from counsel for the appellant, I have no doubt that the magistrate was right and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no question here that an offence was in fact committed against the provisions of s. 2 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, and the whole question is whether that offence was, within the meaning of s. 102 (5) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, one committed personally by the manager.

It is to be observed that in s. 2 of the Act of 1908, which creates this offence, there is no proviso exempting the owner or manager in certain circumstances—no such proviso as is to be found in many of the sections of the Act of 1911. Take, for instance, a somewhat analogous section, s. 94 of the Act of 1911, which requires the owner, agent, or manager to keep in the office a register, and to cause to be entered in that register, in such form as may be prescribed, the name, age, &c., and date of first employment of all the boys employed, &c. The section following that section makes it an offence if any person contravenes or fails to comply with, or permits any person to contravene or fail to comply with, any provision with respect to the employment of boys, &c., and it is provided that > "in the event of any such contravention or non-compliance by any person whomsoever, the owner, agent, and manager of the mine shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the provisions of this Act, to prevent the contravention or non-compliance."

As I have pointed out, although s. 94 imposes a somewhat similar duty on the manager, and provides him with an excuse in certain circumstances, there is no such proviso in s. 2 of the Act of 1908.

It will be said, of course, that the effect of s. 126 (e) of the Act of 1911, which provides that

> "This Act shall apply to offences under such of the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Acts, 1887 to 1908, as are unrepealed by this Act in like manner as if they were offences against this Act," is that an offence under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1908 is now to be treated as if it were an offence under the Act of 1911, and I have looked to see whether there is any provision in the Act of 1911 which affords any excuse to the manager for an offence against the Act of 1908 such as is to be found in the section which I have just quoted. The only provision which appears to me to have any relevance to the question of protection of the manager is in s. 102 of the Act of 1911.

That section contains a short code for protection. The marginal note is "Prosecutions of owners, agents, managers, &c.," and I think it might be more appropriately described as "protection of owners in cases of prosecution." The section provides:

> "Where proceedings are taken under this Act against the owner or agent of a mine [not manager, but against the owner or agent] in respect of an offence under this Act for which the owner, agent, or manager or each of them is liable under this Act, the owner or agent shall not be liable to any penalty if he proves" certain things which are set out under the letters (a), (b), and (c). Under the letter (c) he must prove "that the offence was committed without his knowledge, consent or connivance." Then s. 102 (3) contains this provision:

> "Nothing in this Act shall render the owner, agent, or manager of a mine liable to a penalty in respect of any contravention of or non-compliance with the provisions of this Act, if he proves that the contravention or non-compliance was due to causes over which he had no control and against the happening of which it was impracticable for him to make provision."

That seems to me to be the only protection which is afforded to a manager who is accused of an offence under s. 2 of the Act of 1908, and it is to be observed that the protection afforded to him is there limited to a case where he proves that the contravention or non-compliance was due to causes over which he had no control and against the happening of which it was impracticable for him to make provision.

It appears to me impossible that the manager in this case can bring himself within that clause. It is impossible that he can say that the offence was due to a cause over which he had no control and against the happening of which it was impracticable for him to make provision, because, first of all, s. 3 of the Act of 1911 requires that he shall exercise daily personal supervision, and if he chooses to take the risk of delegating his duty to a banksman it clearly remains his duty to supervise the work of the banksman. In my view, the effect of s. 2 of the Act of 1908 is to impose on the manager a personal obligation to see that the required particulars are entered in the register.

In those circumstances, if there was a personal obligation, and if the manager committed a breach of that duty and that obligation, I cannot doubt that the offence was one committed personally by the manager, and I therefore agree that this appeal fails.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The point is really a very short one. It seems to me that the case for the appellant is not based on any conspicuous merits. There is no doubt that he committed an offence. There is no doubt that that was an offence for which he could be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction. He was so prosecuted and was convicted.

The only point which is taken on his behalf is that the person who set the law in motion was not authorised to do so. The appellant was prosecuted for an offence under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, s. 2 (1) of which provides that the manager of a mine shall cause a register to be kept in the form prescribed by the Secretary of State, and containing the necessary particulars. The appellant did not cause that register containing the proper particulars to be kept, and, accordingly, it is said that he was a person who came within the words of s. 7:

> "If any person contravenes or fails to comply with any provision of this Act . . . he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

So far, then, if he had been prosecuted before 1911, he would have been properly convicted of this offence. But the Act of 1911 created a large number of new offences, and with regard to them it was provided in a great many instances that, while certain persons, including the manager, should primâ facie be guilty if there were any failure to comply with the provisions of the Act, yet there should be a defence for any such person if he could establish—and it must be observed that the onus is on him to do so—that he had taken reasonable precautions to prevent any infraction of the provisions of the Act. When the legislature brought the provisions of the Act of 1908, including s. 2 and the section which creates penalties, within the terms of the Act of 1911, it omitted to put the person who was prosecuted under the Act of 1908 in the same position as a person who was prosecuted for some offence under the Act of 1911. It may have been done designedly or undesignedly, but that is the position.

It is, therefore, not contended here that the appellant did not commit the offence which was charged against him, but it is said that the offence was not committed personally by him. It will be observed that the words of the Act are "any offence not committed personally by the manager." The offence was committed. Who committed it? As I understand the facts, the offence was committed by the manager, and by him personally. This was not a matter for which he became responsible because some other person had omitted to do something which he was required to do. It is not one of those cases, like the case in s. 27, where no person is mentioned and the name of the manager is not mentioned, but there is a direction that a thing shall be done, and then, by reason of a general section, s. 101 (2), inasmuch as the mine has not been managed in conformity with the Act in some particular respect, the manager is made responsible and liable to prosecution. That was not the case here at all. The appellant was prosecuted because he had failed to do something which he personally was required by the Act of 1908 to do, and that appears to me a personal commission by him of an offence. If he personally had made a wrong entry in the register, no one could have argued that he was not personally responsible for that and (assuming it to be an offence) that it was not an offence for which he was personally responsible and which he had personally committed. The Act, however, has put on him, and put on him personally, the duty of causing a register to be kept. I listened with great interest to the admirable argument of his counsel, but it seems to me that he has failed to get over one very obvious difficulty. The Act has required the manager to do certain things. He has, in fact, failed to do one of those things, and he has been prosecuted and convicted for having failed to do that thing which the law requires him to do. In those circumstances, it is, in my view, impossible to say that he has not personally committed the offence of which he was convicted.

On that very short ground, as well as for the reasons which have been given in the judgments already delivered, I agreed that the conviction was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Trustee—Custodian trustee—Bank—Power to charge fees—Appointment also as managing trustee—Public Trustee Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 55), s. 4 (3).

By the will of the testator, dated March 8, 1879, no power was given to any trustee to charge for his services as a trustee. In 1932 a son of the testator was sole trustee, and by a deed dated May 31, 1932, he appointed the defendant bank to be sole managing trustee and also custodian trustee of the will, the bank to be treated, not only as managing trustee, but separately as custodian trustee with such functions, duties and powers as appertained to a custodian trustee under s. 4 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, and while acting as custodian trustee to have power to charge such fees for its services as would be chargeable by the Public Trustee if he were custodian trustee of the will. In an action by beneficiaries under the will,

Held: a body named in s. 4 (3) of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, as entitled to act as custodian trustee could not properly be appointed also to act as managing trustee; a person performing the duties of both offices was, in effect, an ordinary trustee; and, therefore, the defendant bank was not entitled under s. 4 (3) to charge fees for its services.

Appeal from an order of Bennett, J.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Bennett, J.:

"The plaintiffs in this action are Mrs. Lilly Forster and Mrs. Milly Olga Bertha Sinelnikoff, her daughter, and the defendants are Williams Deacon's Bank, Ltd. The plaintiffs are beneficiaries under the will of the late Mr. Philip Ziegler and the defendants are the trustees of his will, and the question between the parties is whether the defendants are entitled to charge the capital and income of the trust estate with the same fees as those to which the Public Trustee would be entitled if he were custodian trustee of the testator's will.

"The testator made his will on March 8, 1879, and died on Sept. 16, 1880. The will contains no power for any trustee to charge remuneration for his services as a trustee. On May 31, 1932, Mr. T. P. Ziegler, a son of the testator, was the sole trustee of the testator's will. He desired to be discharged, and on that day he and the defendants were parties to a deed of appointment whereby the defendants were appointed trustees. The deed, after reciting the will and the various appointments of new trustees which had been made since the testator's death and the state of the residuary trust fund, contains these operative provisions:

"(i) In exercise of the power for this purpose conferred by the Trustee Act, 1925, and by the Public Trustee Act, 1906, and of all other powers him hereunto enabling the present trustee hereby appoints the bank to be (a) sole managing trustee of the said will in the place of the present trustee and (b) custodian trustee of the said will. (ii) The bank while acting as trustee of the said will shall be treated not only as a managing trustee but separately as custodian trustee with such functions, duties, and powers as appertain to a custodian trustee under s. 4 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, and may act as such managing trustee and custodian trustee respectively by its proper officer or officers. (iii) The bank while acting as custodian trustee of the said will shall be entitled to receive by way of remuneration for its services as such trustee out of the property subject to the trusts of the said will such fees as would for the time being be chargeable by the Public Trustee if he were custodian trustee of the said will. (iv) The bank hereby consents to act as sole managing trustee and as custodian trustee of the said will.

"Two of the beneficiaries commenced an action against the bank for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to any remuneration, whether out of the capital or the income of the trust property, for acting as trustees."

Section 4 of the Trustee Act, 1906, provides as follows:

> "(2) Where the Public Trustee is appointed to be custodian trustee of any trust—(a) The trust property shall be transferred to the custodian trustee as if he were sole trustee, and for that purpose vesting orders may, where necessary, be made under the Trustee Act, 1893; (b) the management of the trust property and the exercise of any power or discretion exercisable by the trustees under the trust shall remain vested in the trustees other than the custodian trustee (which trustees are hereinafter referred to as the managing trustees); (c) as between the custodian trustee and the managing trustees, and subject and without prejudice to the rights of any other persons, the custodian trustee shall have the custody of all securities and documents of title relating to the trust property, but the managing trustees shall have free access thereto and be entitled to take copies therefrom or extracts thereof; (d) the custodian trustee shall concur in and perform all acts necessary to enable the managing trustees to exercise their powers of management or any other power or discretion vested in them (including the power to pay money or securities into court) unless the matter in which he is requested to concur is a breach of trust, or involves a personal liability upon him in respect of calls or otherwise, but, unless he so concurs, the custodian trustee shall not be liable for any act or default on the part of the managing trustees or any of them; (e) all sums payable to or out of the income or capital of the trust property shall be paid to or by the custodian trustee; provided that the custodian trustee may allow the dividends and other income derived from the trust property to be paid to the managing trustees or to such person as they direct, or into such bank to the credit of such person as they may direct, and in such case shall be exonerated from seeing to the application thereof and shall not be answerable for any loss or misapplication thereof; (f) the power of appointing new trustees, when exercisable by the trustees, shall be exercisable by the managing trustees alone, but the custodian trustee shall have the same power of applying to the court for the appointment of a new trustee as any other trustee; (g) in determining the number of trustees for the purposes of the Trustee Act, 1893, the custodian trustee shall not be reckoned as a trustee. . . . (3) The provisions of this section shall apply in like manner as to the Public Trustee to any banking or insurance company or other body corporate entitled by rules made under this Act to act as custodian trustee, with power for such company or body corporate to charge and retain or pay out of the trust property fees not exceeding the fees chargeable by the Public Trustee as custodian trustee."

BENNETT, J., in giving judgment, said: In my judgment, it is clear that the Public Trustee, while holding the appointment of custodian trustee, can also be a managing trustee with other persons acting with him as managing trustees, and if he were so appointed when those associated with him as managing trustees had for any reason ceased to be managing trustees, I can find no provision of the Public Trustee Act which prohibits the Public Trustee from continuing to act as a managing trustee while retaining the office of custodian trustee. It would not seem to me to be the necessary consequence of the language of s. 4 of the Public Trustee Act, that there must always be some person or persons associated with the Public Trustee as managing trustee to enable the Public Trustee to act as custodian trustee. As I can find no express prohibition in the section preventing the Public Trustee from holding both offices I see no reason why I should imply into it a prohibition against a banking or insurance company or body corporate, duly qualified to act as custodian trustee, holding both offices, or disentitling them to receive the remuneration which the Public Trustee would be entitled to receive under the provisions of s. 4 (3). On these grounds the basis of the plaintiff's action has, in my judgment, no existence and, therefore, I dismiss it with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

W. P. Spens, K.C., and A. G. Mathews for the plaintiffs.
Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and John Bennett for the defendant bank.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This case raises an intricate point which depends upon the careful consideration of a number of sections in an Act of Parliament. The facts are not in dispute. It appears that Philip Ziegler made a will on March 8, 1879, and he bequeathed his residuary personal estate to executors and trustees in trust for sale and conversion, and subject to a life interest he gave a portion to Mrs. Lilian Forster, who was his daughter and her daughter again, Mrs. Sinelnikoff, and they are the present plaintiffs. Philip Ziegler died upon Sept. 16, 1880, and probate of his will was obtained on Jan. 6 the following year, 1881. The ordinary sequence of events happened—the life interest of the wife fell in, and on May 31, 1932, for the purpose of carrying out the remaining trusts of the will it became desirable that a new trustee should be appointed. At that time the person who was the surviving trustee was one T. P. Ziegler, a son of the testator, Philip Ziegler. By a deed of May 31, 1932, T. P. Ziegler, being desirous of being discharged from the trusts of the will and of appointing the defendant bank as sole managing trustee in his place, and also as custodian trustee of his father's will, it was recited:

> "And whereas it is intended that the said stocks, funds and securities particularised in the said schedule hereto shall forthwith be transferred by the present trustee into the sole name of the bank as such custodian trustee as aforesaid," and then the deed witnesseth:

> "(i) In exercise of the power of appointment for this purpose conferred by the Trustee Act, 1925, and by the Public Trustee Act, 1906, and of all other powers him hereunto enabling the present trustee hereby appoints the Bank to be (a) sole managing trustee of the said will in the place of the present trustee and (b) custodian trustee of the said will."

It also provided that

> "The bank while acting as trustee of the said will shall be treated not only as > managing trustee, but separately as custodian trustee with such functions, duties and powers as appertain to a custodian trustee under s. 4 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, and may act as such managing trustee and custodian trustee respectively by its proper officer or officers."

By para. (iii) of the deed:

> "The bank while acting as custodian trustee of the said will shall be entitled to receive by way of remuneration for its services as such trustee out of the property subject to the trusts of the said will, such fees as would, for the time being, be chargeable by the Public Trustee if he were custodian trustee of the said will."

The effect of the deed is to discharge T. P. Ziegler from his trust and to give, by the words I have already referred to and in part recited, the positions of managing trustee C and custodian trustee of the remaining estates to the defendant bank. It will be noticed from the words I have read, that there is no effort made to allow the defendant bank to make any charge other than in remuneration for its services as custodian trustee of the will, and that is for reasons which will appear later.

There appear to have been unhappy differences in this family trust; it is unnecessary to go into them, but in consequence of them, on Oct. 4, 1933, the plaintiffs brought D this action against the bank and set out shortly the facts I have already recounted. The plaintiffs claim (i) a declaration that the defendant bank is not entitled to any remuneration whether out of the capital or the income of the trust property for acting as trustee. (ii) If and so far as may be necessary that the trusts of the said will may be carried into execution by the court with all proper accounts and inquiries. What the plaintiffs say is that it was improper to make such an appointment as the last surviving E trustee purported to make, and ineffective to allow the defendant bank to charge a remuneration. In the defence the defendants make it plain that they are asking for the fees as custodian trustee, and no more, because they say that they have a right to charge fees as custodian trustee, and deny that they have wrongfully charged or deducted fees against capital or income of the settled shares of the plaintiffs as alleged. The issue, therefore, is raised whether the defendants were entitled to charge fees as F custodian trustees, but there is involved for the purposes of the determination of that question a consideration of what was the effect of the appointment of the defendant bank as a new trustee in succession to the younger T. P. Ziegler.

There is a power to be found in s. 37 (1) (c) of the Trustee Act, 1925, whereby when it becomes necessary to appoint a trustee for the whole or any part of the trust property

G
> "it shall not be obligatory, save as hereinafter provided, to appoint more than one new trustee where only one trustee was originally appointed, or to fill up the original number of trustees where more than two trustees were originally appointed, but, except where only one trustee was originally appointed, and a sole trustee when appointed will be able to give valid receipts for all capital money, a trustee shall not be discharged from his trust unless there will be either a trust corporation or at least two individuals to act as trustees to perform the trust."

H
The defendant bank is a trust corporation within the meaning of that sub-clause, and the appointment was made accordingly.

What is meant by "custodian trustee"? What is this distinction that is drawn? A reference to the Public Trustee Act, 1906, will answer that question. By s. 2 of that Act it is declared:

I
> "Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of this Act and rules made thereunder, the Public Trustee may, if he thinks fit (a) act in the administration of estates of small value; (b) act as custodian trustee; (c) act as an ordinary trustee," and in the subsequent sections provisions are made at greater length for dealing with the three characters. Section 3 deals with the administration of small estates, estates of which the gross capital value is proved to be less than £1000. Section 4 deals with the position as custodian trustee. Section 5 deals with the powers of a public trustee as an ordinary trustee. When one turns to s. 4 (2), which amplifies the powers and duties of custodian trustees, we find this:

> "Where the Public Trustee is appointed to be custodian trustee of any trust (a) the trust property shall be transferred to the custodian trustee, as if he were sole trustee" and "(b) the management of the trust property and the exercise of any power or discretion exercisable by the trustees under the trust shall remain vested in the trustees other than the custodian trustee (which trustees are hereinafter referred to as the managing trustees); (c) as between the custodian trustee and the managing trustees, and subject and without prejudice to the rights of any other persons, the custodian trustee shall have the custody of all securities and documents of title relating to the trust property, but the managing trustees shall have free access thereto and be entitled to take copies thereof or extracts therefrom."

Those passages I have read make it plain what it is that differentiates the two characters of custodian trustee and managing trustee, and how the duties of an ordinary trustee can be, and are in certain cases, split up into those two categories.

C

It is right to call attention to the fact that in later clauses of s. 4 (2) powers are given to the custodian trustee which he may want to exercise if it should happen that the managing trustees, with whom he is obviously intended to be associated, should fail for any purpose, and cl. (f) says this:

> "The power of appointing new trustees, when exercisable by the trustees shall be exercisable by the managing trustees alone, but the custodian trustee shall have the same power of applying to the court for the appointment of a new trustee as any other trustee."

D

That is how the difficulty here arose. Clause (g) provides:

> "In determining the number of trustees for the purposes of the Trustee Act, 1893, the custodian trustee shall not be reckoned as a trustee."

It is thus made plain that you can have a person appointed to exercise the functions of a custodian trustee, and no more.

There is a provision inserted in sub-s. (3) of s. 4 which enables payment to be made in respect of the duties performed by a custodian trustee or by a body corporate such as the present bank. The provision is as follows:

F

> "The provisions of this section shall apply in like manner as to the Public Trustee to any banking or insurance company or other body corporate entitled by rules made under this Act to act as custodian trustee, with power for such company or body corporate to charge and retain or pay out of the trust property fees not exceeding the fees chargeable by the Public Trustee as custodian trustee."

G

If, therefore, the defendant bank can establish that they are custodian trustees, they are entitled to exercise the powers under sub-s. (3) and to require to be paid for their services as custodian trustees. If their position was that they are trustees without any limiting terms, a difficulty would arise, because then in order to obtain remuneration the powers of s. 42 of the Trustee Act, 1925, would have to be invoked and that section says:

H

> "Where the court appoints a corporation, other than the Public Trustee, to be a trustee either solely or jointly with another person, the court may authorise the corporation to charge such remuneration for its services as trustee as the court may think fit."

I

It will be seen, having regard to the terms of s. 4 (3) of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, enabling a charge to be made for services rendered as custodian trustee, why the defendants rely on the fact that they are custodian trustees, and as such have made, and do not claim to make any further demand for anything more than they are entitled to retain as fees payable to a custodian trustee. It is said, however, by the plaintiffs, that it is not a possible position for the defendants to take up; that it is all very well for them to call themselves custodian trustees, and it is all very well for them to claim no more than a custodian trustee can claim, but when one turns to the deed under which they were appointed, whatever its exact terms may be and however much it may purport to divide the duties into sections, the effect and operation of it is to make the bank a trustee without any qualification at all. The bank is appointed sole managing trustee and it is appointed custodian trustee. What are its powers? They are the powers which are held by an ordinary trustee. Is it possible by the device —one might almost call it notation—of dividing up these two functions into A and B, to alter the character and duties and powers which are given to the defendant bank and operate to discharge the late trustee from any other responsibility? What is the effect of this appointment? It would seem that it has to be treated as an effective appointment, and, if it is an effective appointment, it operates to make the bank a trustee sans phrase. On the other hand, if it sets out to do what cannot be done, it is inoperative, and the charge cannot be made because the deed is ineffective to give the rights to the bank as a custodian trustee only.

It appears to me that the structure and words of the Act of 1906 indicate that the Public Trustee can have several different characteristic functions. He can, first of all, be appointed to act in the administration of small estates, and that gives him certain powers in relation to those estates which are very important where small funds have to be administrated. Secondly, he can undertake a function which is less than a complete trusteeship; he may be a custodian trustee, and that connotes the fact that there must be somebody who will be the managing trustee; or he may be appointed as an ordinary trustee, which is contemplated by s. 5. On examining the words of s. 4 and bearing in mind that the office of custodian trustee is a lesser function than that of an ordinary trustee, it is plain why it is necessary to put therein a number of clauses which enable the custodian trustee to act in circumstances which may arise either in relation to or under the direction of managing trustees, or where he may be faced with the fact that the managing trustees have ceased to be, by death or otherwise. That seems to indicate a clear distinction between a case where a man is appointed only to hold the lesser office of custodian trustee, and where he is appointed to exercise the full powers of an ordinary trustee, as he can be under s. 5.

In the present case it is unnecessary for us to determine whether or not we are to treat the deed of appointment of May 31, 1932, as wholly ineffective, or whether we are to treat it as effective, but attempting to do what cannot be done. In either event, it appears that the defendants have not got a right to act as custodian trustees only, and to shelter themselves or to protect themselves by saying they have the right under s. 4 (3) of the Act of 1906, or in the other alternative, the deed is ineffective, and under those circumstances they have not got the right to make a charge.

In those circumstances, although in what I have described as an intricate matter, I differ from BENNETT, J., with hesitation and with some diffidence, yet I feel the right course is to allow this appeal and to make the declaration which is required in the prayer. The appeal must be allowed with costs, and the claimants must be entitled to succeed in their action, with costs, but the costs of the inquiries which will be carried out under the second item will be reserved and dealt with after those inquiries have been made.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The main question that arises is upon the true construction of s. 4 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, and I need not recapitulate the facts which the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has already dealt with, and which, moreover, are set out in the judgment of BENNETT, J. Section 4 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, empowers the Public Trustee, with his consent, to hold what was a new position, namely, that of custodian trustee of any trust, and for the present purposes it is material to show that he could be so appointed in any ordinary trust by the person having power to appoint new trustees. Under sub-s. (2) there are a number of provisions to which I shall refer later. In sub-s. (3), the legislature provides that

> "the provisions of this section shall apply in like manner as to the Public Trustee to any banking or insurance company or any other body corporate entitled by rules made under this Act to act as custodian trustee, with power for such company or body corporate to charge and retain or pay out of the trust property fees not exceeding the fees chargeable by the Public Trustee."

It should perhaps be mentioned that under r. 30 of the Public Trustee (Custodian Trustee) Rules, 1926, the defendant bank, in this case having a capital in excess of the requirements mentioned in r. 30 (1) (b), is a banking company entitled to act as custodian A trustee. Putting that together with s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1906, we find that the person having the power to appoint new trustees, who was, in this case, T. P. Ziegler, who purported to make the appointment by the deed of May 31, 1932, was empowered to appoint the defendant bank as a custodian trustee. The question emerges whether that power justified an appointment of the bank, not merely as a custodian trustee, but to hold what were described in the deed as two offices, namely, that of sole managing B trustee of the will in place of the appointer and also as custodian trustee of the will. As the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has pointed out, that is precisely the same as an appointment of the bank to be what the Act of 1906 in the heading to s. 5 describes as "an ordinary trustee," and the question may be defined as whether a person having the power under s. 4 to appoint a custodian trustee, is entitled in the case of a bank or insurance company which is entitled by the rules to act as trustee, to make a sort of dual appointment C under which that person is appointed a custodian trustee of the charge, and, on the other hand, appointed as a managing trustee, with the result that the totality of his position is absolutely indistinguishable from that of an ordinary trustee. Section 5 empowers the Public Trustee to be appointed an ordinary trustee, but we do not find any suggestion there that there is a power to appoint him to be a managing trustee in addition to his position as custodian trustee, and the truth and common sense of the matter D seems to me to be that a person who is performing both the duties of custodian trustee, as mentioned in s. 4, and all the other duties of an ordinary trustee, is no more nor less than an ordinary trustee.

When I look at the specific provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 4, I think I find sub-divisions which indicate the view of the legislature that in every case where the Public Trustee is appointed to be the custodian trustee, there will be other persons who are described E as the managing trustees. The first provision I think necessary to refer to is clause (b) of sub-s. (2), which provides that > "the management of the trust property and the exercise of any power or discretion exercisable by the trustees under the trust shall remain vested in the trustees other than the custodian trustee," and then it says "which trustees are hereinafter referred to as the managing trustees." So far as this section is concerned, it would seem clear that the intention of the legislature was that the Public Trustee should be appointed as custodian trustee for the purposes of looking after the trust property as mentioned in (a), but that the management of the trust property and the exercise of powers and discretion must remain vested in somebody else, namely, any trustee other than the custodian trustee, and I can see some very G good reasons for that. The next clause of s. 4 (2), which I think I must refer to is (g) which, though I think it is not very strong on this point, at any rate, tends in the same direction. It is in these terms:

> "In determining the number of trustees for the purpose of the Trustee Act, 1893, the custodian trustee shall not be reckoned as a trustee."

H

One could—I think it would not involve a very great straining of language—hold that that meant that a custodian trustee shall not be reckoned a trustee for that particular purpose; still it has some weight in showing that the draftsman of the section was considering the custodian trustee as outside the category of an ordinary trustee. Clause (h), I think, is of considerable importance. It provides:

> "The custodian trustee, if he acts in good faith, shall not be liable for accepting as I correct and acting upon the faith of any written statement by the managing trustee as to any birth, death or marriage, or other matter of fact," and then goes on:

> "nor for acting upon any legal advice obtained by the managing trustees independently of the custodian trustee."

Here, again, I do not think the paragraph is conclusive, but it is obvious that if the custodian trustee is also appointed the managing trustee—the two offices being regarded as not coalescing for all purposes—the result will be that it is impossible to obtain legal advice independently of the custodian trustee, because the two corporations or the two bodies will be one, and, therefore, the subsection cannot, strictly speaking, apply.

Section 5 of the Act, to my mind, according to its general phraseology, implies that, if the Public Trustee is appointed to be an ordinary trustee, he is not in any true sense a custodian trustee. He is a trustee and nothing else, and I would observe that one of the points on which I think the learned judge in the court below based the conclusion to which he came, was that the Public Trustee, while holding the appointment of custodian trustee, can also be a managing trustee with other persons acting with him. Assuming that that be the right view, it is a conclusion which depends on s. 2 (2) of the Act, which does not apply to a bank or insurance company or other body corporate which, by virtue of the provisions of s. 4 (3), might be appointed to be a custodian trustee. Accordingly, that argument seems to me to possess no weight in assisting one in coming to the conclusion that the Public Trustee might, in certain cases, be both a custodian trustee and a managing trustee with other persons.

Looking at s. 4 alone and contrasting it with s. 5, under which the Public Trustee may be appointed an ordinary trustee, I come to the conclusion that there is no ground in the Act for holding that the persons named in s. 4 (3) or any trust corporation defined in another section can properly be appointed to hold two separate offices which, in truth, are only one. I think that, if it was desired to appoint the defendant bank to be a trustee, there was no difficulty in making the appointment, and had it been desired to appoint the defendant bank to be a custodian trustee there was no difficulty in doing it, with the result that a custodian trustee would be entitled to charge, but I do not think there is any authority under the Public Trustee Act, 1906, for making a purely artificial and unreal distinction between the two positions of custodian trustee and managing trustee for the purposes of enabling the defendant bank to charge as custodian trustee, and so far as I can see for no other reason whatsoever.

The question whether the defendant bank has been duly appointed to hold one or other of the offices which, as I have mentioned, the bank could have been appointed to hold, that is, either the position of an ordinary trustee or that of custodian trustee, is a question which has not been argued exhaustively at all in this court, and is one with which I think we are not in a position to deal at the present time, and, therefore, that matter must, I think, remain over to be dealt with perhaps on some future occasion, but what the deed does purport to do is something which in my judgment, and I agree in that respect with the Master of the Rolls, the appointor, T. P. Ziegler, was not entitled to do, namely, whilst not appointing the defendant bank to be an ordinary trustee, in terms to attempt to appoint him to two positions which I have mentioned, simply for the purpose of enabling the bank to charge.

For these reasons the appeal must be allowed, with the consequences mentioned by the Master of the Rolls.

CLAUSON, J.—I am of the same opinion, but because we differ from the learned judge in the court below I desire to add a few words. In my judgment and on the construction of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, a custodian trustee discharges a special function, which, by its very nature, is differentiated from the functions of the remaining trustees (in the Act called "managing trustees") of a trust in which a custodian trustee has been appointed. The very existence of a custodian trustee, in my judgment, implies that there are certain functions which he is not to discharge, but which are to be discharged, if discharged at all, by some other person or persons.

I now turn to the document under which it is said the bank occupies the position which justifies them in claiming the remuneration of a custodian trustee. It was suggested, as I understood, that the effect of the deed might be or was to appoint the bank as custodian trustee and nothing more, but that construction of the deed seems to me to be impossible, for, in my view, the whole deed proceeds plainly on the footing that the appointor ceased to be a trustee, and he would not cease to be a trustee if all that happened under the deed was that the bank became a custodian trustee. There are two other possible views of the operation of this deed: one is that it is wholly invalid in view of the fact that it attempts to appoint one person to two separate and incompatible offices. The alternative view is that on its true construction it operated to appoint the bank as what in the heading to s. 5 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, is spoken of as an "ordinary trustee." In my view, it is not necessary to decide which of those two views of the operation of the deed is correct, as in either view the bank could not properly claim the remuneration which they claim. A

I desire only to add this upon a point which is not strictly material to the matter before us. It must not be taken that I agree with the view that the Public Trustee cannot, according to the true construction of the Act, be appointed either as sole managing trustee, he holding the office of custodian trustee, or even as one of several managing trustees, he holding the office of custodian trustee. The point is one which does not strictly arise, and, accordingly, I say no more about it. B

Subject to these observations, I agree with the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. C

Appeal allowed.

BELTON v. CROWLE DISTRICT DRAINAGE BOARD E

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Humphreys, JJ.), April 30, May 1, 2, 1935]

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 221; 104 L.J.K.B. 624; 153 L.T. 466; 33 L.G.R. 413]

Land Drainage—Protection conferred by local Act—Exemption from drainage rates—"Local authority"—Commissioner or surveyor—Land Drainage Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 44), s. 66. F

By the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 66: "Where by any local Act powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority similar to the powers conferred by this Act, and that local Act contains provisions for the protection of any . . . persons, those provisions shall apply to the exercise by any drainage board within the area to which the local Act applies of the powers conferred on drainage boards by this Act in like manner as they apply in relation to the exercise of the powers under the local Act." G

This section has no reference to provisions dealing with rating, and, therefore, where, under the provisions of a local Act of 1816, the proprietors of certain lands were exempted from a rate levied to meet the expenses of land drainage. H

Held: the occupier and owners were liable for drainage rates made by the drainage board for the area under s. 24 of the Act of 1930, notwithstanding the protective provision in the local Act.

Per LORD HEWART, C.J. (AVORY and HUMPHREYS, JJ. dubitantibus): A "commissioner" or "surveyor" appointed under the local Act is not a "local authority" within the meaning of the above section. I

Notes. As to land drainage see 30 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 72 et seq., and for cases see DIGEST SUPPS., title "Sewers". For Land Drainage Act, 1930, see 13 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 551.

Case Stated by Lincolnshire Quarter Sessions.

Pursuant to the provisions of s. 30 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, the appellants, Belton and others appealed against two rates made by the Crowle District Drainage Board on Aug. 9, 1933, namely, (a) an owner's drainage rate wherein Lilly Belton and

A Thomas Fowler Belton were (inter alios) included as being the owners of certain hereditaments situate within the district of the board, and (b) an occupier's drainage rate, wherein Thomas Fowler Belton was (inter alios) included as being the occupier of certain of the above hereditaments. Quarter sessions allowed the appeals and quashed the rates, subject to the following Special Case:

By the Doncaster District (Crowle District) Drainage Order, 1932, dated Dec. 3, 1932, B and made by the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, a certain area described in the said order and shown by colour on a map sealed by the Minister was constituted as a new drainage district for the purposes of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, under the name of the "Crowle District Drainage District." The Crowle District Drainage District so constituted included (inter alia) certain lands in the parish of Amcotts. The Crowle District Drainage Board were the drainage board for the said district. Lilly Belton C and Thomas Fowler Belton were the owners and Thomas Fowler Belton was the occupier of certain hereditaments within that part of the parish of Amcotts which was within the said district. On Aug. 9, 1933, and pursuant to the provisions of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, the board made two rates: (a) an owner's rate and (b) an occupier's rate. The expenses of the board for raising which the said rates were made were as to part thereof in respect of drainage works within the lands described as "the said low lands" D in s. 25 of a private Act of 1816 (56 Geo. 3, c. lviii): see infra. Lilly Belton and Thomas Fowler Belton and Thomas Fowler Belton were (inter alios) included in the said rates as being respectively the owners and the occupier of the above hereditaments.

By a private Act of June 22, 1813 (53 Geo. 3, c. clxxvii), intituled "An Act for enclosing lands in the townships of Crowle, Eastoft, and Ealand, in the parish of Crowle, in the county of Lincoln, and extending into the West Riding of the county of York," E s. 1, certain persons named therein were appointed commissioners

> "for dividing, allotting, inclosing, draining, warping, and embanking all the open arable fields, meadows, pastures, ings, carrs, moors, commons and waste lands within the . . . several townships of Crowle, Eastoft and Ealand . . . in the said parish of Crowle; and also all such commons and moors within the said West F Riding of the said county of York . . . as are appurtenant to or belonging to estates within the said parish of Crowle, or the owners thereof" and for carrying the said Act and the Inclosure (Consolidation) Act, 1801 (41 Geo. 3, c. 109) into execution.

Section 18 empowered the commissioners to scour out and widen all the ancient brooks, drains, watercourses, ditches, tunnels, sluices, and bridges, and to make, cut, erect, G set out, and appoint new drains, watercourses, ditches, tunnels, sluices, gates, banks, and bridges, and required them to order and determine by an award

> "by whom, at whose expense, in what proportions, at what time and in what manner, the said brooks, &c., shall be made, and afterwards cleansed, scoured, repaired and maintained."

Section 54 provided that

H

> "all charges and expenses which shall arise subsequent to the execution of the said commissioners' award, respecting the future reparation and support of the said sewers, banks, sluices, and other works to be made and ordered by the said commissioners in pursuance of the powers hereby vested in them, shall be borne and defrayed from thenceforth for ever thereafter . . . in such shares and proportions as I shall be thought just and equitable by the said commissioners, and as shall be set forth in their said award."

The Act of June 20, 1816 (56 Geo. 3, c. lviii), was intituled:

> "An Act for amending an Act of His present Majesty, intituled an Act for enclosing lands in the townships of Crowle, Eastoft, and Ealand, in the parish of Crowle, in the county of Lincoln, and extending into the West Riding of the county of York; [meaning thereby the Act of 1813] and for draining or warping the said lands, and lands in the parishes of Luddington, Belton, and Adlingfleet, and for making drains in the parish of Althorpe; all in the said counties of Lincoln and York."

The said Act contained the following recitals: (a) That the lands included in the Act of 1813 and other lands, as well open as inclosed, in the parishes of Crowle and Luddington in the county of Lincoln and also certain lands in the township of Belton in the parish of Belton particularly described in the recital, and certain lands in the parish of Adlingfleet in the county of York also particularly described in the recital, were frequently overflowed with water, and upwards of two thousand acres thereof were totally unfit for tillage; but that the said last-mentioned lands might be rendered highly productive and all the said lands be greatly improved if properly drained, embanked, and warped; (b) that it might be necessary for the purposes of such drainage, embankment, warping, and improvement that certain works particularly described should be carried out; and (c) that it was requisite that some of the provisions of the Act of 1813 should be amended and that the powers of the commissioners appointed by virtue thereof should be enlarged.

Section 1 provided:

> "Be it enacted . . . that Joseph Thackray of Gainsborough in the said county of Lincoln, gentleman, shall be and he is hereby appointed commissioner for executing the necessary works for effecting the drainage and warping of the said lands, and for otherwise carrying into execution the several powers of this Act relating thereto."

Section 7 authorised and required the said commissioner to execute certain works, including (inter alia) the building of a new sluice in the bank of the River Trent in the township of Amcotts in the parish of Althorpe and the making of a new cut or drain from the said new sluice through the said township of Amcotts.

By s. 21:

> "And be it further enacted, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners of inclosure appointed by or by virtue of the said recited Act [the Act of 1813], or any two of them, and they are hereby required, within three calendar months, or as soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this Act, to ascertain and determine what part or parts of the lands included in the said recited Act, and of the lands in the said parish of Luddington, are capable of being drained, warped, and improved, and shall then ascertain and determine the respective proportions of the whole general expenses of draining and warping respectively, which such several lands and grounds, and also the lands and grounds in the parish of Belton hereinbefore particularly mentioned to be drained, warped, and improved, and also the lands and grounds in the parish of Adlingfleet hereinbefore particularly mentioned to be drained and improved by virtue of this Act, or the person or persons who is, are, or shall be the proprietor or owner, or proprietors or owners, of such several and respective lands and grounds ought to be charged with or to bear, and shall declare the same at a meeting or meetings to be called for that purpose, by notice to be given in manner directed by the said recited Act respecting the first meeting of the commissioners, as therein mentioned; and when the said commissioners of inclosure shall have ascertained and determined such several and respective proportions, a memorandum or specification of the particulars thereof shall be written or engrossed on parchment, in two parts, and signed and sealed by such commissioners of inclosure, one part whereof shall be enrolled and lodged with the award of the said commissioners of inclosure, as mentioned in the said recited Act, and the other part shall be by them delivered to the commissioner for executing this Act; and the several and respective proportions particularised in such specification shall be at all times observed by the said commissioner for executing this Act, and by all and every the surveyor or surveyors to be appointed under or by virtue of the powers and provisions of this Act, as the scale or rule of proportion by which the assessments to be made or laid by virtue of this Act shall be assessed, paid, and levied; and all the costs, charges, and expenses of obtaining and passing this Act, and attending the making and completing the said several sluices, drains, cuts, and other works, and of otherwise carrying this Act into execution, shall be borne and paid by the person or persons who is, are, or shall be the proprietor or owner, or owners or proprietors of the lands and grounds so to be declared capable of being drained or warped and improved."

Section 24, so far as is material, was as follows:

> "And be it further enacted, that it shall be lawful for the commissioner for executing this Act, and he is hereby authorised and empowered, from time to time until the said intended works for drainage and warping shall be completed, to assess, tax, and charge such of the lands in the said several parishes as shall be so declared by the said commissioners of inclosure to be capable of being improved as aforesaid, or the owners or proprietors of such lands, and according to the scale or proportion aforesaid, with such sum and sums of money as he the said commissioner for executing this Act shall from time to time find necessary and requisite for defraying the costs, charges, and expenses of obtaining this Act, and of carrying the same into execution (not exceeding in the first year after the passing of this Act the sum of five pounds per acre, and not exceeding in the second year after the passing of this Act the sum of three pounds per acre, and not exceeding in the whole the sum of ten pounds per acre) . . . and the balance, if any, upon the final settlement of accounts shall be immediately repaid to the land owners in proportion to the sums respectively paid by them."

By s. 25:

> "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that none of the homesteads, old inclosed and field lands not benefited by the drainage, nor any of the lands lying on the south side of the Stainforth and Keadby Canal, nor shall any lands and grounds in the said township of Amcotts, or the proprietors or proprietor thereof, be liable or subject to taxation for the expenses of draining the said low lands, under the authority of this Act, nor for any of the expenses of obtaining and executing the same."

By s. 26:

> "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that the surveys and plans made in pursuance of the said recited Act, shall be used by the said commissioner for the purposes of this Act, without fee, reward, or any recompense whatsoever."

By s. 31:

> "And be it further enacted, that the moneys arising from the taxes to be raised by virtue of this Act shall be paid and applied by the said commissioner in the first place in defraying the charges and expenses of obtaining and passing this Act, and of making the necessary surveys, plans, valuations, and reports incident or preparatory thereto, and in making, executing, and completing the several works of drainage by this Act directed and authorised to be made, done, and executed, and all necessary charges and expenses to be incurred in or relating to the due execution of this Act."

Section 34, so far as is material, was as follows:

> "And be it further enacted, that as soon as the said sluices and cuts or drains, and other works hereinbefore authorised to be made or done, shall be made or executed and completed, the commissioner for executing this Act shall and he is hereby empowered and required to form or draw up and make an award, which shall be fairly written or engrossed on parchment, and signed and sealed by the said commissioner, who shall therein specify and declare, according to the scale or rule of proportion hereinbefore mentioned, what lands will be benefited by or under the provisions of this Act, and at whose costs and in what proportion and in what manner the several works by this Act directed or authorised to be made shall from thenceforth be kept in repair, and at what time or times and how, and in what manner the said drainage and warpings shall be done, together with such other regulations and particulars as he shall think requisite for carrying the purposes of this Act into complete execution. . . ."

Section 35, so far as is material, was as follows:

> "And be it further enacted, that as soon as the said banks, drains, sluices, tunnels, and other works hereby directed or authorised to be made, shall be made and perfected, and the said commissioner shall have ascertained the proportion of the expenses to be paid by each proprietor as aforesaid, and shall have executed his award, the said banks and other works, and the said warping, shall from time to time be under the care and inspection of, and as often as necessary, shall be repaired and amended and kept in good repair and condition, and the warping carried on, by a person to be appointed surveyor thereof by a majority in value (to be ascertained by the land tax assessment) of the several proprietors for the time being of the lands and grounds which shall be deemed capable of receiving improvement by warping as hereinbefore mentioned, or hereby directed to be embanked, drained, and warped, or their stewards, who shall be present at a meeting to be held in the said parish of Crowle on the first Monday in March in every year, or oftener if required, as hereinafter is mentioned. . . ."

By s. 37:

> "And be it further enacted, that for the better enabling the said surveyor for the time being to raise money for the purpose of carrying into execution the powers hereby reposed in him, it shall and may be lawful to and for the surveyor for the time being, when and so often as occasion shall require, to make an acre rate or assessment, according to the scale or proportion laid down in the commissioner's award, upon all and every the proprietors of the said lands to be embanked, drained, and warped by virtue of this Act; all which rates or assessments, having been allowed and signed by a majority in value (to be ascertained as aforesaid) of the persons interested in such lands respectively, or their stewards for that purpose specially appointed, who may be present at a meeting to be called in the same manner as hereinbefore is mentioned with respect to the choice of a new surveyor, for the purpose of getting such rates or assessments considered and allowed, shall be collected and received by the said surveyor for the time being; and in case any of the proprietors for the time being shall refuse or neglect to pay such rates or assessments immediately after the same shall be so made, signed, and allowed (being first lawfully demanded of such proprietors respectively), then it shall and may be lawful to and for any justice of the peace acting in and for the parts of Lindsey in the said county of Lincoln, to make inquiry of such default, by summoning to appear before such justice such proprietor of whom such rates or assessments shall have been demanded (and for this purpose notice in writing left at the usual residence of the person intended to be summoned, or of his lessee or tenant, shall be a good summons); and if such defaulter thereof shall be convicted, either by his own confession, or upon the oath of the surveyor for the time being, or any other competent and credible witness (which oath the said justice is hereby empowered to administer), or shall not appear pursuant to such summons, the said justice shall and he is hereby required to levy the said rates or assessments by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such proprietors, wheresoever the same shall be found, together with the reasonable costs and charges attending such summons, distress, and sale, to be settled and allowed by the said justice, rendering the overplus (if any) on demand to the owner of such goods and chattels."

By s. 38:

> "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that in case any part of the said lands to be embanked, drained, and warped as aforesaid, shall at any time hereafter be untenanted or unoccupied, and no sufficient distress can be made for levying the said rates and taxes, then the lands chargeable therewith shall always remain a security for payment thereof, and all goods and chattels which shall at any time thereafter be found thereon shall and may be distrained, impounded, kept, and sold in manner aforesaid, until all arrears of the said rates and taxes, and the charges incident to such distress, shall be fully paid and satisfied."

A By the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 66:

> "Where by any local Act powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority similar to the powers conferred by this Act, and that local Act contains provisions for the protection of any authorities, companies, or persons, those provisions shall apply to the exercise by any drainage board within the area to which the local Act applies of the powers conferred on drainage boards by this Act in like manner as B they apply in relation to the exercise of the powers under the local Act."

It was contended on behalf of the owners and occupier (a) that s. 25 of the Act of 1816 was, within the meaning of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 66, a provision for the protection of (inter alios) proprietors of land in the township of Amcotts; (b) that the effect of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 66, was to require the board in making a C rate under s. 24 of the said Act to observe the provisions of s. 25 of the Act of 1816; and (c) that, inasmuch as the expenses for raising which the rates, the subject of the appeals, were made were as to part thereof in respect of drainage works within "the low lands" within the meaning of the Act of 1816, s. 25, the said rates, so far as they purported to include the owners and occupier, were bad in law and ought to be quashed. The board contended to the contrary of each of the above propositions.

D Quarter sessions upheld the contentions of the owners and occupier, and allowed the appeals, with costs, and ordered that the said rates be quashed, subject to this case, and the board appealed to the Divisional Court.

W. E. Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Hubert Hull for the appellants.

R. M. Montgomery, K.C., P. E. Sandlands, K.C., and Geoffrey Howard for the respondents.

E LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a Case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the county of Lincoln. It arises out of appeals by owners and an occupier of lands, under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 30, against certain rates made by the Crowle District Drainage Board, on Aug. 9, 1933. Those rates were, first, an owner's drainage rate, wherein some of the present respondents were included as owners of certain hereditaments within the district of the appellant board, and, secondly, an occupier's drainage F rate, wherein one of the present respondents was included as being the occupier of certain of the hereditaments. The appeals were heard in October, 1933, and the material facts were not in dispute. A question of law was argued, and the court of quarter sessions, after hearing the arguments, allowed the appeals with costs, and quashed the rates so far as the present respondents were concerned, subject to the opinion of this court upon the case stated. The question is whether the court of quarter G sessions was right in law in holding that the appellants before that court, the present respondents, were entitled to succeed.

The history of the matter may be quite shortly stated. Under the Doncaster Area District Drainage Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. xvii), and an order made thereunder, the Crowle District Drainage Board was legally constituted, and is to-day, and was at all material times, what is called an internal drainage board within the meaning of s. 81 H of the Land Drainage Act, 1930. Before the passing of that Act it seems to be true to say that in general the method or principle upon which land drainage proceeded was a method of equality of burden and benefit—acreage as distinguished from annual value. But one of the main objects of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, as has been made clear over and over again, was to obtain uniformity, subject to certain exceptions, by basing the drainage rate upon the annual value of the hereditaments without a very careful I regard to the precise degree of benefit derived in any particular case from the drainage works which were carried out.

With regard to the particular part of the country with which we are here concerned, namely, a part of what was the parish of Althorpe and the part of that parish called Amcotts, in 1816, an Act of Parliament was enacted which is called the Crowle, Ealand, Eastoft, Belton and Luddington Drainage Commission Act. The long title of that Act is in the following terms:

> "An Act for amending an Act of His present Majesty [that is to say, George III]—intituled an Act for enclosing lands in the townships of Crowle, Eastoft, and Ealand, > in the parish of Crowle, in the county of Lincoln, and extending into the West Riding of the county of York; and for draining or warping the said lands, and lands in the parishes of Luddington, Belton, and Adlingfleet, and for making drains in the parish of Althorpe; all in the said counties of Lincoln and York."

It is apparent, therefore, at the outset, that the title of this local Act suggests a distinction between the parishes of Luddington, Belton, and Adlingfleet on the one hand, and on the other hand, the parish of Althorpe. In the case of the first-named parishes the Act was to apply for the purposes of draining or warping the said lands, while with regard to the parish of Althorpe it was an Act for making the drains in that parish, and, as the provisions of the Act and the undisputed facts of this case show, so far as Amcotts was concerned it was a piece of land through which a pipe-line was driven for the purpose not of draining the superficies of the land itself, but for the purpose of carrying the matter that had to be drained from one piece of land to another, both those pieces of land being other than Amcotts.

The main weapon of the appellants in the court below was s. 25 of that local Act of 1816 read, as they contended it should be read, side by side with s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930. The local Act, up to and including s. 24, had described certain works which should be done in different places, drawing from time to time, as in particular ss. 6, 7, 12 and 21 make plain, a distinction between the first three-named parishes of Luddington, Belton, and Adlingfleet, on the one side, and the last of the four, the parish of Althorpe, on the other side. Then s. 24 empowers the commissioner (who was afterwards succeeded by a person called a surveyor) to assess tax and charge certain lands, according to the proportions set out, with the sums of money found necessary and requisite for defraying the costs of obtaining the Act, carrying it into execution, and further sums to be charged and assessed at certain times and places. But on the threshold of that important section one finds the words > "from time to time until the said intended works for drainage and warping shall be completed," and it is common ground that that time has long since passed.

The next section (s. 25) is a proviso limited in its scope to s. 24, and it is as follows:

> "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that none of the homesteads, old inclosed and field lands not benefited by the drainage, nor any of the lands lying on the south side of the Stainforth and Keadby Canal, nor shall any lands and grounds in the said township of Amcotts, or the proprietors or proprietor thereof, be liable or subject to taxation for the expenses of draining the said low lands, under the authority of this Act, nor for any of the expenses of obtaining and executing the same."

The main argument in the court below on the part of the present respondents was that they came within the class of persons exempted by s. 25 of the Act of 1816. It was said that the rate against which the appeal was made was in part, at any rate, and for the most part, a rate levied in order to meet the expenses of draining the said low lands under the authority of the Act of 1816. Placing that section side by side with s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, the respondents contended, and contended with success, before the court of quarter sessions, that the exemption referred to in the Act of 1816 was not only continued but also extended by the provisions of the later legislation. Section 66 is as follows:

> "Where by any local Act powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority similar to the powers conferred by this Act, and that local Act contains provisions for the protection of any authorities, companies, or persons, those provisions shall apply to the exercise by any drainage board within the area to which the local Act applies of the powers conferred on drainage boards by this Act in like manner as they apply in relation to the exercise of the powers under the local Act."

It was urged on behalf of the respondents that the moneys to be obtained by means of the rate appealed against fell within the Act of 1816, s. 25, and therefore that, by reason of the provisions of s. 66 of the Act of 1930, the exemption which they said they

A enjoyed continued; or, to put it quite simply, that they did not come within the mischief of rateability by reference to annual value, but were still entitled to say: As we have no benefit, so we must have no burden. That contention was successful before the court of quarter sessions.

The main question here is whether the effect of s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, was that which was contended for by the respondents. Section 66 begins:

> "Where by any local Act powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority similar to the powers conferred by this Act, and that local Act contains provisions for the protection of any authorities, companies, or persons."

What is a drainage board within the meaning of that section? What is a local authority? What are powers similar to the powers conferred by the Act of 1930? And what is C meant by "protection of any authorities, companies, or persons"?

I will deal briefly with those questions in the inverse order. It has been contended before us that this word "protection" means—not only in the abstract, which is one thing, but in this context in this statute, which is another thing—exemption from rating. It is said that if "protection" in this sentence does not mean exemption from rating, then the category is void, and there is nothing to which it can apply. This D second criticism seems to be manifestly wrong when one looks at ss. 50 and 51 of the local Act of 1816, which refer respectively to protecting participants against the effects of the works of drainage and protecting a particular canal with its side drains from being affected or injured by the physical work which was to be and was carried out. But is it true to say that, in this Act and in this section of this Act, "protection" does include exemption from rating? If it did, it would be an odd word to employ for the purpose. E It is not denied that there may be contexts in which the term "protection" is wide enough and precise enough to include exemption from rating. But it is said it would be contrary to the whole scheme and to the particular provisions of this Act if in s. 66 "protection" were to have that significance and in particular, when one looks at the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 24, one finds certain limited and precisely defined powers which, if the wide meaning given to the term "protection" were right, would be mere F surplusage, and misleading surplusage. Section 24 is dealing with rating powers of the drainage boards other than catchment boards, and by sub-s. (2) it is provided that a rate made by a drainage board may be either an owner's drainage rate or an occupier's drainage rate, and then follows this proviso:

> "Provided that as regards any rates raised in order to defray expenses incurred, or charges in respect of liabilities incurred, before the commencement of this Act, the G provisions as to the incidence of rates contained in s. 38 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, or, in the case of rates raised under any local Act, the corresponding provisions in that Act, shall have effect in substitution for the provisions of this sub-section."

The limiting words are manifest: "before the commencement of this Act." What need, it is asked, would there be for making a particular provision of that kind with reference to the period before the commencement of this Act, if it were true to say that H the whole of such expenses and liabilities were saved under the provisions of the local Act? It is as if one were to say that to make quite sure that the whole includes the part, there shall be not only an enactment with regard to the whole, but a particular enactment with regard to the part. In like manner, when one looks at s. 24 (4), it is provided that:

> I "Every rate made by a drainage board shall be an annual value rate, that is to say, a rate assessed on a basis of annual value as regards all hereditaments, and, subject to the provisions of this section, every drainage rate shall be assessed at a uniform amount per pound throughout the area—(a) in the case of agricultural land, on the annual value of the land; and (b) in the case of any other land, on one-third of the annual value thereof."

Then follows another significant proviso:

> "Provided that, where at the commencement of this Act a drainage board was levying drainage rates on the basis of acreage, or partly on the basis of acreage and > partly on the basis of annual value, any rate made by that board at any time within the period of six months next following the commencement of this Act may be made on any basis on which it might have been made if this section had not be passed."

Again one finds, not indeed the same, but similar limiting words: "At any time within the period of six months next following the commencement of this Act," and if the universal proposition were true that there is a saving always in all such cases, the limitation "within the period of six months" would be not only useless but misleading. Finally, it is provided by s. 24 (7), as follows:

> "A drainage board, after consultation in the case of an internal drainage board with the catchment board, may by order determine that no rates shall be levied by them on the occupiers of hereditaments in any portion of the district which, in their opinion, either by reason of its height above sea-level or for any other reason, ought to be exempted wholly from rating."

There again it is argued by counsel for the appellants that there is a particular and limited provision that in a case which seems proper the drainage board may by a special and individual order determine that no rate shall be levied except in a certain way, if at all, and it is said that such a provision would be otiose if it were indeed true that by s. 66 of the Act of 1930 protection is continued and, indeed, extended, to all persons falling within the ambit of a local Act like the Act of 1816. In my opinion, the arguments of counsel upon these matters are quite conclusive, and I am satisfied that, whatever may be the true scope of s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, it has nothing at all to say from first to last to the question of rating.

But even if it were otherwise, and if, in truth and in fact, s. 66 of the Act of 1930 did comprehend the topic of rating, nevertheless, I think the argument for the appellants would be entitled to succeed.

> "Where by any local Act," says s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, "powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority."

Here the powers conferred by the Act of 1816 were conferred, in the first place, upon a commissioner for the purpose of carrying out the works, and later, upon a surveyor for the purpose of maintaining the works. But could it be said, even for controversial purposes, that either of these individuals was a drainage board? In 1930, when this statute was enacted, the term "drainage board" was quite familiar. I cannot entertain the argument that for this purpose either a surveyor or a commissioner could be called a drainage board. But was he a local authority? By a stretch of reasoning it might, perhaps, be said that he was a local authority exercising some sort of jurisdiction in the locality. There again, for my own part, I am disposed to think that that term "local authority," by the year 1930, and especially in juxtaposition with such a term as "drainage board," was not intended to refer to a commissioner or surveyor. Even if the arguments made on behalf of the appellants had not so far succeeded, the Act goes on to say that what is provided shall take place where powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority similar to the powers conferred by the Land Drainage Act, 1930. Here it seems to me the attempt to apply s. 66 to the present case must fail. There is, in my opinion, not merely some difference, but all the difference, between an enactment which gives the most general power with regard to drainage, as is done in the Land Drainage Act, 1930, and the very limited power, so far as Amcotts is concerned, given by the Act of 1816, namely, that a pipe-line should be driven through it, not in order to drain Amcotts, but in order to carry the material that had to be drained from some land above it to some other land below it. I cannot regard those as similar powers, unless, indeed, it is to be said that every power which has to do with rating is similar to every other power which has to do with rating; and if that were the intention, these words "similar to," contained in s. 66, would seem to me to be mere surplusage again.

There remains the point, on which counsel for the appellants placed no great stress, namely, that this area is not an area to which the local Act applies. The word "applies" is difficult. That the local Act had some application to the area is manifest, and the area is from time to time mentioned eo nomine in the statute. But for what purpose

A is it mentioned? Not as part of the area to be drained, but, finally, the fourth limb of the series, as a parish, part of Althorpe, where a drain is to be made—not to drain Amcotts, but to drain other land. I do not think it is true to say that within the meaning of s. 66 this particular area is an area to which the local Act is applicable in the sense required by s. 66 of the Act of 1930. That point, however, is not necessary to the decision of this case. I am satisfied that upon other grounds, and especially B upon the ground that s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, is not concerned with rating, the appellants before us ought to succeed, and the decision of the court of quarter sessions ought to be reversed. This is by no means a simple matter, and it is apparent from the judgment of the learned chairman in the court below that great care was expended upon a difficult case.

C AVORY, J.—I agree that this appeal from the decision of the court of quarter sessions should be allowed. Counsel for the respondents, in support of that decision, has relied upon two grounds—first, upon the general principle that a general Act is not to be taken impliedly to repeal any provision of exemption contained in a special or local Act, unless the context clearly shows that to have been the intention of the legislature; and secondly, the provisions of s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930.

D With regard to the first point, I think the contention fails, for these reasons. In order to determine whether a general Act does impliedly repeal the provisions of a special Act, it is necessary, first of all, to see the nature of the exemption conferred by the special or local Act, and it is then further necessary to consider whether the terms of the general Act are such as to show that there was an intention on the part of the legislature to override or supersede the particular provisions of the special Act. Here E the exemption which is relied upon is, as has been pointed out by my Lord, contained in s. 25 of the local Act of 1816, and it is to be observed that it is not in terms an exemption from all taxation of any kind for the expenses of draining low lands, but it is limited to an exemption from taxation for "the expenses of draining the said low lands, under the authority of this Act" and, the exemption being limited in that way, the question arises whether it can be intended to be an exemption from the expenses of F draining the low lands under the authority of some other Act. In my opinion, those words ought to be strictly construed and applied to that particular exemption, namely, that it is only the expenses of draining the low lands under the authority of the Act of 1816 with regard to which there is any exemption.

Turning now to the general Act, it is important to observe, first of all, that it is entitled "An Act to amend and consolidate the enactments relating to the drainage of land"— G that is all land; and s. 1, (1) provides that:

> "For the purpose of the drainage of land" (again apparently meaning all land) "there shall be such drainage districts as are mentioned in this section and there shall be a drainage board for each such drainage district."

By sub-s. (3):

> H "Subject to the provisions of this Act, a drainage board shall exercise a general supervision over all matters relating to the drainage of land within its district and shall have such other powers and perform such other duties as are conferred or imposed on drainage boards by this Act."

Then we come to the provisions of s. 24, which I need not repeat; my Lord has referred to them, and they appear to me to be a complete code providing for the manner in which I the expenses of the drainage board are to be met, namely, by a rate made by the drainage board; and there are, as has been pointed out, distinct provisions in s. 24 giving a wide discretion to the drainage board either to divide their district into sub-districts and to make and levy differential rates for these sub-districts or to determine the amount per pound to be assessed upon the occupiers of hereditaments in any sub-district, and finally, as has been pointed out, by sub-s. (7) a power is conferred upon the drainage board actually to determine that no rates shall be paid or levied by them on the occupiers of particular hereditaments which, in their view, ought to be exempted wholly from rating. Therefore, I come to the conclusion, looking at the restricted terms of the exemption, and upon the general provisions in the Act of 1930, that it is impossible to say on that general principle of law that the general Act has not overridden or superseded s. 25 of the Act of 1816.

So much for the argument upon the general principle as to the construction of statutes. Turning now to s. 66 of the Act of 1930, I am not prepared to assent to the contention of counsel for the appellants that the word "powers" in s. 66 does not relate to a power to make a rate under s. 24—quite apart from the marginal note, which describes that section as relating to rating powers of drainage boards; nor am I prepared to say that the surveyor under the Act of 1816 is not, within the meaning of s. 66, a local authority. I express no concluded opinion upon that. In view of the fact that he does exercise authority locally, although the expression "local authority" had a recognised meaning in 1930, I am not prepared to decide the case on the ground that the surveyor was not a local authority. But I am clearly of opinion that the local Act does not, within the meaning of s. 66, contain provisions for the protection of persons in the sense of protecting them from the payment of rates. I think this provision refers to the kind of protection which is contemplated in ss. 50 and 51, and, it may be, elsewhere in the Act of 1816; in other words, that it refers to the protection of the interests of property owners or persons whose property may be in any way damaged by the execution of the works, and that, to use the phrase adopted by Mr. Tyldesley Jones, the section generally has no reference at all to the question of rating.

For these reasons, I agree that neither on the general principle as to the construction of statutes, nor by the express provisions of s. 66, were the respondents exempted from the payment of the rate in question; and for that reason, that the judgment of the court of quarter sessions was erroneous and ought to be reversed.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree that this appeal should be allowed. The first point of counsel for the respondents has been dealt with by Avory, J., in his judgment, and I agree with every word of that judgment. If counsel is wrong on his first point, he must bring himself within s. 66 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930. The opening words of s. 66 are:

> "Where by any local Act powers are conferred on a drainage board or local authority similar to the powers conferred by this Act."

I agree with the judgment of Avory, J., as to the meaning of the word "powers" in that section. I observe that the "powers" referred to must be conferred on a drainage board or local authority. It is clear that neither the commissioner nor the surveyor referred to in this local Act of 1816 ever was a drainage board, and although I share the doubt expressed by Avory, J., whether he might not possibly be described as a local authority, I cannot think that Parliament in 1930 intended to include in that term any such persons as either the commissioner or surveyor described in the Act of 1816.

Section 66 of the Act of 1930 then goes on to say that where a local Act

> "contains provisions for the protection of any authorities, companies, or persons those provisions shall apply,"

&c. [His Lordship then held that persons living in the parish referred to in the local Act and known as Althorpe, which was the parish concerned in the present case, were never liable, under the Act of 1816, to pay for or to contribute to payment for the construction of the works authorised by that Act, and therefore it could not be said that there was any exemption in the local Act or provision for their protection. He continued:] The other point raised by counsel for the appellants is a difficult one, and with some hesitation I agree with his argument. I think that s. 66 of the Act of 1930 has nothing to do with rating. It is concerned with maintaining, in favour of "any authorities, companies, or persons," provisions contained in any local Act for their protection. Many instances of such provisions can be found and, that being so, the word "protection" is the natural word to be used, which could not be the case if it were used in this statute with regard to exemption from rating. I agree with Mr. Montgomery that "protection" is a word which in an appropriate Act of Parliament might include exemption from rating, but in s. 66 one would have to strain the meaning of the word to a considerable extent to make it include exemption from rating. For these reasons and for those expressed in the judgments already delivered I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Shipping—Collision—Damages—Vessel sold for breaking up—Amount of repair damages agreed—No repairs carried out—Right of owners to recover agreed damages.

A vessel was damaged by collision and her owners sold her to be broken up. Later, they agreed with the wrongdoer the amount of the cost of repair.

Held: a fact which was peculiar to the owners, viz., that before the damage had been agreed they had sold the vessel to be broken up, was an accidental circumstance which ought not to be taken into account in the way of diminution of damages, and, therefore, the wrongdoer was liable to the owners in the agreed amount.

Appeal by defendants from an order of BATESON, J., confirming the report of the registrar in a collision action.

During the months of December, 1932, and January, 1933, the plaintiffs' vessel, the Benguela, and the defendants' vessel, the London Corporation, while laid up in the River Blackwater, came into collision, and both vessels sustained damage. In February, 1933, a surveyor, instructed on behalf of both parties, surveyed both vessels and estimated the cost of repairs at £250 for the Benguela and £230 for the London Corporation. Neither vessel was repaired. In May, 1933, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with Italian shipbreakers whereby the Benguela was sold for breaking up and was broken up with the repairs unexecuted. The parties to the action subsequently compromised on the basis of both vessels to blame and the claims were then referred to the registrar and merchants for assessment. There was no evidence to show that the price paid by the Italian shipbreakers was in any way affected by the existence of the unrepaired collision damage in the Benguela. The defendants denied all liability in respect of the damage sustained by the Benguela, but admitted that, if they were liable, the cost of repairs as estimated by the surveyor would be the appropriate amount. At the reference the registrar found that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the agreed cost of repairs, and that the case was covered by the decision in The Glenfinlas (1). The defendants appealed and the motion was heard by BATESON, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Stranger, K.C., and Cyril Miller for the defendants.
Willmer for the respondents was not called on to argue.

GREER, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of BATESON, J., affirming a decision of the registrar, with reference to one item of damage claimed by the owners of the steamship Benguela against the owners of the steamship London Corporation in relation to the agreed award that both parties were responsible in equal degrees for the damage which was occasioned to the Benguela. The Benguela was an old ship, built in 1910. The owners of both ships were suffering from the unprecedented "slump" in shipping business, and their vessels were laid up in the Blackwater River. When laid up they came into touch with one another from time to time, and damage was occasioned to the Benguela, which was dealt with by the registrar, and, on appeal from him, on objection to his findings, by the learned judge.

Before any action was started, or any agreement was made as to responsibility for the damage, there had been a survey by Lloyd's surveyor of the damage to each of these two vessels, and he estimated the damage done to the Benguela at the sum of £250—the cost of repairs to put her in the same position as she would have been in if she had not been damaged, with an additional sum of £25 for expenses. Thereupon, the question arose how this matter should be dealt with, and letters passed between the representatives of both vessels. In the course of that correspondence, Messrs. Lawrence Jones & Co., for the Benguela, wrote this letter:

> ". . . The question in dispute between us is, as to whether or not our clients are precluded from making a claim for estimated damage by reason of the fact that the Benguela has been sold for breaking up purposes. . . . We would suggest, in the first instance, that we should meet you with a view to agreeing the amounts of the items other than repairs so that the matter to be dealt with either by the registrar or the arbitrator may be simply the question of estimated repairs."

Then on May 9, Messrs. Middleton, Lewis, and Clarke, for the London Corporation, wrote as follows:

> "We have now received our clients' instructions to agree the figures in respect of both claims as recently discussed with you subject to the reservations made with regard to the items to be dealt with by the registrar. After you have issued a writ and the agreement has been filed, we will send you our client's formal claim, and when you send us your clients' claim, will you please also furnish a copy of the agreement of sale of the Benguela."

There followed another letter of May 10, from Lawrence Jones & Co., for the Benguela:

> "We thank you for your letter of May 9 from which we observe that all the figures of the respective claims are agreed, leaving only to the registrar to decide the question of principle as to whether the estimated repairs and estimated expenses during repairs are recoverable. We will accordingly proceed with the matter on the lines arranged, and will send to you shortly the writ for acceptance of service."

After that the writ was issued, and an agreement was come to, which has the effect of a judgment of the court, that both vessels were to blame, and that the damage should be paid in equal proportions.

That being the state of things, the matter came before the registrar, and the registrar and the learned judge both decided that if in fact any damages were recoverable in respect of the injuries to the hull of the Benguela, the amount of those damages had been agreed at the £250 plus the £25. I find myself unable to differ from that view. I think that is what the parties intended. Primâ facie, the damage occasioned to a vessel is the cost of repairs—the cost of putting the vessel in the same condition as she was in before the collision, and to restore her in the hands of the owners to the same value as she would have had if the damage had never been done; and primâ facie, the value of a damaged vessel is less by the cost of repairs than the value it would have if undamaged, though it is true that evidence may establish that the value of the vessel undamaged is exactly the same as her value after she had been damaged. The learned judge decided that, if that proposition were going to be established, it was for the owners of the London Corporation to establish it. The defendants argued, however, that that basis has no application to this case, because, at the time she was damaged, the Benguela was certain to have no saleable value for use as a ship; all that could happen to her was what we know did happen to her after she was damaged, and which would, just in the same way, have happened to her if she had never been damaged. If that be a fact to be taken into account, it seems to me that the learned judge was right in saying that it was for the defendants to establish it. He came to the same conclusion that the defendants had failed in that burden, because non constat that this vessel would have been sold for breaking up if she had not been a damaged vessel. She might have lived on in the hope that even shipowners sometimes successfully entertain, that an old vessel may have useful service for years to come in a time of boom, which everybody hopes will come some day. Further, it was not established that the owners would have parted with their vessel, if she had not been damaged, at the same price as they had got for the damaged vessel. It must not be lost sight of that the saleable value of a vessel does not depend merely upon what the purchaser says he would like to pay; it depends also on what the owner may feel that he can successfully hold out for, in the hope that another purchaser will come forward and give him a better price than that which has been offered.

I think that the learned judge was right in holding that some damages were necessarily established by the primâ facie evidence, and that if some damages were established, then there was no question for the registrar as to their amount, as that amount had been agreed, and that alone would be sufficient to dispose of this case.

Quite apart from that, however, I agree with the learned judge that in cases of this sort, the primâ facie damage is the cost of repair, and circumstances which are peculiar to the plaintiffs, namely, that they have, before the damage has been agreed, sold the vessel to be broken up, is an accidental circumstance which ought not to be taken into account in the way of diminution of damages, any more than it is in a case of the sale of goods, where the difference in market price and contract price is always allowed, regardless of the fact that, having regard to what the purchaser has done, no such damages are in fact suffered by him. It is desirable that there should be a measure of damage which can be easily and definitely found. In this case, circumstances which are accidental to the plaintiffs of which the defendants have no knowledge, or circumstances applicable to the defendants of which the plaintiffs have no knowledge, need not be taken into account.

A number of cases have been cited, and I think it is clearly established now that where damage is done to a vessel, then some damages are recoverable. I think that is the result of cases like The Mediana (2) and The Marpessa (3); and the other cases that have been cited, such as The York (4), The Kingsway (5) and The Endeavour (6). I need not go into the details of those cases. It is now clear that the shipowner, who claims damages in respect of injuries to his ship, if it turns out that before he has in fact repaired her he has suffered the loss of the ship by something other than the act of the defendant, can still recover the estimated amount of the cost of repairing the ship, which he would have had to incur if she had not been lost. It seems to me that the principles that apply in those cases apply equally in this: that the owners of the Benguela are entitled to recover what has been agreed to be the amount they would have had to expend for repairing their vessel, even though it has turned out, by reason of a subsequent transaction, namely, the sale to shipbreakers, that they never would have to repair her at all. Further, it does not by any means follow that the price paid by the shipbreakers would have been the same if the vessel had been fully repaired, as it was in her unrepaired condition.

For these reasons, I find myself unable to differ from the learned judge and the registrar, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SLESSER, L.J.—I agree.

EVE, J.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Road Traffic—Licence—"B" licence—Area of user—Need to state maximum in application—Publication of application—Statement of area of user—Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933 (23 & 24 Geo. 5, c. 53), s. 5 (1) (c), s. 11 (1).

By s. 5 (1) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933: "A person applying for a licence shall submit to the licensing authority a statement in the prescribed form . . . (c) specifying, in the case of an application for an 'A' licence or a 'B' licence, the facilities for the transport of goods intended to be provided by him under the licence for other persons, including particulars of the district within which, or the places between which, it is intended that the authorised vehicles will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward."

Section 5 (1) (c) assumes that a "B" licence will, as a rule, be unrestricted as to the area over which it extends (although, by s. 8 (3) (a) of the Act, a condition may be attached to it that the authorised vehicle shall be used only in a specified district or between specified places), and in making the required statement of the area of normal user the applicant is giving a general description of the area of his proposed operations and not a legally binding definition of the limits within which he intends to confine them. Where, therefore, an applicant stated in his application that B., W., S., and H. were the "districts in which, or places between which, the vehicles will normally be used" and the licensing authority granted a licence which was unrestricted as to the operation of the vehicles,

Held: the licence was good.

By s. 11 (1): "The licensing authority shall publish in the prescribed manner notice of an application [for a 'B' licence] specifying the time within which, and the manner in which, objections may be made to the grant of the application."

The licensing authority published notice of the application stating the area of normal user as specified in the application.

Held: the statement was not one of the only area within which the applicant proposed to use the vehicles, and, therefore, the order was not bad on that ground.

Notes. The licensing authority is now the Licensing Authority for Goods Vehicles: see Transport Act, 1947, s. 117.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (GREER, SLESSER, and ROCHE, L.JJ.).

On May 7, 1934, Hill and Long, Ltd., applied to the licensing authority under the C Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, for a limited carrier's licence, known as a "B" licence, for two motor goods vehicles. They gave as particulars of the centre from which the vehicles would normally be used, Nos. 312 and 314, High-street, West Bromwich; as the nature of their business, "furniture removing and delivery of furniture"; as the class or description of goods to be carried, "furniture"; and as the districts in which or places between which the vehicles would normally be used, "Birmingham, Wolverhampton, D Sutton, and Hagley." On June 4, 1934, the licensing authority published the application as follows: "West Bromwich, No. 3062, Hill and Long, Ltd., 312 and 314, High-street: Furnishers and furniture removers. Dis. 2V (3¼T) in use. Furniture. Wolverhampton, Birmingham and District." There was no objection to the application, and the licensing authority on Sept. 17, 1934, granted the application for: "any distance." The Great Western Railway Co. obtained a rule nisi for certiorari to remove E and quash the licence. The Divisional Court made the rule absolute, holding that the applicants had defined completely in their application the districts which they intended to serve, and that the licensing authority had no power to make the order for "any distance."

The licensing authority appealed to the Court of Appeal who held, allowing the appeal, that the effect of an application for a "B" licence was not to define exhaustively F the district within which, or the places between which, the vehicle could be used, and, therefore, where applicants—furniture removers—enumerated in their application for such a licence four Midland towns as the districts within which, or the places between which, it was intended that the vehicles would normally be used, the licensing authority had jurisdiction to grant the application for "any distance." From that decision the Great Western Railway Company appealed to the House of Lords.

G By the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933:

> Section 1 (1): "Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, no person shall use a goods vehicle on a road for the carriage of goods: (a) for hire or reward; or (b) for or in connection with any trade or business carried on by him, except under a licence."
> H Section 2 (1): "Licences shall be of the following classes: (a) public carriers' licences; (b) limited carriers' licences; (c) private carriers' licences. A limited carrier's licence (in this part of this Act referred to as 'a B licence') shall entitle the holder thereof to use the authorised vehicles as he thinks fit from time to time either for the carriage of goods for or in connection with any trade or business carried on by him, or, subject to any conditions which the licensing authority, in the I exercise of his discretion to attach conditions to a 'B' licence, may attach to the licence, for the carriage of goods for hire or reward."

(3) of the last preceding section, the licensing authority may in his discretion attach to a 'B' licence as respects the user of the authorised vehicle . . . for the carriage of goods for hire or reward, all or any of the following conditions . . . (a) a condition that they shall be so used only in a specified district or between specified places."
> Section 11 (1): is set out in the headnote.

W. T. Monckton, K.C., W. S. Morrison, K.C., and B. de H. Pereira for the appellants. A

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Valentine Holmes for the respondent were not called on to argue.

LORD BLANESBURGH.—This appeal, in my judgment, fails, and availing myself of the detailed statement of the facts and the careful analysis of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, to be found in the judgments under review, I can justify that con- B clusion, as I hope, quite simply.

An "A" licence and a "B" licence under this Act have much in common. It is, however, important to note some of the distinctions between them, for these distinctions throw a light, as I think, upon the question of construction raised by this appeal. A public carrier's, or an "A" licence, is a licence granted to an applicant whose business is that of a carrier of goods (s. 2 (2)). A limited carrier's, or a "B" licence, is one C granted to an applicant whose trade or business is other than that of a carrier of goods (s. 2 (3)). Quite consistently with this distinction, an "A" licence when granted is always unrestricted in area; so also, as a licence in pari materia, is a "B" licence so far as it entitles its holder to use the authorised vehicles for the carriage of goods for or in connection with any trade or business carried on by himself. It is only in so far as the "B" licence is an authority to him to use these vehicles to carry goods for hire or reward D that there may, among other conditions, be attached to the licence the condition (s. 8 (3) (a)) that the vehicles shall be so used only in a specified district or between specified places. It is not, I think, in the contemplation of the Act, either in the case of an "A" licence or a "B" licence, that there shall ever be any limitation of area except in the case of a "B" licence in the circumstances just stated. The reference to the "district specified in the licence" in s. 11 (3), requires, perhaps, some explanation. The words, E I take it, are in reference to a "B" licence so limited.

These considerations are, I think, of assistance in arriving at the true meaning and effect of s. 5 (1) (c), upon which so much turns. A person applying for a licence is by that subsection required to submit to the licensing authority a statement in the prescribed form "specifying, in the case of an application for an 'A' licence or a 'B' licence, the facilities for the transport of goods intended to be provided by him under the licence F for other persons, including particulars of the district within which, or the places between which, it is intended that the authorised vehicles will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward."

Now, as has been shown, there is in the case of an "A" licence no power under the Act to restrict its operation to that district or those places; nor is there any such power in the case of a "B" licence, except in the way authorised by s. 8 (3) (a). This makes G clear what, in itself, is perhaps clear enough, namely, that "normally" is the emphatic word in s. 5 (1) (c), and from its use alone I would draw the conclusion that while only exceptional user outside what I may call the area of normal user is expected, it is the assumption of the subsection—in correspondence with the other provisions of the Act to which I have referred—that the "B" licence when granted as a rule, no less than the "A" licence always, will be unrestricted as to the area over which it extends. It H appears to me, therefore, that when, in this case, Messrs. Hill and Long, Ltd., on May 7, 1934, using the prescribed form, applied for a "B" licence specifying "Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Sutton, Hagley," as being, in the words of the application, the "districts in which, or places between which, the vehicles will normally be used," they were implicitly making an application for a "B" licence unrestricted in area—a licence which, in response, it was within the power of the licensing authority to grant if, all I statutory conditions being complied with, he thought fit so to do.

But, further light and in the same direction is, I think, thrown on s. 5 (1) (c) of the Act by s. 11, which is complementary to it. That section required the licensing authority to publish in the prescribed manner, as he did, notice of Messrs. Hill and Long's application, specifying the time within which, and the manner in which, objections might be made to the grant of the licence applied for. Thereupon by sub-s. (2) it became his duty "to take into consideration any objections to the application which may be made by persons who are already providing facilities, whether by means of road transport or any other kind of transport for the carriage of goods for hire or reward in the district, or between the places, which the applicant intends to serve on the ground that suitable transport facilities in that district or between those places are or, if the application were granted, would be either generally or in respect of any particular type of vehicles, in excess of requirements, or on the ground that any of the conditions of a licence held by the applicant has not been complied with."

The authorised objectors, it will be noted, must be persons providing facilities "for the carriage of goods for hire or reward in the district, or between the places, which the applicant intends to serve." These words, in my judgment—and I express only my own individual view—are too close to those in s. 5 (1) (c) to make it possible to refer them to any other than what I have ventured to call the area of normal user specified by the applicant, as the statute requires, in his application. And further, not only can it fairly be said, as I think, speaking again for myself, that that is the only area which the applicant "intends to serve," but the words, if applied to the whole country, become, in my view, meaningless.

A very important consequence results from this view. It is "the area of normal user" to which alone, whether in the case of an "A" licence or a "B" licence, the attention of the Act is directed. It is only from competitors in that area that objection is heard; it is to the traffic conditions of that area that the attention of the licensing authority is directed. No provision is made for objection from any other quarter, for the reason, I cannot myself doubt, although it is not so expressed, that, to adopt the language of s. 11 (4) (a) of this Act, and so far as the outside area is concerned, "having regard to the trivial nature of the application, it is not necessary that any opportunity should be given for objection." The licence only continues for a year, and if on an application for a further licence it appears that the area of normal user has been in use extended, that would be an opportunity either for refusing the licence for a second year or in any case for limiting its operation to a prescribed area. The appellants in this case were authorised objectors. They did not appear to object to the grant of the "B" licence. Had they done so, they would, interested as they are also in the outside area, have been entitled to ask that the licence should be limited to the area of normal user. The licensing authority, in the absence of any such request, decided that the licence for the applicants' two authorised vehicles should be for "Furniture and household effects any distance."

For the reasons I have given I can see no excess of jurisdiction in that decision, and I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD ATKIN.—This is an appeal on an application for a writ of certiorari that a decision of the licensing authority for the West Midland Traffic Area should be brought up to be quashed on the ground of lack of jurisdiction to make it. The grounds which are set out in the rule nisi and upon which the matter must be decided are, first, that:

> "The said licensing authority had no power to make the said decision upon the said application as published," and, secondly, that

> "The said licensing authority had only power to refuse or to grant the said application as published, or to grant a licence for a lesser number of vehicles and (or) a more restricted class of goods and (or) a more limited district of operation."

Personally, I am unable to see any difference in principle between the second ground and the first, but the first is undoubtedly the important matter.

The matter arises under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, which provides for applications for licences to use vehicles for the purpose of carrying goods. There are three forms of application for licences—"A," "B," and "C." We need not trouble with "C." An "A" licence is a licence which is granted to a public carrier of goods for hire or reward, that is to say, of the goods of other persons, not goods in his own business, and that licence, it is admitted, if granted, is granted free of any restriction as to area. A "B" licence is a licence which carries the right to use vehicles for the carriage of goods in the applicant's own trade or business, and also for the carriage of other people's goods for hire or reward, and that licence also, unless the licensing authority chooses to A impose restrictions as to area, is a licence which is unrestricted in area. The application has to be made in a prescribed form, and the contents of the application are prescribed by the statute. By s. 5 (1), of the Act it is provided that

> "A person applying for a licence shall submit to the licensing authority a statement in the prescribed form (a) containing . . . such particulars as may be prescribed," B > and so on; "(b) stating the number and type of hired motor vehicles and of trailers proposed to be so used"; and "(c) specifying, in the case of an application for an 'A' licence or a 'B' licence, the facilities for the transport of goods intended to be provided by him under the licence for other persons, including particulars of the district within which, or the places between which, it is intended that the authorised vehicles will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward." C

The prescribed form is the same form of application for both "A" and "B" licences, and in respect of both of them it requires the applicant, under No. 5, to state "Facilities which applicant proposes to provide: (a) Class or description of goods to be carried; (b) districts in which or places between which the vehicles will normally be used." That appears to me to conform precisely to the terms of the statute; but it is to be noted that it is that form and that form only which the applicant is bound to use. D
Accordingly, the applicants in the present case, Messrs. Hill and Long, Ltd., of West Bromwich, stated the nature of their business as being "Furniture removing and delivery of furniture," and in reply to No. 5 they stated: "(a) Class or description of goods to be carried: Furniture. (b) Districts in which or places between which the vehicles will normally be used: Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Sutton, Hagley."

That application came before the licensing authority. It was his duty under s. 11 (1) E of the Act to > "publish in the prescribed manner notice of an application to which this section applies, specifying the time within which, and the manner in which, objections may be made to the grant of the application"; and there is a form of notice prescribed by the rules. Rule 9 provides: F

> "The licensing authority shall cause to be issued as occasion may require a statement hereinafter called 'Applications and Decisions' which shall contain (unless previously notified therein): (1) As regards notifiable applications" (and this was a notifiable application) . . . "(a) notices of such applications; (b) the dates . . . on which and the places at which he proposes to hold public inquiries and the applications which he proposes to consider at those inquiries." G

He is not obliged to hold a public inquiry except in special circumstances when he decides to do so.

In accordance with that rule prescribing the form of notice, the licensing authority published, in what appears to me and I think to all your Lordships to be strict accordance with the rule, the notice which is contained in Document No. 4 of the exhibits in this case: "West Bromwich. Hill and Long, Ltd., 312 and 314, High-street, Furnishers H and Furniture Removers. Dis. 2V (3¼T)"—which means two discretionary vehicles of a total unladen weight of 3¼ tons—"in use." The goods to be carried are described as "furniture," and then there follows: "Wolverhampton, Birmingham and District," being quite plainly a reproduction of the statement in the application of the district in which it is intended normally to use the vehicles. The applications are in like form, and indeed it may be noted that in the notice which is given of the application for an I
"A" licence precisely the same form is used; the applicants for an "A" licence state the district in which they intend normally to use the vehicles—a limited district—and that is published.

The application was considered by the licensing authority, and the licensing authority thought fit not to impose any condition or restriction as to area. It was entirely within his discretion whether he should do so or not. The forms were in accordance with the statutory forms, he was acting within his statutory power, and I confess that I fail to see how any suggestion can arise that there was any lack of jurisdiction, for he was acting in every way in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the statute and was exercising the jurisdiction which was given to him by the statute.

The point which was suggested to the Divisional Court was, I think, twofold: First of all it was suggested, though probably not with much effect, that when a person applied for a licence and stated the district within which he was intending normally to use the vehicle, that in itself was a statement of the district to which he intended to confine the use of his vehicle. That suggestion appears to me to be quite contrary to the actual words of the application and of the statute. Then it was suggested that in any event when the licensing authority published notice of the application and in the notice stated the area as being a particular district—in this case, as I have read to your Lordships, "Wolverhampton, Birmingham and District"—he was stating for some reason or other that that was the only district within which the applicant proposed to use his vehicle. That, again, as I have said, appears to me to be entirely contrary to the terms of the statute and to the form of the application. I see no obligation at all on the part of the licensing authority to publish anything other than that which he is ordered by the statute and by the rules to publish, and with that, as I have said, he has complied by publishing the district as the district of normal user.

That appears to me to dispose of the whole case as to lack of jurisdiction. It is said that the court must be driven to a different conclusion, and must have deemed either the application or the notice (and I have found it very difficult to distinguish between the two), though in terms it refers to the district as the district of normal use, as describing the district of sole use; and it is said that that must be so because of the difficulty which there otherwise would be in objecting. I have myself no doubt at all that the learned judges in the Divisional Court came to the conclusion that the application itself was limited to the particular district. I find that the learned Lord Chief Justice in his judgment says:

> "It appears to me that we should be reducing the Act . . . to a mere nullity if we were to hold, as is suggested, that there might be an application in terms confined to a very limited area . . . and that afterwards . . . that area . . . should be so enlarged," and so on; and AVORY, J., in the course of his judgment, in dealing with the powers of objection, says:

> "It is obvious that a person who is already providing facilities in a certain area cannot fill up that form in an effective manner unless the application which is made is limited to a certain district or for the use of the vehicles in one certain place."

I have already stated that the terms of the statute and of the application and of the rules appear to me to afford no ground for putting that limited meaning upon the application.

A question, no doubt, may arise on the terms of s. 11 (2), which provides:

> "It shall be the duty of the licensing authority, on an application to which this section applies, to take into consideration any objections to the application which may be made by persons who are already providing facilities, whether by means of road transport or any other kind of transport, for the carriage of goods for hire or reward in the district, or between the places, which the applicant intends to serve, on the ground that suitable transport facilities in that district, or between those places, are or, if the application were granted, would be . . . in excess of requirements."

I desire to express no opinion on the question, which has been suggested as possibly likely to arise on other occasions, whether those words "in the district, or between the places, which the applicant intends to serve" mean the district or places which he intends normally to serve, or the district or places which he has the power to serve under his application. I can quite see the force of the construction which adapts those words to the words in s. 5 and the form of the application and so forth. On the other hand, I can well understand, as counsel for the appellants has pointed out, that if they do not apply to abnormal user, the accumulation of abnormal user by a number of "B" licensees may amount to a very serious dislocation of, and interference with, existing traffic and may lead to a possible excess of facilities if they are all granted. For my part, I should like not to pass an opinion upon the question as to whether or not an objector is entitled to object to what may be called an abnormal user by a single "B" licensee of his vehicle. I do not think that in this case the matter arises.

The only other point which I wish to mention is this. I was a little startled to find that when the Court of Appeal had in fact discharged the rule and stated their disagreement with the Divisional Court and had reversed the decision of the Divisional Court, it was considered necessary to proceed by a writ of procedendo and also by a writ of supersedeas in order to get the matter put right. I am bound to say that the view which I had formed of the effect of a judgment of the Court of Appeal reversing a decision below was that the decision below became as though it had never been pronounced, which I think is the general effect so far as writs of execution and other things are concerned. The matter has been, in fact, settled, because I think the necessary writs have been granted and the order quashing the decision has now been put an end to, but I wish merely to reserve my own opinion whether or not it was really necessary to proceed by way of those writs.

I am entirely in accord with the motion which has been proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack.

LORD RUSSELL.—I also am in agreement with the motion, and I can state my reasons shortly. The appellants' claim to relief here is founded upon an alleged want of jurisdiction in the authority in coming to his decision, and that allegation has been supported in your Lordships' House upon two grounds, the first of which does not appear in the order which granted the rule nisi. It was here said that the application was an irregular application, not in accordance with s. 5 of the Act, the alleged irregularity being an omission by the applicant to state in his application the maximum limits of his area of user. It was then said that, the application being an irregular application, no decision could properly be given in respect of it.

I cannot understand what foundation exists for this allegation of irregularity in the application. Section 5 of the Act, as I read it, imposes no obligation on the applicant to make such a statement at all. Section 5 requires the applicant to submit a statement in the prescribed form specifying the facilities for the transport of goods intended to be provided by him. That is the applicant's duty, and the form which has been prescribed includes all the details which the section specifically requires to be included, including the area of normal user. It appears to me that the application was complete and regular in every respect.

The second ground alleged for the contention of want of jurisdiction was this. It was said that the authority was not entitled to grant the application otherwise than as published. That was elaborated in greater detail in the order granting the rule nisi, in these terms: "The said licensing authority had only power to refuse or to grant the said application as published or to grant a licence for a lesser number of vehicles and (or) a more restricted class of goods and (or) a more limited district of operation." the references there being to the provisions of s. 6 (1) (a), and the provisions of s. 8 (3) (a) and (b), of the Act. That contention depends wholly upon the view that the publication in this particular case stated that this was an application for a licence to use vehicles within a limited area. In my opinion that meaning cannot be attributed to this publication. Read in the light of the Act, as we must read it, it is a statement that Hill and Long, Ltd., have applied for a "B" licence which (I am now using the words of s. 2 (3) of the Act) shall entitle them to use two motor vehicles as they think fit from time to time for the carriage of furniture for hire or reward, and that (in the words of s. 5 (1) (c), the authorised vehicles will normally be used in Wolverhampton, Birmingham and district. Upon that application the licensing authority had, in my opinion, full jurisdiction to decide to grant the "B" licence without attaching any condition limiting the area of operation under s. 8 (3) (a).

For those reasons I concur in the motion proposed.

LORD MACMILLAN.—An applicant for a licence under the Act, whether an "A" licence or a "B" licence, is required to furnish particulars, inter alia, "of the district within which, or the places between which, it is intended that the authorised vehicles will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward." This requirement, to my mind, is so phrased as to suggest that the applicant is to give a general description of the area of his proposed operations rather than a legally binding definition of it. Such information is obviously material to enable the licensing authority to judge of the expediency of granting the licence, and also to enable the applicant's competitors to decide whether they shall object. But the statute nowhere prescribes, nor do the statutory forms require, that either an "A" licence or a "B" licence when granted shall contain any definition of area. In the case of the "B" licence, however, the licensing authority may in his discretion attach a condition that the authorised vehicle shall be used "only in a specified district or between specified places." This means that in the licensing authority's discretion he may equally refrain from attaching any such geographical limitation. Accordingly, when notice is given that a "B" licence has been applied for, all potential objectors are thereby made aware that the licence may be granted without any condition limiting it to a specific area.

It is complained in the present case that the licensing authority had no jurisdiction to decide that he would grant the applicant a licence for "any distance," because no previous notification had been given that a licence unlimited as to area had been applied for. In my opinion, a notification that an application has been made for a "B" licence is a notification that if the application is granted a licence of unlimited geographical extent may be accorded. The appellants have, therefore, no right to complain that what has been done has been done without due notice; and as this complaint is the basis of their case, I agree with your Lordships that the appeal should be dismissed.

I may add that no licence has yet been issued; the licensing authority has only announced that he does not propose in this case to exercise his discretion to impose a geographical limitation. It does not follow that the words "any distance" will appear in the licence when issued. I presume they will not, for the form of "B" licence which we have seen does not provide for any mention of area except where the licensing authority has exercised his discretion to impose a geographical limitation.

LORD MAUGHAM.—I am of the same opinion, and do not think it necessary to repeat what has already fallen from your Lordships, statements with which I entirely agree. I will add only two observations.

What has been called the area of normal user must be stated in an application, whether it be for an "A" or for a "B" licence. On the other hand, the actual licence will not in general have any reference to this area. In the case of an "A" licence it cannot properly be so limited; in the case of a "B" licence it will not be so limited unless under s. 8 (3), the licensing authority in his discretion thinks fit to impose a condition to that effect. The licence, however, whether an "A" licence or a "B" licence, is one granted upon a representation of a distinct character made by the applicant, and inasmuch as an "A" licence endures only for two years and a "B" licence for one year, it is plain that there is a very strong sanction (if that popular word may be used) to induce the applicant to be very careful in making his representation as to the area in which he proposes normally to use his vehicles.

I think it unnecessary to add anything to what has been said as to the true construction of s. 5. The view expressed by your Lordships seems to me to accord with the natural construction and the only one which the words can properly bear.

The other observation which I wish to make is with reference to s. 11. I have nothing to say on the first subsection; I agree entirely with what has already fallen from your Lordships on that point. As to sub-s. (2), I incline to take the same view as that which my noble and learned friend Lord Blanesburgh has taken, but I wish plainly to observe that in my opinion it is immaterial for the decision of this appeal to determine whether the word "normally" ought to be implied in the phrase, "in the district, or between the places, which the applicant intends to serve," or whether the words should be left without any implication of that character. If the word "normally" is to be implied, which is the argument strenuously pressed upon your Lordships, the only conclusion which I think can properly be drawn as to the true construction of the Act on this point is that the legislature thought it quite immaterial to enable persons who would be affected only by an abnormal user in the district in which they have ordinarily carried on their business to object to such casual, and probably rare, user of vehicles which might perhaps compete with them. If, on the other hand, the word is not to be implied, then the whole of the argument based upon the construction of s. 11 (2) falls to the ground.

On the grounds already given by your Lordships I concur with the proposed motion.

Appeal dismissed.

Distress—Protection of third party's goods on premises—Form of declaration—Omission of certain words—Validity—Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 53), s. 1 (1) (c).

The Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, provides, by s. 1, that where a landlord has levied a distress for arrears of rent due from his tenant, a third party who is the owner of goods distrained upon may serve upon the landlord a declaration in writing stating that the tenant has no right of property or beneficial interest in the goods, that the goods are the claimant's property or in his lawful possession, and "are not goods or live stock to which this Act is expressed not to apply"; and by s. 2, that a landlord who proceeds with a distress after receipt of such a declaration shall be deemed guilty of an illegal distress.

In a declaration made in purported compliance with s. 1 it was stated that the goods distrained upon were not the tenant's property, that he had no interest therein, and that they were the claimant's property, but the words "and are not goods or live stock to which this Act is expressed not to apply" were omitted.

Held: s. 1 of the Act of 1908 was to be strictly construed, the declaration did not fulfil the requirements of that section, and, accordingly, the landlords who, after receiving the declaration, continued the distress and sold the goods, had not been guilty of an illegal distress.

Action

The plaintiffs, the owners of the goods in question, Druce & Co., Ltd., furniture dealers, claimed from the defendant landlords, Beaumont Property Trust, Ltd., damages for an alleged illegal distress. The owners had entered into two hire-purchase agreements, dated May 8, 9, 1934, respectively, under which they agreed to let certain furniture to a Mr. Louis Scott, who then occupied two flats, 102 and 111, at No. 20, Abbey-road, N.W., as tenant of the defendants. Those two agreements were terminated by notices in writing dated Aug. 2, 1934, and thereupon the goods, the subject of the hire-purchase agreements, ceased to be in the lawful possession of the tenant. On Aug. 30, 1934, the landlords levied distress for arrears of rent on the contents of flat 102, and seized part of the owner's furniture of the value of £111 0s. 11d. On Aug. 31 they levied distress on the contents of flat 111, and seized part of the owners' furniture of the value of £59 0s. 4d.

On Sept. 7, 1934, the owners served on the landlords two declarations. That in respect of flat 111 was as follows:

> "Declaration by owner of goods distrained that they are his (8 Edw. 7, c. 53). Sir,—We, Druce & Co., Ltd., of 37, Baker-street, London, W., do hereby declare that Mr. L. Scott, the immediate tenant of the Beaumont Property Trust, Ltd., has no right of property or beneficial interest in the furniture, goods and chattels, distrained at flat 111, 20, Abbey-road, N.W.8, for rent alleged to be due to the Beaumont Property Trust, Ltd., and an inventory whereof is annexed hereto, but that such furniture, goods or chattels are our property.—Dated Sept. 7, 1934. [Signed for Druce & Co., Ltd.]"

The declaration with respect to flat 102 was in similar terms.

The owners contended that the landlords became disentitled to proceed with the distress on receipt of the above declarations and that in selling the goods thereafter they had converted them to their own use.

The landlords admitted that they had seized the goods (subject to a few unimportant exceptions) and admitted service on them of the declarations of Sept. 7, but they said that those declarations were insufficient to satisfy s. 1 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, by reason that there were omitted therefrom the words, "and are not goods or live stock to which this Act is expressed not to apply."

By the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, s. 1 (1):

> "If any superior landlord shall levy, or authorise to be levied, a distress on any furniture, goods, or chattels of . . . (c) any . . . person whatsoever not being a tenant of the premises or of any part thereof, and not having any beneficial interest in any tenancy of the premises or of any part thereof, for arrears of rent due to such superior landlord by his immediate tenant, such . . . person aforesaid may serve such superior landlord . . . with a declaration in writing made by such . . . person aforesaid, setting forth that such immediate tenant has no right of property or beneficial interest in the furniture, goods, or chattels so distrained, or threatened to be distrained upon, and that such furniture, goods, or chattels are the property or in the lawful possession of such . . . person aforesaid, and are not goods or live stock to which this Act is expressed not to apply. . . ."

By s. 2, a landlord who proceeds with a distress after receipt of such a declaration shall be deemed guilty of an illegal distress.

By s. 4, various classes of goods are excluded from the protection afforded by the Act, including goods in the possession, order, or disposition of the tenant with the consent of the owner, goods on premises where a business is carried on in which both an immediate tenant and under-tenant have an interest, and goods on premises used as offices or warehouses, where the owner neglects for one calendar month after notice to remove the goods.

Tristram Beresford for the owners of the goods.
H. J. A. Burt for the landlords.

HORRIDGE, J.—The facts in this case are not in dispute. The goods, the subject-matter of the action, were hired out by the plaintiffs, the owners, to the tenant, a Mr. Scott. Before the distress in question was levied the hire-purchase agreements had been brought to an end. It was not disputed by counsel for the landlords, that the goods were no longer subject to those agreements, because the agreements had been legally determined in such a way as to bring the case within the decision in Smart Bros., Ltd. v. Holt (1).

The point on which the case turns is whether or not a proper declaration has been served within the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908. That Act considerably impinged on the rights of the landlord as regards distress, but, before those rights were so impinged on, the Act provided that certain formalities should be gone through. In dealing with goods claimed by a third party, s. 1 states that the third party may serve the landlord, or the bailiff or other agent,

> "with a declaration in writing made by such . . . other person aforesaid, setting forth that such immediate tenant has no right of property or beneficial interest in the furniture, goods, or chattels so distrained, or threatened to be distrained upon, and that such furniture, goods, or chattels are the property or in the lawful possession of such . . . other person"

—that is, (i) that the tenant has no interest; (ii) that the person claiming has; and (iii) that such goods "are not goods . . . to which this Act is expressed not to apply." That declaration, if falsely made, entails penalties under the Perjury Act, 1911.

In this case a declaration was served on the proper parties, but it did not contain any statement that the goods were not goods to which the Act was expressed not to apply. Under s. 4 of the Act certain goods are stated to be outside the Act and, therefore, not privileged in any way from distress. Sub-s. (1) of that section deals with goods which are in the possession, order, or disposition of the tenant, although they are the property of somebody else. The goods in this case might conceivably have been in the order, possession, or disposition of the tenant but for the termination of the hire-purchase agreements, and I think that the Act required the person claiming the goods to state by way of declaration, with the penalties to which I have referred, that the goods were not goods which were liable to distress—in other words, that they were not goods which were in the order, possession, or disposition of the tenant. Sub-s. (2) contains other provisions as to goods which are not to be exempted from distress, and as to these, also, I think it necessary that the declaration should show that the goods in question are not within the subsection.

The landlord was entitled to have the protection of a declaration, enforceable in the way to which I have referred, in respect of matters which it was necessary for him to know before deciding whether to continue with the distress or not, and he was entitled to have those matters by way of the declaration prescribed by the statute. That has not been done and, in my view, therefore, the distress did not become illegal, and the plaintiffs' claim fails.

Two cases have been cited to which perhaps I ought to refer. The first, Rugby School (Governors) v. Tannahill (2), was a case not under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, but under s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which re-enacted an old section of the Conveyancing Act, 1882. The question there was whether or not a proper notice had been served so as to entitle the plaintiff to possession of the property, or, in other words, whether the notice required by s. 146 of the Act of 1925 had been served so as to entitle the plaintiff to exercise his right to claim forfeiture. Two questions arose on that notice, which did not state either that the tenant was required to remedy the breach or what compensation was required. The Court of Appeal held that on the true construction of s. 146 the right to require the breach to be remedied only applied to cases where the breach could be remedied, and that in the case in question the breach could not be remedied. On the second point, whether compensation should be demanded, they followed a previous decision of the Court of Appeal, by which it was held that if the landlord required no compensation there was no occasion for him to state anything about compensation in his notice. Those two matters seem to me to turn entirely on the construction of s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and have no application to the construction of the section with which I have to deal.

The other case cited was Ex parte Harris (3), in which it was held that where no rent was due by the tenant there was no necessity for the lodger to insert any statement about rent. LORD ESHER, M.R., in giving judgment, said (16 Q.B.D. at p. 132):

> "That seems to me to show that the proper reading of the provision is that the declaration is to state what rent, if any, is due, and for what period."

The matter turned on the construction of the section, which is that if any rent is due it has to be stated. As there was no rent due, there was no occasion to state it.

I should just like to mention one or two matters which seem to me to point to the fact that unless the requirements as to the declaration are strictly complied with, the third parties, the plaintiffs in this case, are not entitled to the protection given by the Act. BOWEN, L.J., said in Thwaites v. Wilding (4) (12 Q.B.D. at p. 7):

> "I think it clear that a lodger is relieved only when the terms of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act have been rigidly complied with."

And BRAY, J., in Hackney Furnishing Co. v. Watts (5), said this ([1912] 3 K.B. at p. 232):

> "It must be remembered that the statute is one depriving the landlord of a part of his common law right to distrain. The words must not be strained so as to further restrict his rights."

In my opinion, s. 1 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1908, has to be strictly complied with. It has not been complied with in this case, and there must be judgment for the landlords with costs.

Judgment for the landlords.

The plaintiffs were the personal representatives of one H. B. who had granted a lease of certain premises in Santiago de Chile to the second defendants who covenanted to pay the rent one month in advance. The first defendants guaranteed to hold themselves responsible for all the obligations of the lease. The lease also provided for the payment by the second defendants of £15,000 in respect of alterations to the premises which was to be paid in two parts, the first instalment being due on Aug. 31, 1935. It was agreed that the proper law of the lease was that of Chile. Rent having become due under the lease, the plaintiffs brought an action therefor in the King's Bench Division, and they also claimed £7,500, the first instalment of the indemnity. At the time of the commencement of this action an action was pending in Chile in which the defendants claimed against the plaintiffs a declaration that the rent under the lease was payable in Chilean currency. The defendants having applied that the English action should be stayed,

Held: (i) the action raised no issue relating to real property in Chile, but was a personal action for rent, in its nature transitory, and so the English court had jurisdiction to entertain it although incidentally it was connected with an immovable situated out of England; the only real question so far as regarded the claim for rent was as to the amount of rent payable under the terms of the lease, and that could be justly determined by an English court on evidence of the law of Chile as to the interpretation to be put on the lease; the test applicable was whether the continuance of the proceedings in England would necessarily produce injustice to the defendants, and that the defendants had failed to prove; and, therefore, although both parties would to some extent be inconvenienced by calling evidence in England, the stay asked for would not be granted.

(ii) the action pending in Chile, not being brought by the same parties as brought the English action, was not a lis alibi pendens by reason of which a stay would be granted.

Appeal from an order of PORTER, J.

The plaintiffs claimed an agreed sum of £7,500 payable on Aug. 31, 1935, and one month's rent of certain premises due under a lease dated June 17, 1931, in the occupation of the second defendants, Chilean Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd., situated in Santiago de Chile. By that lease the first defendants, the South American Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd., guaranteed the strict fulfilment of all obligations, conditions, and liabilities under the lease. The defendants pleaded that the rights and obligations arising from the lease were to be ascertained by the law of Chile and the plaintiffs' claim, if maintainable at all, was maintainable in Chile; that the rent was payable in the currency of Chile; and that the sum of £7,500 was payable at the second defendant's office in Santiago. Two actions were pending, the one in England to which this report relates, and the other in Chile by the present defendants against the present plaintiffs for a declaration that the rent under the lease was payable in Chilean currency. PORTER, J., having refused to stay the action brought in the King's Bench Division, the defendants appealed.

Evershed, K.C., and Harold Murphy for the defendants.

A. T. Miller, K.C., and Ernest Hancock for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20. The following judgments were read.

GREER, L.J.—This is an appeal by the two defendants against the refusal of PORTER, J., to stay an action brought in the King's Bench Division to recover an agreed sum of £7,500 and one month's rent of certain premises in the occupation of the defendants, the Chilean Stores, in Santiago de Chile. Both of the claims arose under an agreement made in Paris in the Spanish language between the late Mr. Beeche, whose representatives the plaintiffs are, and the two defendant companies. The defendants are British companies with their head offices in London, but the business of the second defendants is entirely carried on in Santiago de Chile and that of the first defendants in the Argentine. It was stated in the agreement that the representatives of the South American Stores guaranteed to hold themselves responsible for and undertook jointly with the Chilean Stores strict fulfilment of all the obligations in respect of payment and other conditions and liabilities which the contract of lease imposed on the lessee, for which purpose both parties elected domicil at Santiago de Chile as would be proved at the end thereof. By art. 1, Mr. Beeche granted on lease to the Chilean Stores for the period of ten years certain premises at Santiago de Chile, the consideration of the lease being stated as follows:

> "The consideration for the lease is ninety-three thousand five hundred pesos of one hundred and eighty-three thousand and fifty-seven millionths of a gramme of fine gold monthly which shall be paid at the option of the owner either in Santiago de Chile at the residence or office of the latter or of his representatives or remitted to Europe, according to the instructions which the owner may give, one month in advance on the first working day of each month."

The agreement went on to provide that in the event of the said payment not being made punctually penal interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month should be paid. The said agreement also, by art. 4, referred to an indemnity which had been agreed at £15,000 sterling in respect of alterations already effected in the premises and specified in an earlier contract and payable in lieu of the restoration of the buildings to the state in which they were before the said alterations were made, and provided that this sum of £15,000 should be paid in two parts: £7,500 sterling on Aug. 31, 1935, and the other half on Aug. 31, 1945. It will be observed that, though this article of the agreement is in the same document as the contract of lease, it is not really part of the lease, nor, in my judgment, is it included in the words as to election of domicil at Santiago de Chile. The late Mr. Beeche lived in Paris, and the agreement with these two British companies was made in Paris in the Spanish language, which is the language of Chile, and it was agreed by the plaintiffs for the purposes of this appeal, and I think rightly agreed, that the proper law of the contract was the law of Chile.

It was argued on behalf of the defendants that they were entitled under s. 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to ask that the action should be stayed on the ground that it was either vexatious or oppressive to them to permit it to proceed in England. Several reasons were suggested why we should regard the action as oppressive—(i) that the action being one which was not of a transitory character the court in England would, according to English law, have no jurisdiction to decide it; (ii) it was said that even if the court has jurisdiction, it still ought not to entertain the action because to do so would involve inconvenience to the defendants amounting to injustice; (iii) it was said that the action ought to be stayed on the ground of lis alibi pendens; and (iv) that by reason of the selection of the domicil of Santiago de Chile the plaintiffs and the defendants must be taken to have agreed to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Chilean courts. Counsel for the defendants called attention to the law as stated in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 5th edit., r. 53, and the exceptions stated on p. 207, where the learned author says:

> "Where the court has jurisdiction to entertain an action against a person under either r. 59, or under any of the exceptions to r. 60, the court has jurisdiction to entertain an action against such person respecting an immovable situate out of England (foreign land) on the ground of either (a) a contract between the parties to the action; or (b) an equity between such parties with reference to such immovable."

Counsel did not dispute the accuracy of this statement of the law. It is quite clear that in the present case there was a personal action on what in England would have been an action on a covenant in a lease for rent. This is not, in my opinion, a real action, but is a personal action, and according to DICEY it is one which a court would have jurisdiction to entertain, though the action in personam incidentally relates to an immovable situate out of England. There is in the present case no issue in the action relating to the land in Chile, inasmuch as there is no dispute that at the date of the writ the rent had become due under the terms of the agreement, and on the authorities it seems to me that unless some injustice would be done to the defendants by allowing the action to proceed in England, it ought not to be stayed.

The law on this subject was considered in a number of cases, especially in Logan v. Bank of Scotland (1) and Re Norton's Settlement, Norton v. Norton (2). The decision in Logan v. Bank of Scotland (1) is accurately summed up in the headnote, which reads as follows:

> "The court will stay an action, brought within the jurisdiction in respect of a cause of action arising out of the jurisdiction, if satisfied that no injustice will be done thereby to the plaintiff, and that the defendant would be subject to such injustice in defending the action as would amount to vexation and oppression to which he would not be subjected if an action were brought, in another and accessible court, where the course of action arose."

SIR GORELL BARNES uses these words ([1906] 1 K.B. at p. 147):

> "The defendants make this motion practically upon the grounds stated in Sir George Anderson's affidavit, where he urges that no legitimate advantage can accrue to the plaintiff from prosecuting this action in England while there is an appropriate tribunal in Scotland, and that he believes that the plaintiff has not brought the action in England bona fide for the purpose of obtaining justice, but vexatiously and solely for the purpose of harassing the defendant."

Referring to the Scottish cases, the President says ([1906] 1 K.B. at p. 149):

> "I should gather that the Scottish courts would scarcely object to allow a case to be tried unless they felt satisfied that injustice would be done by allowing it to proceed in their own court."

And later he states the principle as being:

> "That the court will interfere to prevent vexatious proceedings which would have the effect of preventing the due administration of justice," and he cites the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in McHenry v. Lewis (3) (22 Ch.D. at p. 408), where that learned judge said:

> "The general principle is that the court can and will interfere whenever there is vexation and oppression to prevent the administration of justice being perverted for an unjust end."

Later, the President said ([1906] 1 K.B. at p. 150):

> "The court should, on the one hand, see clearly that in stopping an action it does not do injustice, and, on the other hand, I think the court ought to interfere whenever there is such vexation and oppression that the defendant who objects to the exercise of the jurisdiction would be subjected to such injustice that he ought not to be sued in the court in which the action is brought, to which injustice he would not be subjected if the action were brought in another accessible and competent court."

In Re Norton's Settlement, Norton v. Norton (2), the principle in which a stay should be granted was also considered by the Court of Appeal in an action which had been brought in England by a wife against her husband, a barrister practising in Calcutta, by serving him during his temporary presence in England. The court, having come to the conclusion that the plaintiff had brought the action in England instead of in India, not for any bona fide purpose, but in order to obtain an undue advantage over the defendant, and that the continuance of the proceedings in England would necessarily be productive of injustice to the defendant, stayed the action. It is clear from the decision that the learned lords justices came to the conclusion that it was practically impossible in that case for the litigant who was applying for the stay to get justice in this country. If this test is, as I think it is, rightly applicable to an application to stay a plaintiff's action in this country, I think the defendants, who are English companies, have failed to satisfy the court that they would suffer any injustice by reason of the action being tried in England. It is clear from the affidavits that the only real question in the case so far as it regards the claim for rent relates to the amount of the rent payable under the terms of the lease. It seems to me that this can be justly determined by the English court upon evidence that both sides will be entitled to adduce as to what the law of Chile is as regards the interpretation to be put on the agreement of lease. Both parties will be, to some extent, inconvenienced by calling evidence in England, but this inconvenience will not, I think, amount to an injustice to the two English companies. These considerations dispose of points (i) and (ii) of the appellants' argument.

As regards the question of lis alibi pendens, there are many cases to be found in the reports in which a plaintiff bringing an action here and also in a foreign country, has been put to his election as to which he will proceed with; but even in such cases, there may be advantages to the plaintiff in continuing both actions which will be recognised as entitling him to do so, but there has been no case in which an action of a plaintiff has been stayed on the ground that his defendant has brought the action in a foreign country, and the decisions of Hill, J., in The Janera (4) and of Langton, J., in The London (5) are authorities for the proposition that in such a case the plaintiff's action ought not to be stayed.

The fourth ground on which it is alleged that the action should be stayed is that it is contended that the effect of the agreement is to give exclusive jurisdiction to the courts in Chile. This is a matter that cannot be determined upon affidavits. It might of course be set down as a preliminary question of law, but it seems to me that it will be more convenient that it be treated as one of the matters which will fall to be determined when the action comes on for trial.

In my judgment, therefore, this is an action in personam in its nature transitory, and though the judgment, if given, may affect the defendants' right to continue in possession of the property if they do not pay the rent, this is a matter which will only arise after judgment, but there is no risk of any injustice to the defendants in allowing the action to proceed in England, and therefore we ought not to reverse the decision of Porter, J. The appeal should, therefore, be dismissed with costs to be paid by the appellants in any event.

SLESSER, L.J.—I have read the judgments of Greer, L.J., and Scott, L.J. I agree with them and I have nothing to add.

SCOTT, L.J.—The facts have been stated fully by Greer, L.J., and it is not necessary for me to do more than to recite those which constitute the foundation of my own judgment. Two actions are pending at the same time, one in England, the other in Chile—which was brought first is in this case immaterial. The defendants in the English action are the plaintiffs in Chile, and in their action in Chile seek a declaration against their lessors (the plaintiffs in the action now before us) that they are entitled by the law of Chile (which it is agreed is the proper law of the contract of lease) to perform their covenant to pay the rent reserved by means of a payment in Chile in Chilean currency. The plaintiffs here seek a different declaration, namely, that the rent is payable in certain weight units of fine gold either in Chile or at the plaintiff's option in Europe in accordance with their instructions, i.e., in such form as the lessors may direct, e.g., by bill on London. It is admitted by the defendants that this option was in fact duly exercised by a demand by the plaintiffs that the defendants should remit to the plaintiffs in Paris.

The plaintiffs here also claim payment of the rent (calculated to amount to £3,858 18s. 9d. when measured in sterling) together with contract interest, and in addition a lump sum of £7,500 due to them on Aug. 31, 1935, according to a particular covenant in the lease. The defendants, by their affidavits, rely on two Chilean laws, Nos. 4973 and 5107. These two laws have already been considered by this court and the House of Lords in litigation which took place in England in the years 1933–1935 between the same parties. By these enactments the defendants say that payment of the rent in accordance with the plaintiffs' requirement under their option, and also of the £7,500, has been rendered illegal by the law of Chile and also impossible in fact. For the reasons given by Greer, L.J., these pleas must be treated as established, at least, so far as this appeal is concerned. The defendants ask for an order under s. 41 of the Judicature Act, 1925, and if it be necessary for their case, submit that under that section it is a matter of right and not merely of discretion that a stay should be granted where the circumstances contemplated by the section exist. They base their argument on two quite separate grounds:—(i) that the English High Court has no jurisdiction because the plaintiffs' action relates to land situate in Chile, and (ii), alternative to the first and assuming that they are wrong on the first, is that the English High Court is not a forum conveniens, with the further submission (if mere convenience, however strong the considerations of convenience may be, does not of itself justify a stay) that the action is in the circumstances of the case vexatious and oppressive and an abuse of the process of the court. Neither their summons nor their notice of appeal to this court indicates any ground for the argument of oppression beyond the fact that litigation is pending before the courts in Chile in which the matters raised in the English action are in process of determination in accordance with the law of Chile, by which alone the issues between the parties have to be determined. But the argument before us covered a wider field and I assume, without deciding for the purpose of this judgment, that it would be wrong to limit the reasons for the decision of the case to the precise grounds stated in the summons.

The defendants' first ground is a plea in bar. The court either has or has not jurisdiction. No question of discretion enters in. In my opinion, the defendants fail on this ground. The action is not one "relating to land" within British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Moçambique (6) and Dicey, Conflict of Law, r. 53, at p. 203 of the 5th edition. The inhibition of that rule does not bar the jurisdiction of an English

A court except where the action raises one or other of the two issues to which the rule relates, namely, (i) the title to, or right to possession of land in a foreign country, or (ii) damages for trespass to such land. Before the Judicature Acts where the action was brought on a covenant in a lease, a common law court having jurisdiction over an action founded on such a contract was not deprived of jurisdiction merely because the covenant was to pay rent or otherwise related to land in the sense that the contract as B a whole had to do with land. Courts of equity took a similar view on the question of jurisdiction where the relief asked for could be given by enforcing a personal obligation arising out of express or implied contract; so as to raise an equity, the court did not hesitate to entertain jurisdiction (see Deschamps v. Miller (7) ([1908] 1 Ch. at p. 863) per PARKER, J., and other cases cited in WHITE AND TUDOR'S LEADING CASES IN EQUITY (9th Edn.), vol. I., pp. 645 and 646). In Whitaker v. Forbes (8) a question C arose whether the plaintiff could recover against a defendant resident in this country the arrears of a rent charge issuing out of lands in Australia. BLACKBURN, J., said (1 C.P.D. at p. 53):

> "I do not think that this case raises any question as to jurisdiction, though in some respects it has been argued as if it did. The case turns on the technical distinction between local actions where the trial must be local and transitory actions and the question is one of venue only." D

It is true that LORD HERSCHELL in British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Moçambique (6) ([1893] A.C. at p. 627) expressly abstained from expressing an opinion on the above observation of BLACKBURN, J., but he had already said ([1893] A.C. at p. 626):

> E "It is quite true that in the exercise of the undoubted jurisdiction of the court it may become necessary incidentally to investigate and determine the title to foreign lands; but it does not seem to me to follow that because such a question may incidentally arise and fall to be adjudicated upon, the courts possess, or that it is expedient that they should exercise, jurisdiction to try an action founded on a disputed claim of title to foreign lands."

F By these words I understand him to have meant that it is the action founded on a disputed claim of title to foreign lands over which an English court has no jurisdiction and that where no question of title arises, or only arises as a collateral incident of the trial of other issues there is nothing to exclude the jurisdiction. In the present case I cannot see that the question of title to or right to possession of the land in Chile is raised even incidentally by any defence to the plaintiffs' claim which is set up in the defendants' G affidavits. This being so, I do not think it necessary to discuss the numerous authorities on this first question which were cited to us in the course of the argument. The rule is, I think, so far as the facts here are concerned, correctly formulated by the late Professor DICEY in his rule 53, and there is nothing there to exclude the jurisdiction of the English High Court in the present case.

Counsel for the defendants, as an alternative justification for an order staying the H English action, contended in the words of his summons that the action is, in the circumstances disclosed in the appellants' affidavits, "vexatious, oppressive and an abuse of the process of the court." I agree with the assumption that these are conditions to the grant of a stay, but his evidence, in my opinion, falls short of his proposition. He gave several strong reasons for contending that the Chilean court is a more convenient forum: (i) the contract is in Spanish; (ii) the law of the contract is Chilean as to both interpreta- I tion and performance; (iii) the action is about land in Chile; (iv) the defendant companies though registered in England carry on all their business in Chile; and (v) Chilean lawyers are so scarce in England that expert evidence for the court here will be difficult to obtain. But those grounds go only to convenience; they do not come near to establishing the allegations of the summons. He sought to rely on the considerations summed up in the phrase lis alibi pendens, which have in some cases led to a party who is plaintiff both here and in another jurisdiction in actions against the same defendant and on the same dispute, being put to his election. But here the present plaintiffs are not plaintiffs in the Chile action: they are defendants and the present defendants are the plaintiffs. In such a case the mere fact that the other action is pending raises no presumption to the effect suggested. A

The true rule about a stay under s. 41, so far as relevant to this case, may, I think, be stated thus: (i) A mere balance of convenience is not a sufficient ground for depriving a plaintiff of the advantages of prosecuting his action in an English court if it is otherwise properly brought. The right of access to the King's court must not be lightly refused; (ii) in order to justify a stay two conditions must be satisfied, one positive and B the other negative; (a) the defendant must satisfy the court that the continuance of the action would work an injustice because it would be oppressive, or vexatious to him, or would be an abuse of the powers of the court in some other way, and (b) the stay must not cause an injustice to the plaintiff. On both the burden of proof is on the defendant. These propositions are, I think, consistent with and supported by the following cases: McHenry v. Lewis (3), Peruvian Guano Co., Ltd. v. Bockwoldt (9), Hyman v. Helm (10), C Thornton v. Thornton (11), Logan v. Bank of Scotland (1).

I do not think that the cases upon service out of the jurisdiction, some of which were cited to us, are sufficiently germane to the principles upon which this appeal turns, to call for discussion. Discretion looms larger in that exercise of statutory jurisdiction. Under s. 41 there is little, if any, room for discretion. Decisions on questions of degree often look like, but are not instances of discretion. The decision of the learned judge D in the present case is clearly appealable; none the less I am satisfied it was right. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Divorce—Settlement of wife's property—Children's interests—Matters to be taken into consideration—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49) s. 191 (1).

Section 191 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, which gives the court power to order the settlement, for the benefit of the husband or the children, of property of a wife found guilty of adultery is not penal. It is not intended to be H used as a punishment of a guilty wife, or even of the co-respondent through her. Its object is to restore as nearly as may be the pecuniary status of the parties existing before the marriage was broken up, and where the court is prayed to settle the whole or part of a respondent wife's free property on the children of the marriage, the court will consider, inter alia, the fact that by such settlement she would be debarred from benefiting, as she might otherwise do, any of her children during her I lifetime.

Petition

On the petitioner's prayer a post-nuptial settlement, into which the respondent had brought £11,000, was varied by the registrar so as to secure certain reversionary interests to the children and his decision was accepted by the parties. The respondent, who had also transferred £4,000 to a daughter of the marriage, now had £13,400 capital of her own free from settlements. The petitioner's income from earnings was over £7,000 a year, and his capital over £40,000. The petition for the settlement on the children was rejected.

On this motion the husband, on whose petition the marriage had been dissolved by a decree absolute, dated Feb. 4, 1935, prayed the court to vary the report of the registrar in which he refused to order a settlement of the respondent wife's free property. The material facts are set out in the judgment.

Section 191 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, re-enacting s. 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, provides:

> "(1) If it appears to the court in any case in which the court pronounces a decree for divorce or for judicial separation by reason of the adultery of the wife that the wife is entitled to any property either in possession or reversion, the court may, if it thinks fit, order such settlement as it thinks reasonable to be made of the property, or any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party, and of the children of the marriage or any or either of them."

Evershed, K.C. (with him H. B. Durley Grazebrook), for the petitioner.—The underlying principle with regard to the settlement of a wife's property in pursuance of s. 191 (1), was stated by BUCKNILL, J., in Lorriman v. Lorriman and Clair (3) ([1908] P. at p. 289). The court must look at the probable pecuniary position which the husband, the wife, and the issue of the marriage would have occupied if the marriage had not been dissolved. The same judge cited with approval the observations of LORD PENZANCE in March v. March and Palumbo (1) (L.R. 1 P. & D., at p. 443):

> "It would be of evil example if this court were to decide that the entire fortune of a wealthy married woman was to be reckoned as part of the prospects of an adulterer, or the resources of a second home for a guilty woman."

In the present case the wife has married the co-respondent, and the new husband's business might call for assistance from the respondent. The respondent may be ordered to settle her property on the children, except as to, say, one-quarter or one-third, which might be left at her free disposition. There is only one reported case in which a settlement was refused—namely, that of Schofield v. Schofield and Cowper (4), in which the facts were entirely different. There is no claim here to limit the respondent's life interest in her free property.

In Lorriman v. Lorriman (3) the wife had very much more than the husband. In Bacon v. Bacon and Bacon (5) the husband claimed a settlement on behalf of the children as here, and a settlement was ordered. Midwinter v. Midwinter (6) is a good illustration of the operation of the section.

Bayford, K.C. (with him F. L. C. Hodson) for the respondent.—The registrar was right in submitting that there should be no settlement. Lorriman v. Lorriman (3) does not assist, as there was no marriage settlement in that case. In the present case the original fortune of the respondent was £11,000, which was brought into the marriage settlement. An additional £4,000 has been given by the respondent to the elder daughter. The respondent now has £13,400 free funds. The petitioner's income is about £7,000 a year. In effect the petitioner is now saying that though he wants nothing for himself he wishes to be relieved of the responsibility of settling anything on the children and to put it on his former wife's shoulders. If there had been no divorce the position would have been that the respondent could properly have said that she had made substantial provision for the petitioner and children, and she could not have been expected to settle any more. Nevertheless, she is not likely now to put her children in any different position than before, and she has agreed to the variation of the existing settlements. The court always looks at what a wife has done for her children, and the respondent has expressed her intention as to the children, who have not themselves made any application.

Grazebrook, in reply, referred to Milne v. Milne and Fowler (7).

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31. BUCKNILL, J.—This is a motion to vary the report of the registrar on a petition by the husband petitioner for settlement of the wife respondent's free property. There is also a motion to vary the report of the registrar on a petition by the husband petitioner to vary a post-nuptial settlement on the wife respondent, but the report of the registrar on this petition is accepted by both parties, with one agreed variation as to the appointment of fresh trustees. The variations of the post-nuptial settlement have some bearing on the present motion. The result of these variations is that the children are fairly certain to receive the reversionary interest in the trust funds of the post-nuptial settlement. On the motion before me to vary the report of the registrar on the petition to settle the free property of the respondent there was considerable argument. The registrar reported that no order be made for a settlement of her property. Counsel on behalf of the petitioner asked that this report be varied and that a major portion of the respondent's free property should be vested in trustees on trust, that the respondent should retain the whole of the income therefrom during her life, and that after her death the property should pass to the children of her marriage with the petitioner. The petitioner was willing that the securities should not be touched in order that the respondent should continue to receive the same annual income. The petitioner married the respondent in 1906. There are five children, living issue of the marriage, aged 28, 27, 25, 23, and 19 years respectively. In 1934 the petitioner obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of the adultery of his wife with the co-respondent, and the decree was made absolute in February, 1935. The respondent is now married to the co-respondent. Her age is fifty-two, so that there is no reasonable prospect of issue of her present marriage. At the present time the respondent possesses stocks and shares of the value of about £13,453, which produce a gross income of £531 a year. In addition to this, she has a freehold property worth about £2,000.

Section 191 (1), of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, invests the court in this case with a discretionary power to make such settlement of the respondent's property as it thinks reasonable for the benefit of the petitioner and of the five children of the marriage or any of them. The section is not penal. It is not intended to be used as a punishment of the guilty wife, or even as a punishment, indirectly through her, of the co-respondent. On this aspect of the matter, however, there are some valuable remarks of LORD PENZANCE in March v. March and Palumbo (1) (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 443). If the settlement was asked for merely to deprive the respondent and her present husband of pecuniary benefit by way of punishment, it might be necessary for the court to investigate the circumstances leading up to the adultery, but these circumstances have not been investigated on the motion before me, or before the registrar on the hearing of this petition. Various cases were cited to me which throw light on the principles which should guide the court in exercising its discretion. Consideration of these cases shows that the main question for the court is the nature and extent of the pecuniary prejudice caused to the husband and the children of a marriage by the dissolution of the marriage and the breaking away of the wife with her property from the common home. In considering this question the court has also to bear in mind the financial position of a respondent wife after the dissolution of the marriage, and to weigh it with the similar position of her former husband and her children after the divorce.

With this consideration in view it is necessary now to state the pecuniary status of the present petitioner and the children at the time when the marriage was dissolved. The registrar reports to the court:

> "The husband is an underwriter at Lloyd's. His total annual income as stated by him amounts to about £7,431 gross, taking an average for the last three years. He has securities to the value of £22,150 deposited at Lloyd's. His brokerage firm has a capital of £5,000. He is possessed of other investments of the capital value of about £10,000 and of a freehold house, the value of which he puts at £6,000. His age is fifty-seven."

These figures have not been questioned on behalf of the petitioner. I was informed at the hearing that his life was also insured for £11,000, as stated in his reply.

As regards the children of the marriage, the registrar reports that:

> "The elder daughter is married, and upon her marriage the respondent settled £2,000 upon her. The second daughter is living at home with the petitioner, and is engaged to be married to an officer in the Navy. The eldest son is in the employment of Imperial Airways at Karachi, and is said to be self-supporting. The second son is in the petitioner's business. The youngest son has recently left Rugby."

At the hearing before me I was informed that about two years ago the respondent had given another £2,000 to the elder daughter to purchase a share in a school, making a total of £4,000 in all transferred by the respondent to the eldest child of the marriage.

The respondent's annual income is £881 gross, of which £350 is the proceeds of the funds of the post-nuptial settlement, and £531 is the proceeds of her free property. In other words, it is about one-tenth of the petitioner's total gross income, including his investments and the annual value of his house. The respondent's income is derived from stocks and shares, some of which are first-class securities, while the petitioner's income is mainly earned income. Taking these facts into consideration, I do not consider that the dissolution of the marriage has seriously prejudiced the pecuniary status of the husband and the children. There is no evidence that while the respondent was living at home with the petitioner she contributed anything substantial to the maintenance of the establishment. Her fair share after deduction of income tax after paying for her dress and own personal expenses would be negligible, if in strict proportion to her own and the petitioner's income.

On the hearing before me it was stated on behalf of the petitioner that he did not ask the court to make any order which would cause any loss of income to the respondent during her life. The petitioner did not ask for any benefit for himself out of the respondent's property; all he asked was that a part of the respondent's free property should be so tied up that her children and not someone else, and in particular the co-respondent, should receive it after her death. It was argued that the respondent would almost certainly have left her property to the children if the marriage had not been dissolved. Counsel for the petitioner relied especially on the judgment of BUCKNILL, J., in Lorriman v. Lorriman (3) ([1908] P. at p. 289), a somewhat similar case to this, in which the learned judge said:

> "The underlying principle is that the court must try to ascertain the nature and extent of the pecuniary change by the wife's criminality, and in order to see that it must look at the probable pecuniary position which the husband, the wife, and the issue of the marriage would have occupied if the marriage had not been dissolved."

Reference was also made in that case to Hartopp v. Hartopp (2) ([1899] P. at p. 72), A where SIR GORELL BARNES, in a somewhat similar case, said that the guiding principle was that the court ought to place the petitioner and the children in a position as nearly as circumstances would permit the same as if the family life had not been broken up.

Applying this test, I do not find that before the home was broken up by the respondent's adultery the children received or were likely to receive any substantial pecuniary benefit from their mother. It is true that the elder daughter received £4,000 from her, B but the court is not asked to make any order which would have the effect of giving any present pecuniary benefit to a child of the marriage apart from the value of a reversionary interest in the capital. The children are to receive no benefit while the mother is alive, and the mother may live for many years. As regards the future, there is not sufficient reason for thinking that the respondent will lose her affection for her children. On the other hand, I think it is probable that she will leave the bulk of her free property C to her children if she retains a free hand in the matter. As time goes by, the respondent will probably be in a position to know which of her children is in most need of financial assistance. It may be a serious embarrassment to the respondent if she has to tie up the bulk of her free property now. It is possible that in the future she may wish to give some of her capital to one of her children, if in need of pecuniary assistance, and her power to do this would be taken away in so far as a settlement of her property is now D ordered by the court.

The object of the section is to enable the court, as nearly as may be, to restore to a reasonable degree the pecuniary status of the parties as it was before the dissolution, and therefore it is material to consider that, if the respondent is deprived of all right to dispose of the bulk of her capital now, to that extent she loses the right to benefit during her life any of her children by transferring to him or her part of that capital of which E he or she may be in need. Taking into account the present financial status of the petitioner, the ages and position of the children, and the amount of the free property of the respondent, it does not seem to me, after anxious reflection on the matter, that this is a case in which the court should order a settlement of the respondent's property.

Registrar's report confirmed.

Probate Motion

The applicant moved for a grant of probate of the will, dated May 1, 1935, of James Finn, of Walton, Liverpool, who died on July 5, 1935.

By his will the testator had left his estate, worth about £680, to members of his family. He was illiterate and unable to write, and at the time of his death had been bedridden for over four months. He had asked a local clergyman to prepare his will, and the latter wrote the testator's dictated wishes on a will form and read it over to the testator. The clergyman as a chaplain in North-West India had been accustomed to see illiterate natives execute documents by making a thumb impression. As the testator could not write, the clergyman smeared the testator's thumb with ink, and the testator pressed that thumb on the space usually reserved for the signature. In so doing his thumb slipped, with the result that the mark was smudged. The mark was duly attested.

A brother of the testator, as executor, applied for probate.

H. B. D. Grazebrook, for the applicant.—It is well established that a testator may fulfil the purpose of s. 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, by making his mark. Though there is no reported case of a thumbmark being used for this purpose, it has just as much virtue as a signature as a cross or rubber stamp signature, and both of those have been allowed. The type of mark does not matter so long as the testator's intention is clear. [LANGTON, J.—I see no possibility of identifying this mark as a thumb impression. It is a mere blot.] In the Goods of Bryce (1)—a case heard about two years after the Wills Act, 1837, was passed—it was held that it was unnecessary to place the name of the testator against his mark.

J. E. L. Russell, representing minors, offered no opposition to the proposed grant.

LANGTON, J.—Illiterates were much more common a hundred years ago than nowadays, but if a mark was the only way a testator had of making his signature it came within the meaning of the statute. The thumbmark in the present case is no worse than a cross and I shall admit the will to probate, but the method adopted does not commend itself to me at all.

Company—Minutes—Proof—Entry in "book"—Loose leaves fastened together in two covers—Companies Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 120.

Entries made in a number of loose leaves, fastened together in two covers, purporting to be minutes of directors' meetings of a company, were tendered as evidence in an action.

Held: that the evidence was not admissible as the evidence of minutes entered in books within the meaning of s. 120 of the Companies Act, 1929.

Notes. Companies Act, 1929, is now replaced by s. 145 of the Companies Act, 1948. By s. 436 of that Act a minute book may be a bound book or the minutes may be recorded in any other manner.

As to minutes of meetings, see 6 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 318, 350, and for cases, see 9 DIGEST (Repl.) 548, 549. For Companies Act, 1948, see 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452.

Witness Action

The sole question for the purpose of this report was whether a number of loose leaves fastened together in two covers was admissible as evidence of minutes of a directors' meeting of a company entered in books within the meaning of s. 120 of the Companies' Act, 1929, which provides:

> "(1) Every company shall cause minutes of all proceedings of general meetings, and where there are directors or managers, of all proceedings, at meetings of its directors, or of its managers, to be entered in books kept for that purpose. (2) Any such minute if purporting to be signed by the chairman of the meeting at which the proceedings were had, or by the chairman of the next succeeding meeting, shall be evidence of the proceedings. (3) Where minutes have been made in accordance with the provisions of this section of the proceedings at any general meeting of the company or meeting of the directors or managers, then until the contrary is proved, the meeting shall be deemed to have been duly held and convened, and all proceedings held thereat to have been duly had, and all appointments of directors, managers, or liquidators, shall be deemed to be valid."

Fergus Morton, K.C., Sir George Jones, and Wilcock-Holgate for the plaintiffs.
Gavin Simonds, K.C., B. B. Stenham, and A. S. Wells for the defendants.

BENNETT, J.—Counsel for the plaintiffs seeks to put in evidence against the defendants some minutes of directors' meetings, held on Sept. 1 and 2, which are recorded in what he submits is the minute book of the plaintiff company. He proposes to put the book in without calling any witness to depose to its accuracy or to the fact of the minutes of Sept. 1 and 2 being a true record of what passed at the directors' meetings held on those two dates. There will, therefore, be no witness whom the defendants can cross-examine as to the accuracy of the record. Counsel is entitled to take this course if the thing produced is a "book" within the meaning of s. 120 of the Companies Act, 1929, and if the minutes which he desires to use purport to be signed by the chairman of the meeting at which the proceedings were had or by the chairman of the next succeeding meeting. That which he calls the minute book of the plaintiff company consists of a number of loose leaves fastened together in two covers in such a physical condition that, at any moment, any one wishing to do so can take any number of leaves out and substitute any number of other leaves. It is a thing with which anyone disposed to be dishonest can easily tamper, and the question is whether it is a "book" within the meaning of s. 120 of the Companies Act, 1929. There appears to be no authority on that point.

I propose to hold that it is not, because I consider that it is most undesirable that something from which a part may be taken or into which something else may be put should be used in evidence without the sanction of an oath as to its accuracy and without the party against whom the evidence is to be used being able to test its accuracy by cross-examination. I so hold on the ground that what is tendered in evidence is not a "book" within the meaning of s. 120 of the Companies Act, 1929, and, therefore, I reject the evidence.

PURFLEET URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. MINISTER OF HEALTH & ESSEX COUNTY COUNCIL

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Hailsham, L.C., Lord Blanesburgh, Lord Atkin, Lord Russell and Lord Macmillan), October 22, 24, 1935]

Local Government—Alteration of area—Proposals by county council—Power of Minister to remit for re-consideration on lines suggested by him—Report by council of review of districts—Implication of extension of time by Minister—Local Government Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 7), s. 46 (1).

On June 24, 1932, a county council, having taken the preliminary steps prescribed by s. 46 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929, as to a review of districts within their area, sent to the Minister of Health a report of the review together with proposals as to the changes which they considered desirable. Objections to the proposals were made by, inter alios, the appellant district council, and in November, 1932, a local inquiry was held by an inspector appointed by the Minister. On May 10, 1933, the Minister put forward proposals which, he felt, were so wide-reaching that they could not be given effect to as mere modifications of the county council's proposals. The county council informed the district council that they proposed to adopt the Minister's proposals. The district council objected, but, in January, 1934, after a further inquiry, the Minister confirmed the proposals of the county council based on his proposals of May 10, and made a draft order to that effect.

Held: (i) although there was no specific provision in the statute giving the Minister power to remit to a county council proposals made by them with a request that they should re-consider them, and, if they thought fit, make new proposals on lines suggested by him, on the true construction of the statute there was nothing to prevent his taking that course.

(ii) although the report of the county council was sent to the Minister after April 1, 1932, the date specified by s. 46 (1), that subsection had not prescribed the manner in which the Minister was to allow an extension, and, while it was desirable that where the Minister allowed an extension of the time that should be stated expressly, by dealing with the whole matter as he had done the Minister must be taken impliedly to have granted an extension.

Notes. The Minister concerned is now the Minister of Housing & Local Government. As to subsequent reviews of areas, see Local Government Act, 1933, s. 146, as amended by Local Government Boundary Commission (Dissolution) Act, 1949, Sched., para. 4.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (SCRUTTON, GREER and SLESSER, L.JJ.).

In 1929 the urban district of Purfleet was formed and the council thereof constituted. On March 16, 1931, the Essex County Council, in discharge of their duties under s. 46 B of the Local Government Act, 1929, convened a conference with representatives of the councils of the districts within the county, including representatives of the urban district councils of Purfleet, Grays Thurrock, and Tilbury and the rural district council of Orsett, preliminary to a review by the county council of the circumstances of the districts within the county and a consideration whether it was desirable to effect any changes. After the holding of the conference, the county council completed their review, and on C June 24, 1932, they sent to the Minister of Health a report with their proposals with regard to such changes as they considered desirable. Objections were made to the proposals of the county council by local authorities affected thereby, and on Nov. 16 and 17, a local inquiry was held by an inspector appointed by the Minister. On May 10, 1933, a letter was written by the Minister to the county council, with copies to other bodies affected, containing his decisions with regard to the county council's proposals. D These decisions amounted, it was alleged, to the putting forward of a scheme materially different from the proposals submitted by the county council. The letter also invited the county council to submit supplementary proposals, and the county council submitted those on Oct. 4. These proposals produced a third and entirely different scheme. In November, 1933, a further local inquiry was held. On Dec. 29, 1933, the Minister, by letter to the county council, approved the supplementary proposals, subject to E certain minor modifications, and on Jan. 16, 1934, made a draft order accordingly. Under that order the Purfleet Urban District Council was abolished. On Jan. 29, 1934, the Purfleet Urban District Council were granted a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition directed to the Minister of Health and calling on him to show cause why he should not be prohibited from proceeding to make the order. The grounds put forward for the rule were (i) that the county council, having already made proposals dated June 24, F 1932, relating to the several county districts affected by the supplementary proposals, were functi officio and had no power to make the supplementary proposals, and that those proposals were ultra vires and of no effect and were not proposals within the meaning of s. 46 of the Local Government Act, 1929; (ii) that those proposals were ultra vires and of no effect for the further reason that the county council made them without first holding conferences thereon with representatives of the councils of the G districts affected as required by s. 46 (1); (iii) that the Minister had no jurisdiction to make an order giving effect to those proposals under s. 46 (4). At the same time a rule nisi for certiorari was obtained to quash the decisions of the Minister contained in his letters of May 10, 1933, and Dec. 29, 1933. A rule nisi for mandamus directing the Minister to consider and deal with the proposals made by the county council on June 24, 1932, was also obtained. Copies of those rules were served on the Essex H County Council, the Grays Thurrock Urban District Council, and the Orsett Rural District Council.

The Local Government Act, 1929, provides:

> Section 46: "(1) The council of every county shall as soon as may be after the commencement of this Act, after conferences with representatives of the councils of the several districts wholly or partly within the county, review the circumstances of I all such districts and consider whether it is desirable to effect any of the following changes: (a) any alteration or definition of the boundaries of any such district or of any parish; (b) the union of any such district or parish with another such district or parish; (c) the transfer of any part of such district or parish to another district or parish; (d) the conversion of any such district or any part thereof, if it is a rural district, into an urban district, or if it is an urban district, into or so as to form part of a rural district; (e) the formation of any new district or parish; and shall forthwith after the review is completed as respects the whole or any part of the > county, and before the 1st day of April, 1932, or such later date as the Minister may in any case allow, send to the Minister a report of the review, together with proposals as to the changes, if any, which they consider desirable . . . (3) As soon as any such proposals are made to the Minister, the council making the proposals shall send copies thereof to the councils of the several districts affected thereby and shall publish in one or more newspapers circulating in those districts a notice stating that proposals have been made and that a copy thereof is open to inspection at a specified place, and that representations with respect thereto may be made to the Minister within six weeks after the publication of the notice. (4) The Minister shall consider the proposals and any representations with respect to the proposals, or any of them, which may have been made by any local authorities (including parish councils and parish meetings) or any local government electors affected thereby, and either may make an order giving effect to the proposals, or any of them, with or without modifications, or may refuse to make such an order: Provided that, if an objection with respect to any proposal is made by a local authority affected thereby, and is not withdrawn, the Minister shall not make an order giving effect to the proposal without first holding a local inquiry into the objection. . . ."

> Section 47: "(1) A county council may subsequently whenever they think it desirable, and shall if so required by the Minister, review generally the circumstances of the districts within the county, so, however, that the interval between the original review and the first review under this section, or between any two reviews under this section, shall in no case be less than ten years."

The Court of Appeal held, affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, that under s. 46 (4) of the Act the Minister was entitled to adjourn his decision for a reasonable time in order that he might obtain further information from the interested parties which would enable him to come to a final conclusion as to the right order he ought to make in the matter. The Purfleet Urban District Council appealed.

Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Geoffrey C. Hutchinson for the Essex County Council.

LORD HAILSHAM, L.C.—In my opinion these appeals fail. The questions to be determined arise on the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1929, and more particularly on the provisions of s. 46 of that Act. By s. 46 (1), which begins Part IV of the Act, and is headed: "Rearrangement of county districts," the statute enacts:

> "The council of every county shall as soon as may be after the commencement of this Act, after conferences with representatives of the councils of the several districts wholly or partly within the county, review the circumstances of all such districts and consider whether it is desirable to effect any of the following changes."

The subsection then sets out a number of changes in the boundaries of the various districts and in respect of the combination of various districts one with another, and continues:

> ". . . and shall forthwith after the review is completed as respects the whole or any part of the county, and before the first day of April, 1932, or such later date as the Minister may in any case allow, send to the Minister a report of the review, together with proposals as to the changes, if any, which they consider desirable:—Provided that, before making any such proposals the county council shall consult with the councils of the county boroughs adjoining the county, and the Minister shall give those councils an opportunity of laying before him their views on the proposals made by the county council."

It is provided by sub-s. (3) that as soon as any such proposals are made to the Minister, the council making the proposals shall send copies thereof to the councils of the several districts affected thereby and shall publish a notice with regard to the proposals, and the Minister has then to consider any representations made with regard to them and hold a local inquiry before he overrules an objection. There is a further provision in sub-s. (5) that, if a county council fails to act, the Minister may do so.

Section 47 gives a power to review the circumstances of the districts within the county provided that there must be an interval of at least ten years between the original review and any subsequent review.

In pursuance of the provisions of s. 46, the Essex County Council embarked upon the review of the circumstances of all the districts within the county in order to make the necessary proposals. After making that review and after consulting all the districts affected, the county council, on June 24, 1932, sent to the Minister proposals for altering the boundaries and for uniting certain of the parishes and districts. That date, as your Lordships will observe, was after April 1, 1932, but there is nothing in the material before us to show whether any formal application was made to the Minister to extend the date.

After the receipt of those proposals the Minister held the inquiries provided by the statute, and on May 10, 1933, caused a letter to be written to the county council conveying his decisions. With regard to a great number of the areas, he confirmed with or without modifications the proposals which had been put before him. There was, however, one area on the banks of the Thames with regard to which this dispute arises and with regard to which he was not able to take so definite a course. The area in question comprises a number of urban and rural districts, including the urban district of Purfleet and the rural district of Orsett and a number of urban districts adjacent thereto. With regard to that area, the Minister writes: "On the information before him, the Minister is inclined to think that the best solution lies in the constitution of a new riverside urban district," which he describes, and he then goes on to say: "He does not consider, however, that he could make this alteration as a modification of the present proposals of the county council. The alternatives are either that the county council should submit fresh proposals on these lines, or that, in due course, the Minister should, whether as a result of representations made by a district council or otherwise, consider taking action under s. 46 (5) of the Act."

The substantial effect of the Minister's proposal was that, instead of there being three districts, as was suggested in the original proposal, there should be two districts comprising substantially the same area.

That letter was taken into consideration by the Essex County Council, and they again consulted the areas affected, and communicated, among others, with the Purfleet U.D.C. After re-considering the proposal and the situation, on July 11, 1933, the county council wrote to the Purfleet District Council saying that they were proposing to suggest one large district for the whole of the area concerned. That proposal was objected to by the Purfleet District Council. Another inquiry was held in order to consider whether or not the Minister should confirm it, and ultimately on Dec. 29, 1933, the Minister intimated his decision that he would confirm the proposal of the Essex County Council and create only one area, and in January, 1934, a draft order was prepared in order to give effect to that decision.

The Purfleet U.D.C. challenge what has been done, and are asking for writs of certiorari, prohibition and mandamus to prevent effect being given to the so-called decision of the Minister. A number of points were taken on behalf of the Purfleet U.D.C. The case was heard in the Divisional Court, and the rules nisi for the writs were discharged. Appeals were lodged against that decision of the Divisional Court and were dismissed by the Court of Appeal, and from that decision the Purfleet U.D.C. appeal to this House.

The substantial complaint which is made, as I apprehend the argument on behalf of the appellants, is this. It is said that, on the true construction of s. 46, when proposals are received by the Minister he has three things and three things only which he can do —he can accept and confirm them, he can reject them, or he can accept them with modifications, but it is said that he cannot send any of the proposals back to the county council and ask them to submit fresh proposals. It is not disputed that the course which the Minister took was a reasonable and businesslike course to adopt, and one which gave to all the parties concerned every opportunity of being heard and of making their case before the Minister before the final order was made, but it is said, and said truly, that, unless there is power in the Minister to do what he did, it does not matter whether the course he took was convenient or not. It was not in accordance with his statutory jurisdiction.

It seems to me that the mistake which underlies the whole argument advanced on behalf of the appellants is the assumption that, unless you can find in the words of the section an express provision that the Minister can do what he has done here, you are to assume that it is outside his powers. I do not so construe the statute. It seems to me that what the statute in effect does is to provide that proposals are to be put forward by the county council, that after they have been fully examined and considered by the persons affected and after an inquiry has been held the Minister has to make up his mind about them, but there is nothing to prevent the Minister before he reaches a decision from asking the county council to re-consider, in the light of the later information which has been brought forward, their original proposals and to submit such modified or altered proposals as they think more suitable in all the circumstances. That is, in effect, what the Minister did here.

I express no opinion whether or not the Minister could, had he chosen, have made the order which he proposes to make as a modification of the original proposal. I assume, without deciding, that the Minister was right in thinking that the changes in the original proposals were so drastic that they could not fairly be treated as modifications, but I do not think that it in the least follows that because he did not feel that they amounted to a modification of the proposals, therefore, he was bound not only to reject the proposals, but in consequence to confirm a state of affairs which both he and the county council agreed was an undesirable one, and merely to continue the existing boundaries for a period of not less than ten years.

It was said that the proposals of the county council were out of time because they were delivered long after April 1, 1932, and there was no express extension of time by the Minister. In my judgment, the provision in s. 46 (1) that the proposals are to be completed cannot be construed, as was contended by the appellants, as meaning that there must be a formal order by the Minister extending the time before any proposals are submitted. I do not think that any such formality is required. I think it is for the Minister, when any proposals are submitted after April 1, 1932, to extend or to refuse to extend the time as in his discretion he may see fit to do. In the present case the original proposals were presented nearly three months beyond the original date, and when the Minister wrote on May 10, 1933, inviting the county council to submit fresh proposals with regard to this district, he was, in my judgment, in effect extending the time for that purpose.

> "before the first day of April, 1932, or such later date as the Minister may in any case allow,"

It was said in the argument that since he only invited fresh proposals on the lines contained in his letter he was only extending the time for the purpose of the submission of a proposal on those lines, and that the proposal actually submitted was one of a different kind. I do not so read the correspondence. I think that the effect of the Minister's letter of May 10 was to say that, in the light of the information which he had acquired by virtue of the public inquiry, the original proposals did not seem to him satisfactory, that it seemed to him at the moment that a fresh proposal with regard to that particular district ought to be submitted, and that as then advised he thought the lines of the fresh proposal should be that two districts should be constituted instead of three. But I do not think that he intended by so saying to fetter the county council in their submission or to prevent their submitting what proposals they thought were best with regard to this particular district. It may also be pointed out that in fact when they did submit the revised proposal the Minister accepted it, and after inquiry proposes to act upon it, and that, too, might fairly be treated as an extension of the time necessary for the proposal.

I think the real answer to the point made by the appellants is that they are proceeding on a wrong basis when they say that you have to find in the section power to deal with the matter in this particular way, and I think that the courts below were right in saying that the real effect of the statute was to impose upon the county council in the first instance the duty of preparing proposals, and to impose upon the Minister the duty of considering those proposals and finally of making an order, but there is nothing to prevent him in the course of that consideration from asking a county council to make some alteration in regard to some area within their jurisdiction, or from considering and either rejecting or confirming that proposal when it was made.

A subsidiary point was made that there was no provision in the statute for a second review and that it is a condition precedent for the holding of a review that there must be a preliminary conference. The answer to those arguments is that what the county council did on the second occasion was, not to hold a second review, but to re-consider the proposals which had been put forward, so far as this district is concerned, in the light of the facts which they had already ascertained in the conference which they had already had.

On these grounds, which are substantially the same as those which appear in the judgments below, it seems to me that the orders made were correct and that these appeals should be dismissed with costs; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD BLANESBURGH.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD ATKIN.—I entirely agree with the reasons which have been given by the LORD CHANCELLOR and with the motion which he has proposed. I should merely wish to add these words. I am not myself completely satisfied with the reason which is suggested, at any rate in some of the judgments, that all that the Minister did in this case was to adjourn consideration of the proposals with a view to getting further information. I have no doubt that he has that power, and indeed in respect of another district he exercised it, but it appears to me that he did something much more than that in this case—that he was not merely desirous of getting further information, but that he did desire that the county council should in fact re-consider their proposals and make fresh proposals. I wish to affirm my opinion—which I know was that expressed by the noble and learned viscount on the Woolsack—that the county council are perfectly entitled to do such a thing. It would be most lamentable if they could not, because otherwise the whole object of these provisions would often be defeated.

The scheme of the Act is to give the initiative in the first place to the county council, and the Minister has himself no power of initiating changes at all, save in so far as they are modifications of something proposed by the county council, except in the special case dealt with by sub-s. (5), where the county council have refused to make any proposal at all. It seems to me obvious that there must be cases where the result of the decision of the Minister on some of the proposals may seriously affect the rest of the proposals upon which he has not finally made up his mind, and it is quite right and proper that the Minister should—indeed it would, in my judgment, make the scheme unworkable if he could not—re-submit the remaining proposals to the county council for them to re-consider in the light of the decisions at which the Minister has already arrived.

But quite apart from the question being affected by former decisions, it seems to me that it is within the ordinary scope of the powers of anybody who is asked to assent to and approve of a proposal to say:

> "In the present form I am doubtful whether I could accept it, I think some changes ought to be made. You are the authority for eventually deciding what changes shall be made, and I ask you to consider whether or not you can make a revised proposal."

The county council are not in the least bound to accept the suggestion made by the Minister, and in fact in this case they did not accept his suggestion, but made another, and what eventually turned out to be a better, suggestion, because it was approved by the Minister. That appears to me to be well within their powers.

I entirely agree with what was said by the LORD CHANCELLOR on the question of review. There seems to me to be no question here of a second review of the circumstances. That was not necessary. That had been held with the necessary conferences, and this was merely a question of making further proposals. It appears to me that the county council acted entirely within their powers. And be it remembered that there is no grievance that can be suggested by anybody in respect of it, because all the formalities were gone through in respect of these new proposals which would have been gone through originally if these had been the original proposals made by the county council and they had been in the first place accepted by the Minister.

In these circumstances, it appears to me that the Minister has acted well within his powers and that there is no reason for granting any of the writs asked for.

LORD RUSSELL.—I find myself in complete agreement with the views expressed both by the LORD CHANCELLOR and by my noble and learned friend LORD ATKIN, and I concur in the motion proposed that these appeals be dismissed.

LORD MACMILLAN.—In concurring, as I do, in the judgment which your Lordships propose to adopt, I should like to associate myself with what my noble and learned friend LORD ATKIN has said in pointing out that the decision of this House is not to be taken as depending, as the judgments in the courts below appear to have to some extent depended, upon minimising the nature of the steps which were taken by the Minister. It is consolatory—if any consolation be needed—that the substance of the law has been complied with in the proceedings which are now challenged. The proposals which have been dealt with by the Minister are proposals of the county council, which is the proper body to promote proposals. An opportunity has been given to the local authorities affected to object, and an inquiry has been held into the whole question at which both the promoters (the county council) and the objectors (the various local authorities concerned) have been heard. Therefore, the requirements of the statute, which are designed to ensure that no order shall be made until all parties have been heard and full investigation has been made, have in this case been satisfied. The objections which have been taken, and which have been placed before your Lordships so clearly by counsel for the appellants, are objections to the procedure. It is said that the procedure prescribed by the statute has not been precisely followed. I hope I have appreciated the criticisms which counsel has made, and, while I think they are criticisms of some importance, I am not satisfied that any of them go to the substance of what the statute has prescribed, and, in my opinion, none of them is of such a character as to justify your Lordships in interfering with what has been done.

On one of the matters, namely, the question of date, s. 46 of the Act, in sub-s. (1), requires that proposals should be brought forward "before the first day of April, 1932, or such later date as the Minister may in any case allow." The statute has not prescribed the manner in which the Minister is to allow an extension of time, and I think that in this case the Minister of Health must be assumed to have in effect allowed an extension of time. I am bound to say, for my own part, however, that when a statute prescribes that something is to be done by a specified date or a later date if allowed, the proper course, when it is done by a later date, is to draw attention to the fact that it is a belated proceeding, and that the statute has been considered and the allowance of time has been given. In the present case I am sure that the prescribed date, April 1, 1932, must have been fully in the minds of the Minister and those advising him, and that they must have been well aware that what had taken place had taken place subsequently to that date. I, therefore, think that in effect he must be taken to have granted an extension of time, but I think it would be preferable that in such a case the matter should be dealt with expressly rather than left to implication so as to give rise to arguments such as have been submitted to your Lordships to-day.

With those observations I concur in the motion about to be put from the Woolsack.

Appeal dismissed.

Justices—Husband and wife—Desertion—Constructive desertion—Charge against husband of perverse practices—Need of corroboration.

The substance of a wife's case in support of her summons for a maintenance order on the ground of her husband's desertion was that he had been guilty of an abnormal sexual practice which had adversely affected her health and compelled her to leave him. The magistrates found that the wife's evidence as to the alleged perverse acts of the husband was not corroborated and they dismissed the summons.

Held: the court demanded that when a matrimonial offence was alleged the evidence of the spouse making the charge should, if possible, be corroborated, and not least with regard to such matters as those raised in the present case in relation to which one spouse would be so easily at the mercy of the other since the acts alleged by their nature must happen in private, but the necessity for corroboration was not an absolute matter of law; magistrates should direct themselves, just as a judge should direct a jury, that it was safer to have corroboration, but when the warning had been given, and in the fullest form, there was no rule of law to prevent the tribunal from finding the matter proved in the absence of corroboration; the magistrates in the present case were right in directing themselves that they ought to be very careful not to find the equivalent of cruelty for the purposes of constructive desertion unless they could see some corroboration of the wife's evidence; and, with full consideration of what the real points were, they had rightly come to the conclusion that the wife had not made out a case of desertion.

Appeal from an order made by the Leicester city justices, dismissing a wife's summons for a maintenance order issued on the ground of desertion.

The wife issued her summons on Aug. 1, 1934. At the hearing she said that her real cause of complaint was a perverted sexual practice by her husband. At the beginning of 1934 she went to hospital for nervous debility, and returned home in February. On July 15, 1934, she and her husband had words and he struck her and told her to clear out; she then left him. A doctor who had sent the wife to hospital said that she had made a certain complaint to him, and there was a marked improvement in her condition while she was away from her husband. Another witness gave evidence of the assault in July, 1934. The husband denied the charges of perverted sexual practices, and said that his wife left him because she wanted to go to her mother. The summons was dismissed.

The wife appealed on the grounds that the decision was against the weight of evidence, and that the magistrates were wrong in holding that her evidence had necessarily to be corroborated to enable them to find in her favour.

F. L. C. Hodson for the wife.

Talbot Dyer for the husband.

SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P.—This appeal raises a very difficult point, but I have come to the conclusion that it ought to be dismissed. The summons was for desertion, and for nothing else. In fact, the wife left the home. It was, therefore, necessary for her to show that it was the husband's conduct which had driven her out and thus to make him guilty of what is sometimes called constructive desertion. In attempting to show that it was the husband's conduct which had driven her out she relied on two things. The first I can dismiss in a sentence. She says that at the moment when she left her home her husband told her to clear out and offered physical violence. Of course, it would plainly have been open to the magistrates, if they thought that that was the real cause of her leaving, to dispose of the matter then and there upon that ground, but it is perfectly obvious from the form which their judgment took that they paid very little attention, as matter of weight of evidence, to that part of the case, and probably for the reason that the wife herself said that the real cause of complaint was that over a considerable time her husband had been guilty of unclean practices with her. It is obvious that on proper evidence it would be fully open to the magistrates to hold that such treatment would justify the wife in leaving the husband, and, indeed, would justify them in finding substantive cruelty, if such were charged, provided in the latter case, at any rate, that it was coupled with evidence that the health of the wife suffered therefrom. But, as the substance of the matter, though not the actual form of the charge, was that it was perverse acts of this sort which are said to be the cruelty of the husband which had driven her away, I think that the magistrates should look for some corroboration on the part of the wife.

The court demands that when a matrimonial offence, whatever it is, is charged, the evidence of the spouse making the charge should, if possible, be corroborated and not least with regard to matters of this sort about which, if there was not a reasonably strict rule in this respect, one spouse would be so easily at the mercy of the other in relation to things which in their nature must happen in private. But when that has been said it is admitted that the necessity for corroboration is not an absolute matter of law. Magistrates should direct themselves, just as a judge should direct a jury, that it is safer to have corroboration, but when the warning has been given, and given in the fullest form, then there is no rule of law which prevents the tribunal from finding the matter proved in the absence of corroboration.

In this case at first sight, the reasons for the magistrates' decision do look as if they had said that corroboration was required as a matter of law, but on a very full consideration of the note and the arguments on both sides I have come to the conclusion that that is not what they meant. The magistrates found that the evidence of the wife as to the alleged perverse acts of the husband was not corroborated and, therefore, that they were not satisfied that the conduct of the husband compelled the wife to leave him so as to constitute desertion. The proposition up to which they were leading is: Are we satisfied, or are we not satisfied, that it was the conduct of the husband that compelled the wife to leave him so as to constitute desertion by him? They must be assumed —because she herself paid very little attention to it—to have considered and discounted the evidence of physical violence and to have realised correctly that the case depended entirely on the question of these alleged perverse acts. It is true that, strictly speaking, Statham v. Statham (1) is no direct authority for this case, but, once it is conceded that some corroboration should be looked for, whatever is the form of cruelty alleged, the reasoning underlying the judgment in Statham v. Statham (1) applies very strongly to this class of case, though the decision itself does not directly apply. The line of reasoning which is implied throughout the whole of the judgments of Greer and Russell, L.JJ., is this: To show that the conduct complained of can only have happened, primâ facie, with the assent of the wife, one ought really to look for some corroboration, or, alternatively, she ought not to be able to make it a matter of complaint, or to come to the court to complain of something to which she herself has consented. Whichever way the thing is put, it is plain that the closest scrutiny ought to be given by magistrates to an allegation of cruelty which is based upon acts of this sort, which in turn cannot have occurred without at least the assent of the wife. In that state of things I think that the magistrates were perfectly right in directing themselves, before they were prepared on such material as they had before them to find cruelty constituting constructive desertion, that they ought to be very careful not to find it unless they could see some corroboration, not merely that certain things occurred, but that those things gave rise to a legitimate matrimonial complaint.

I do not think there was such corroboration. The only thing apart from the physical violence, with which I have already dealt, which can be said, in my opinion, to be corroboration of the wife's evidence is the doctor's evidence. The doctor, undoubtedly, does prove that when she was away from her husband she was better than when she was with him, and he also proved that some complaint, which is entirely undefined, was made, and that her nervous condition at the time when that was made was consistent with the nature of the complaint. That certainly is evidence which provides a necessary step in proving the allegation of cruelty in so far as this case depends on cruelty generally, but as corroboration of the wife's evidence that the husband was guilty of the grosser sort of conduct, in my opinion, it comes nowhere near corroboration. I am not going to discuss now the interesting question whether or not a statement made to the doctor that the husband had done this, that, or the other would have been admissible as corroboration. It is sufficient to say in this case that no such evidence was tendered or given. We are told nothing whatever about what the nature of the complaint was, and, therefore, though the doctor's evidence is relevant on the question of health and injury to health, it is no evidence whatever implicating the husband in relation to the alleged gross acts. Therefore, if corroboration was necessary, I think the magistrates were right in saying that there was none. They do not in fact found their judgment on what I think is the even stronger alternative ground, that there is no real evidence that it was this sort of conduct which so affected the wife as to drive her from home. Although I admit, as I have already said, that at first sight their judgment may appear to contain a misdirection of themselves, I am satisfied that in substance they have not misdirected themselves at all. I think they approached this case with full consideration of what the real points were, and, having heard both the husband and the wife, they came to the conclusion, as I think rightly, that the wife had not made out a case that the husband had deserted her.

BUCKNILL, J.—I agree. If I construed this decision of the magistrates as meaning that they thought they were bound to dismiss the summons because there was no corroboration, I should certainly think that the case should be remitted to them, but I do not read it in such a way, for two reasons. First of all they refer to Statham v. Statham (1). I presume that they or the clerk were well acquainted with the reasoning in that case, and, so far as I read it, I cannot find anywhere in the judgments of the lords justices that there is a legal or statutory necessity for corroboration, even in the case of sodomy, and so far as the other sexual acts which are referred to there, I do not think the matter of corroboration is even referred to. Secondly, the magistrates say that they are not satisfied that the conduct of the husband compelled the wife to leave him. If they dismissed this summons because they felt that they were bound to dismiss it as a matter of law for want of corroboration, I do not think they would have used the word "satisfied." In my view, they weighed all the evidence, they saw the two witnesses—the husband and the wife—and they came to the conclusion that it would be unsafe in the absence of corroboration to find that these acts had been committed. For these reasons I agree with the President that this appeal should be dismissed.

Official Secrets—False information—Furnished by user of accommodation address—Liability to conviction—Official Secrets Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 75), s. 5 (4).

The offence of furnishing false information, contrary to s. 5 (4) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920, may be committed by a person using an accommodation address, and the subsection is not confined in its ambit to offences committed by persons carrying on the business of receiving for reward letters at such addresses.

Notes. As to offences under the Official Secrets Acts, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 604 et seq., and for cases, see 15 DIGEST (Repl.) 805; 37 Digest 376. For Official Secrets Act, 1920, see 5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1046.

Case Stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was preferred at Bow-street magistrate's court by Leonard Stevenson, a police officer (hereinafter called the appellant), against Albert Raymond Clarence Fulton (hereinafter called the respondent), charging that the respondent, on July 5, 1934, gave false information to the keeper of an accommodation address registered for the receipt of letters, contrary to s. 5 (4) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920.

At the hearing it was proved or admitted that on July 5, 1934, the respondent called at 57, St. Martin's-court, W.C.2, an accommodation address registered for the receipt of letters under s. 5 (1) of the Act, and asked that letters might be received there on his behalf. On being asked by the proprietor of the business to write his name and address in the register kept for that purpose, he wrote the words "Norman Blake, 46, Windermere-road, Southall." There was no such number as 46, Windermere-road, Southall. On Sept. 28, 1934, and Nov. 8, 1934, the respondent called at Rays Agency, in Cecil-court, Charing Cross-road, and filled in a form for an advertisement in the Daily Telegraph, giving, in each case, a false name and address. The advertisement appeared in the Daily Telegraph on Nov. 9, 1934, and forty or fifty replies were received. On Nov. 22, 1934, the appellant, who was keeping observation near 37, St. Martin's-court, saw the respondent leave number 37 and asked him: "At what address are you living?" The respondent's answer was: "At 71, Delaware-mansions, Maida Vale." In fact, the respondent had lived at that address for the past two years.

The question at issue was whether s. 5 (4) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920, applied only to keepers of accommodation addresses for the receipt of postal packets or also to a person giving false information to such a keeper. On the part of the appellant it was contended that the words of the subsection were wide enough to include any person giving false information to the keeper of such a business. On the part of the respondent it was contended, in view of the fact that the marginal note to s. 5 is: "Registration and regulation of persons carrying on the business of receiving postal packets," and that sub-ss. (1), (2), and (3) dealt exclusively with the duties of persons carrying on the business of receiving postal packets and chief officers of police and in no way regulated the conduct of persons who used any such business by having their correspondence addressed thereto, that the marginal note referred to the whole of the section and that sub-s. (4) could only apply to persons carrying on any such business.

The magistrate held that the opening words of s. 5 (4), "fails to comply with any of the provisions of this section," were inappropriate to the imposition of a penalty except on one of the class specified in sub-ss. (1) and (2), i.e., accommodation address keepers, and that the succeeding words in sub-s. (4), "furnishes any false information or makes any false entry," being unaccompanied by any words as to whom the information should be given, and about what, were not sufficiently precise to justify the imposition of a penalty on any member of the public under an Act, which appeared to contemplate offences committed by a particular class only. He, accordingly, dismissed the information.

The appellant appealed to the Divisional Court. A

By s. 5 (1) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920:

> "Every person who carries on . . . the business of receiving for reward letters, telegrams, or other postal packets for delivery or forwarding to the persons for whom they are intended, shall as soon as may be send to the chief officer of police for the district, for registration by him, notice of the fact together with the address or addresses where the business is carried on, and the chief officer of police shall keep a register of the names and addresses of such persons. . . ." B

Sub-s. (2): "Every person who carries on such a business as aforesaid shall cause to be entered in a book kept for the purpose the following particulars: (a) the name and address of every person for whom any postal packet is received, or who has requested that postal packets received may be delivered or forwarded to him . . . and shall not deliver a letter to any person until that person has signed a receipt for the same in such book as aforesaid. . . ." C

Sub-s. (3): "The books so kept and all postal packets received by a person carrying on any such business, and any instruction as to the delivery or forwarding of postal packets received by any such person, shall be kept at all reasonable times open to inspection by any police constable." D

Sub-s. (4): "If any person contravenes or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this section, or furnishes any false information or makes any false entry, he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act. . . ."

By s. 7: "Any person who attempts to commit any offence under . . . this Act, or solicits or incites or endeavours to persuade another person to commit an offence, or aids or abets and does any act preparatory to the commission of an offence under . . . this Act, shall . . . be liable to the same punishment, and to be proceeded against in the same manner, as if he had committed the offence." E

L. A. Byrne for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a Case stated by one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, and it raises a somewhat interesting point. The question is whether the words in s. 5 (4) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920: "or furnishes any false information" are wide enough to cover the act of a person who, in order to make use of what is called an accommodation address, gives to the person carrying on that business false information as to his actual name and address. F

On various occasions the respondent gave false names and addresses to be registered in order that he might afterwards collect letters or postal packets, concealing his own identity. It is said by the magistrate that, in his opinion, to bring such a person within the net of furnishing any false information within the meaning of s. 5 (4), would be to give an unduly wide interpretation to that subsection. He was of the opinion that the Act of Parliament contemplated offences committed only by a particular class—that is to say, by the keepers, as distinguished from the mere users, of accommodation addresses. With all due respect to the magistrate, I cannot help thinking that he has taken too narrow a view. He seems to have been misled to some extent by the words of the marginal note: "Registration and regulation of persons carrying on the business of receiving postal packets." G H

That marginal note, however, is no more than a label, which shows the subject-matter that is being dealt with in the section, and, if one looks at the scheme of the section, I think that it is tolerably plain that the magistrate came to a wrong conclusion. Sub-s. (1) of the section begins with the expression: I

> "Every person who carries on . . . the business, &c., &c."

Sub-s. (2) begins with the expression:

> "Every person who carries on such a business as aforesaid, &c."

In the course of those two subsections and in the words which follow other persons are mentioned, and in particular

> "every person for whom any postal packet is received, or who has requested that postal packets received may be delivered or forwarded to him."

It is after the section has used those expressions that sub-s. (4) provides, inter alia, that if any person furnishes false information he shall be guilty of an offence. That must mean not every person who carries on such a business, but any person who furnishes false information with reference to the matters therein treated.

I think that the view which the magistrate has so well expressed fails to give sufficient effect to what seems to me to be the clear antithesis between the expression "every person who carries on such a business" and the expression "any person," especially as those words "any person" follow an enumeration of persons including others than the person carrying on the business.

It was argued by counsel for the respondent that, if the magistrate's view is correct, it does not follow that a person who by falsehood is able to conceal his identity when he is seeking the accommodation here being described would go scot free. It was said that by a proper interpretation of at least one other section in this Act he might be rendered liable. I am not sure of that, and I decide nothing about it. Least of all is it necessary to decide whether a person who makes a false entry in his book must, if he is to be guilty of an offence, make it with knowledge of falsity. It may be that some day that question will have to be considered, but I do not think it arises to-day. It seems to me that, upon the plain words of this subsection, accentuated by contrast with other words appearing in the other subsections of the section, the respondent does come within the mischief which is covered by the Act. He furnished false information of the most vital and fundamental character, because all the inquiries which this section is intended to facilitate would be rendered nugatory if, although a register proper in form were kept, the register consisted in fact not of true names and addresses, but of names and addresses deliberately falsified.

With all due respect to the magistrate, who has evidently considered this matter with great care, I think that his conclusion on the point of law was wrong, and that the words "furnishes any false information" are wide enough, and at the same time precise enough, in this context, to cover the offence which was charged. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed and the case will go back to the magistrate with a direction that the offence which was charged was proved. I have deliberately refrained from entering into some other matters which are of interest, but which do not appear to me to be necessary to the decision of this case.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I also think that the magistrate was wrong in the view which he took of the words "furnishes any false information," in s. 5 (4) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920, on the ground advanced by Mr. Griffith-Jones, that there is no good reason why those plain words should not be given their plain meaning in the construction of this subsection.

Counsel for the respondent says:

> "I admit that, if the result of my argument is that the legislature has not provided any penalty for the person who is the fons et origo of the trouble created by the giving and recording of false particulars with regard to the keepers of accommodation addresses and the persons who use them, my argument must fail, but the legislature must be taken not to have intended, in using the words 'any person who furnishes any false information,' to deal with anyone except the keeper of an accommodation address, because it has dealt elsewhere with the person who gives false information to the keeper of an accommodation address and thereby causes something to be done which will eventually result in false information being given to a police officer, who has the right to inspect the books under s. 5 (3)."

His argument amounts to this, that the person who gives false information about himself—that is to say, a false name and address—makes a false entry in the book. He says that person makes a false entry because he intentionally causes a false entry to be made, and those are the appropriate words, he says, which deal with the person who gives false information.

It seems to me to be a very elaborate method of dealing with such a person, who clearly and ex concessis must have been intended to be dealt with by Parliament. I respectfully agree with my Lord that it is not necessary to decide in this case whether it is or is not possible to deal in some other way with a person who gives false information, but, however that may be, I myself cannot think that that is a good reason for attributing any other than their ordinary meaning to these perfectly simple words.

In my view, the plain meaning of s. 5 is this. Sub-s. (1) requires of the person who keeps an accommodation address particulars of himself and his business. Sub-ss. (2) and (3) require that such a person shall enter particulars as to the persons who use his business premises, and in sub-s. (4), which is the only part of this section dealing with penalty, I think that each of those classes of persons is dealt with in quite appropriate language. While it is quite true the first words,

> "If any person contravenes or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this section," deal only with a person who carries on the business, in my view, the next words

> "or furnishes any false information" are intended to be and certainly are wide enough to bring into the ambit of the subsection the person who does that which the respondent has admittedly done—that is to say, gives false information with regard to the matters dealt with by this section.

For those reasons I agree with the judgment of my Lord and I think that this case ought to go back to the magistrate with the intimation that he has taken a wrong view of the law, and that on the facts stated by him the respondent should have been found to have committed the offence charged against him.

SINGLETON, J.—I agree that on the facts as stated the offence charged under s. 5 (4) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920, was committed.

Appeal allowed.

Easement—Light—Obstruction—Question of fact—Sufficiency of light—Test—Relevance of locality—Desirability of calling in court expert—R.S.C., Ord. 37A, r. 1.

Whether the privation of light is sufficient to render the occupation of premises uncomfortable and less beneficial than it has formerly been is a question of fact to which persons who have to determine it must apply the sort of reasoning which would be applied by a jury.

In all cases relating to nuisance the question of locality must be taken into consideration, but in cases of nuisance by obstruction of light the question of locality is much less important than in cases relating to other nuisances. In deciding whether a supply of light is sufficient for the ordinary occupations of life, domestic or concerning business, the test to be applied is, not the precise amount which neighbouring premises have got, but what a reasonable person would expect. Such a person would not expect, e.g., as much light in a town as he would get in the country.

Observation of Maugham, L.J., on the desirability of calling in a court expert to inquire and report to the court on any question of fact under R.S.C., Ord. 37A in cases relating to obstruction of light.

Injunction—Easement—Interference—Where damages awarded in lieu of injunction.

In Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. (1), [1895] 1 Ch. 287, at p. 322, A. L. Smith, L.J., said that it might be stated as a good working rule that if, in a case of nuisance, the injury to the plaintiff's rights was small and was one which was capable of being estimated in money, and could be adequately compensated by a small money payment, and the case was one in which it would be oppressive to the defendant to grant an injunction, damages might be given in substitution for an injunction.

While the court will grant damages in lieu of an injunction where those four conditions are satisfied, it will not necessarily grant an injunction in a case in which those conditions do not prevail. In every case, even though the conditions laid down by A. L. Smith, L.J., are not to be found, the court has a discretion, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, which it can exercise in the matter.

In the present case, there being really a question whether the obstruction of light by the defendants was legal or not, and the defendants not having acted unfairly or in an unneighbourly spirit, and the plaintiff's conduct in limiting his earlier complaints to one part of the building in erection by the defendants as distinct from the whole building of which he complained later being such as to render it unjust that he should receive more than pecuniary relief,

Held: the case was one for an award of damages and not an injunction.

Appeal from an order of CROSSMAN, J.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of CROSSMAN, J.:

The claim the plaintiff makes in this action is for an injunction restraining the defendants their officers agents servants and workmen from erecting or continuing to erect any buildings in or near Chesterfield Gardens in the city of Westminster, so as to cause a nuisance or illegal obstruction to the plaintiff's ancient lights in No. 8, Chesterfield-gardens, as the same existed before the pulling down by the defendants of the buildings known as Chesterfield House in the city of Westminster. That, I think, is the ordinary form in which an injunction is framed for interference with ancient lights by reason of putting up one building in substitution for another. The plaintiff further asks for a mandatory order on the defendants "to pull down and remove so much of the new building erected by them in or near Chesterfield-gardens as causes such a nuisance obstruction or interference as aforesaid." E F

The plaintiff is the leaseholder of No. 8, Chesterfield-gardens, and he holds the property under a lease of Dec. 24, 1930, by which the property was demised to him for a period of thirty-five years from Christmas, 1930, at a rent of £1,500 a year. There was no premium paid for the lease, but he enters into a strict repairing covenant and he also covenants that he will submit to the lessor's surveyor provisional plans and specifications of the works proposed to be done in adapting the premises as flats or servants' quarters, and there is a provision that upon the completion of the works to the satisfaction of the lessor or his surveyor at a cost of approximately £5,000, the lessor will pay to the lessee the sum of £750 towards the cost thereof. The lease is determinable by the lessee at the end of the twenty-first or the twenty-eighth years of the term, so that at the present moment he has got this property on his hands for a period of at least twenty-one years from Christmas, 1930, and has to pay a rent of £1,500 a year for it. Chesterfield-gardens is a cul-de-sac running north from Curzon-street, Mayfair, in London, and the plaintiff's house is the northernmost house on the east side of Chesterfield-gardens. The whole of the west side of the street was formerly occupied by Chesterfield House. The defendants have recently demolished Chesterfield House, and they are in course of erecting, and it is not disputed that they propose to erect, subject to their being restrained by the court, on the site of Chesterfield House, a large building considerably higher than Chesterfield House which formerly stood there. I think it is admitted, that the northernmost part of Chesterfield House opposite to the plaintiff's house was 55 ft. from the plantiff's house and that it was 34 ft. to 47 ft. high—in fact, I understand, it was the stables of Chesterfield House, and was a great deal lower than the rest of the premises. The rest of Chesterfield House was 104 ft. from the plaintiff's house, and was 47 ft. to 69 ft. high. What the defendants are proposing to do is to erect a building, in fact it is a projecting wing, which is 26 ft. 6 in. G H I

A wide, and which projects 32 ft. 6 in. forward on the northernmost part of the site, 59 ft. from the plaintiff's house, and to a height of 80 ft. On the rest of the site of Chesterfield House they are erecting a building which will be 97 ft. high approximately, at a distance of roughly 92 ft. from the plaintiff's house. The defendants have already put up eight storeys of ironwork, and three storeys have got their floors put in, and one storey, I think, has the front already filled in.

B In the plaintiff's house, the plaintiff lives himself in a flat on the ground floor, and he tells me in evidence that in the last few weeks, he has had to use artificial light to eat his lunch, though formerly he could do so by daylight. He also tells me that he now has to turn on the light in his room on the ground floor on the south side of the house an hour earlier in the afternoon than he did when Chesterfield House was standing. He also tells me that in the room on the other side on the ground floor, which is in fact C occupied by the Chesterfield Salon Club, Ltd., as his tenant, and is known as the Chesterfield Salon, the darkness has become very noticeable during the last few weeks. He also tells me that the entrance hall, which lies between these two rooms, has been darkened during the same period, and that in the first floor south room, that is to say, the room immediately over the room in which he lives himself, there is a "sort of darkening," which is the phrase that he used. The other person who has lived in the house and who D has given evidence before me, is the plaintiff's manager, Mr. Harold Grainger, who lives in the north room in the basement of the house, that is to say. He and his wife use that as a bed-sitting room, and it is also where he does his office work in connection with the management of the house, the rest of the house being let in flats. Mr. Grainger tells me that in the last few weeks, that is to say, with the defendants' building only gone up to its present extent, which is three storeys only with floors put in and one E storey only with the front put in—in his basement room he cannot write at his desk without artificial light, though he could do so before, and that the room was formerly very well lit. In fact he describes it, in his view, I think, as one of the best basements in London, as it was in its former state. He also tells me that he requires artificial light at the west end of the room, that is to say, the part of the room furthest away from the window, and that when he is sitting by the fireplace, he cannot use that part F of the room without artificial light. With regard to the room on the south side of the basement, which is occupied as a dormitory by the plaintiff's staff of servants, Mr. Grainger says that during the last few weeks that the building has gone up, there has been a perceptible difference in the light of that room. He also says that the hall lights in the hall on the ground floor have to be put on an hour earlier, and in the first floor room, called the study, he confirms what the plaintiff says, that there is a G marked difference.

All the windows in these two rooms in the basement and the windows in the two rooms on the ground floor, that is to say, the plaintiff's sitting room and the Chesterfield Salon, and I think the windows on the upper floor as well, are admitted to be ancient lights. The only windows in the house which are not admitted to be ancient lights and facing Chesterfield-gardens, are the fanlight and panels over and in the front H door, and I am not prepared to find these excepted lights are ancient lights.

Further evidence before me is the evidence of Mr. Douglas Yates Pitts, who is an architectural expert on the question of lighting to buildings. He says that for a room to be adequately lighted, at least half of the room should be within what is known technically as the grumble point, that is to say, a point having 1/250th of the light available on the unobstructed windowsill. Plans have been put before me which I contain contour lines which show, first, the parts of the rooms within the grumble line, that is to say, the parts of the rooms adequately lighted when the old building was up. Secondly, they show the parts which will be left within the grumble line when the proposed building is completed, and, thirdly, the parts which would be left within the grumble line when not only the proposed building is completed, but if and when the buildings on the north side of the plaintiff's house are built up to a height to which they could legally be built up in accordance with the decision of MAUGHAM, J., in Sheffield Masonic Hall Co. v. Sheffield Corpn. (2). Those figures which are agreed—and the principles upon which I understand they are agreed are accepted—are these, that taking the basement rooms, the part of room No. 1 (which is the room occupied by the staff) which was adequately lighted when Chesterfield House was originally standing there, was 34·5 per cent., and when the defendants' buildings are completed, the amount of the adequately lighted part of that room will be 16·1 per cent.; and in the third event, if and when the buildings to the north are erected, it would be reduced to 10·9 per cent. In room No. 3, which is the Graingers' room, they began with 39·9 per cent. when Chesterfield House was standing there, and it drops to 21 per cent. when the defendants' building is completed, and 14·9 per cent. if and when the buildings to the north are completed. As regards the ground floor rooms, room No. 4, the plaintiff's room which he occupies himself, the originally adequately lighted part is 38·8 per cent., and that will be reduced to 23·6 per cent., and further reduced, when the buildings to the north are put up, to 19 per cent. As regards room No. 6, which is the Chesterfield Salon, the originally adequately lighted part was 63 per cent.; that will be reduced to 38 per cent., and it may ultimately be reduced to 25 per cent. The only other room which I need mention at present is the first floor room to the south, No. 7, of which the originally adequately lighted part was 71·6 per cent. of the room, and that will be reduced to 40·15 per cent. when the defendants' building is completed. As I understand the evidence, the defendants admit that their building will cause a substantial diminution of the light in the plaintiff's rooms.

The plaintiff's witness, Mr. Pitts, says that when the defendants' building is completed, the rooms in the basement will be insufficiently lighted for ordinary business and domestic purposes. Mr. Waldram, who was the expert who gave evidence on behalf of the defendants, said that the proposed building would affect the plaintiff's lights, and would create a serious nuisance—meaning nuisance in the popular sense, and not a legal sense—to the plaintiff's rooms.

CROSSMAN, J., held that the admitted diminution of light which would be caused by the obstruction was such as to cause an actionable nuisance, and he granted the injunction claimed. The defendants appealed.

Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and Andrew Clark for the defendants.

Gavin T. Simonds, K.C., and T. Cunliffe for the plaintiff.

The arguments appear in the judgments.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This appeal is brought from a decision of CROSSMAN, J., who heard the action during a number of days, when matters were presented to him in respect of a claim by the plaintiff to restrain the building by Messrs. Higgs and Hill, Ltd., of a large block of flats on a site where there used to stand Chesterfield House, which is at the bottom of South Audley-street, and in the neighbourhood of Park-lane.

The action was brought by Mr. Reginald Charles Fishenden, who is the lessee under a lease of No. 8, Chesterfield-gardens, which was granted on Dec. 24, 1930, for a term of thirty-five years from Dec. 25, 1930, at a rent of £1,500 a year clear of all deductions, and in addition the lessee undertook to spend a sum of not less than £5,000 on certain alterations which were to be made upon the site. As a matter of fact he spent as much as £8,000, and at the time when the action was brought, in January of this year, there still remained, broadly, thirty years of his lease unexpired. The interest, therefore, of the plaintiff is as lessee of No. 8, Chesterfield-gardens. Chesterfield-gardens is a cul-de-sac which stands on the east side of the site of Chesterfield House, and there are some considerable and important houses built in Chesterfield-gardens. The plaintiff himself has made use of the premises by occupying the southerly room on the ground floor. The northerly room on that floor is let to a club. In his basement there are rooms which are used, in particular by what I may call the manager of the flats and his wife.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting or continuing to erect a new building which would in any way cause a nuisance by the interruption of the plaintiff's light to which he was entitled, it being without question that the plaintiff has a right to ancient lights in his premises. CROSSMAN, J., granted an injunction, mandatory in form, which did not condescend into actual particulars, requiring the defendants to remove so much of their building as should interfere with or constitute a nuisance or obstruction or interference with the plaintiff's rights of light.

I think it is very important that I should state some of the facts relating to these premises, for it is upon an appreciation of the facts and to those facts that one has to apply the rules laid down in numbers of cases which deal with ancient lights. Chesterfield House stood in what may be called its own grounds, and was set back some distance from the margin of the grounds. There were a series of steps down from it to what I may call a garden or courtyard, and that courtyard was, I think, something like 10 ft. or 15 ft. back from the eastern margin of the site. The house was, in the main, a square house, but it had adjuncts to it which were not raised to the same height as the main building. Chesterfield-gardens was a cul-de-sac, and at the north end of it it was closed by some buildings which are approached from another street, and part of those buildings which are on the other side of the cul-de-sac was a certain "Red Lion" public-house which, at the present moment, does not seriously obstruct the light to Chesterfield-gardens, but it stands upon a site upon which there could be a larger building built if it was required to do so. As I have said, the plaintiff's right to ancient lights is not disputed, nor is it disputed that there will be some interference by the proposed building to the light which will reach the plaintiff's premises. The learned judge held there had been proof given that the ground floor and the basement did suffer, and would suffer, a nuisance by reason of the diminution of the light, but with regard to the rooms on the first and second floors he held that there was no nuisance proved or intended. The learned judge came to the conclusion that it was a case in which he ought to grant an injunction. Upon that part of the case it is important to see what the conduct of the defendants has been. The learned judge found in his judgment that the defendants acted honestly on what they thought to be their rights. It is important from the point of view of the defendants that that should be quite clearly stated and definitely appreciated.

Before the action was brought certain correspondence took place between the plaintiff's advisers and those who represented the defendants, and there are one or two letters in the bundle of correspondence to which I must call attention. The advisers to the plaintiff wrote as early as April 6, 1934, to Messrs. Higgs and Hill on the subject of the complaints, and I need not dwell upon so early a date as that. But when we come to July, 1934, the parties get into touch and the plaintiff asks for particulars of the proposed building. On July 12, Messrs. Burnett and Eprile, who were acting on behalf of the defendants, wrote this to the owner of 8, Chesterfield-gardens:

> "Clients of ours have under consideration the rebuilding of Chesterfield House. Although it is not anticipated that the scheme now being considered will affect the lighting of your premises to any extent that would be material, our clients have desired us to communicate with you, in common with all their neighbours, in order that you may be acquainted with their proposals in case you may be apprehensive with regard to the effect of the rebuilding upon your property. Therefore, if you would care to put your architect in touch with us we should be glad to show him the plans of the proposed building, and as our clients are responsible for raising the question of the effect of their proposals, they desire to be allowed to consider themselves also responsible for the reasonable charges of your architect in the matter, even though, as they contemplate, his opinion will be that your light will not be materially affected in any way. If you are not the freeholder of the premises we would be very obliged if you would kindly inform us as to the length of the term of your interest in them, and also the name and address of your lessors."

That is a very fair and a very honest letter. After a time it was replied to, and the parties got into touch, and on July 19 the same firm, Messrs. Burnett and Eprile, wrote to Mr. Cole, who was then acting for the plaintiff:

> "We are informed by Mr. Fishenden that you are acting for him and that he has forwarded our previous letter to you. We have now completed our diagrams showing the relationship of your client's house with the new building on the site of Chesterfield House, and I am enclosing copies of these diagrams for your information. You will note that, except for two small towers, the new building will be set back some considerable distance from the boundary line in Chesterfield-gardens, > and that the angles of light from your client's ground floor windows will be very low having regard to the locality."

Upon that the answer of Mr. Cole, on July 26, is:

> "In my opinion my client would suffer material damage. I must ask you to consider some adjustment with regard to the projecting wing."

As matters stood then, therefore, it appeared that the defendants had been desirous of consulting the rights of the plaintiff; they had brought to his attention the fact, as it is the fact, that the main building as proposed would be set back slightly from the position occupied by Chesterfield House, and to that extent there would possibly be an improved light reaching the plaintiff's windows, and with regard to that, that is a matter which has to be taken into account, because under Davis v. Marrable (3), it has been laid down that a person who offends in the way of creating a nuisance against light is entitled to take into account in his favour any increased light that his new building provides. In the letter I have just read it is pointed out that the projecting wing is what is objected to. Broadly speaking, the plan of the new design was that there should be a main building set back slightly from the old position of Chesterfield House, but that there should be two wings on the north and south which should be advanced closer to the street which divides Chesterfield House from the houses in Chesterfield-gardens. Those projections have been called turrets and wings, and so on, but they are substantial projections from the face of the proposed new building. The breadth of the wings was 26 ft. 6 in., and the depth was 32 ft. 6 in., and one of those projections was in front of the plaintiff's windows. There was, therefore, at that point, a matter which gave concern to the plaintiff whether or not he would suffer injury. The correspondence continues, and the plans and elevations of old Chesterfield House were sent to Mr. Cole on Oct. 31. There is no doubt that for the most part the focus of the complaint which was made by Mr. Cole was in reference to the wing or turret which was in front of the plaintiff's windows, but the parties were considering what the actual position was, and I cannot, for my own part, attach any fault to the plaintiff if ultimately he asserted his whole rights, although during the previous months he had directed attention more particularly to the actual position of the projection which was contemplated. Suffice it to say, that, after this correspondence had taken place, in a proper spirit on both sides, the parties failed to come to any adjustment, and the result was that, in order to test his rights and to assert them, the plaintiff issued his writ on Jan. 19 of this year. The trial took place on March 30 and in the early days of April, when the result was reached to which I have already referred, and the defendants were ordered by a mandatory injunction to take down a part of their building and to modify their plans so as to avoid causing any nuisance to the plaintiff's lights. There was a contest before CROSSMAN, J., whether or not an injunction was the right remedy to which the plaintiff was entitled. But he determined that the injunction ought to go. From that decision the appeal is brought to this court, and it is, in form, directed alternatively to saying that the plaintiff had not proved that the proposed building when completed would cause a nuisance to the plaintiff's right to light, or that such remedy as the plaintiff may be entitled to ought to be confined to damages and not to an injunction. We have heard the matter at some length, not by any means at too great length, for it is obvious that the matters concerned are of importance to the parties, and it has been necessary to look with some care into the cases that have been decided. We have come to the conclusion and the learned judge was right in holding that there had been or was intended to be an invasion of the plaintiff's right—that the building when set up by the defendants would cause a nuisance to the plaintiff.

There have been a great number of cases decided, but we are all of us aware that when the decision was given in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (4) the House of Lords brought back the problem, which must always be raised in these cases, to the broad proposition, namely, whether there is a substantial deprivation of light sufficient to cause a nuisance, or, in other words, enough to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable according to the ordinary notions of mankind. It is not enough that the light is less than before; there must be an invasion of what might be called the ordinary

A rights which attach to the plaintiff as the holder of ancient lights. The House of Lords rejected what had grown up to be accepted as a rule, namely, that there ought to be a pencil of light reaching the windows at an angle of 45 deg., and they went back to the broad propositions which had been laid down by LORD HARDWICKE, and subsequently adopted in a number of cases, of which perhaps the best illustration was that in Back v. Stacey in 1826 (5), when there was a summing up by BEST, C.J., which was held to be
B right, and also Parker v. Smith (6) which was determined in the sittings after Michaelmas Term in 1832, and the proposition to which the House of Lords reverted was, as I have said, the proposition which had been laid down by LORD HARDWICKE and illustrated in the two cases to which I have referred. LORD HARDWICKE's words were these (Fishmongers' Co. v. East India Co. (7)):

> "It is not sufficient to say that it [the change of the building] will alter the plaintiff's lights, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on in the city, and here there will be 17 ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance."

BEST, C.J.'s words are taken from a summing-up of his in Back v. Stacey (5) and he told the jury, who viewed the premises, that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree
D of diminution that the plaintiff's ancient lights had undergone.

> "In order to give a right of action, and sustain the issue there must be a substantial privation of light, sufficient to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable, and to prevent the plaintiff carrying on his accustomed business (that of a grocer) on the premises, as beneficially as he had formerly done."

His lordship added that

> "it might be difficult to draw the line, but the jury must distinguish between a partial inconvenience and a real injury to the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the premises."

TINDAL, C.J., put the proposition in this way (5 Carr. & P. at p. 439), that that diminution of light and air which the law recognises

> "is such a diminution of light as really makes the premises to a sensible degree less fit for the purposes of business."

A good deal of evidence was given in this case by witnesses who claimed to be experts in determining what is the normal amount of light to which persons are entitled in what may be called a normal room—Mr. Waldram and others. They have laid down what is called a grumble point, namely, a point at which you are unable, except under the
G fortunate possession of brilliant sunshine, to read without difficulty, and they have endeavoured to show that this is a standard which ought to be conformed to, and there was evidence, which was in the main accepted, on the lines that there would be considerable interference with the amount of light which would reach the plaintiff's windows. But it was said that, although that may be so, there are other considerations which have to be borne in mind and that you must take into account, as other cases have
H taken into account, the locality, and you cannot expect in a town crowded with buildings the same amount of access of light as you would expect in more fortunate districts, and so it is said that you must always consider what is the locality. That view was rejected by RUSSELL, J., in Horton's Estate, Ltd. v. Beattie, Ltd. (8). The rule laid down in the Colls Case (4) is referred to, and then he says that the argument which had been presented to him was that ([1927] 1 Ch. at p. 76):

I
> "in considering whether the decrease in light constitutes a nuisance the standard of comfort prevailing in the locality must be taken into account. Much turns on the nature and locality of the window, the supply of light to which has been interfered with. Persons who live in towns cannot expect the same volume of light as those who live in the country," and a number of cases are referred to for that proposition, and then it goes on:

> "Even if this room be inadequately lighted according to ordinary standards, the evidence shows that it is adequately lighted according to the standard prevailing > in Wolverhampton, a manufacturing town, and therefore no actionable wrong has been committed. The amount of light to be left is not to be tested by any hard and fast standard, but by reference to the general standard of light in the district." A

RUSSELL, J., rejected that view, and he said this ([1927] 1 Ch. at p. 78):

> "The standard of lighting required to survive in order to eliminate the existence of a nuisance seems to me of necessity an absolute standard. The human eye requires as much light for comfortable reading or sewing in Darlington-street, Wolverhampton, as in Mayfair. True, no doubt it may be that as a rule buildings are more crowded together in manufacturing districts than in residential neighbourhoods. Lights have been obstructed, and no doubt where they have been ancient compensation has been accepted," B and so on, C

> "I can see, however, no reason in this for saying that a man whose room in such a locality has been turned into a room no longer adequately lighted for ordinary purposes has not suffered an actionable wrong."

It was claimed that that view is incorrect, and it was said, in particular, that the locality here must be considered, that it had not been adequately considered by CROSSMAN, J., and that on that he had misdirected himself. D It was said that if you take this locality or area, which was described as Mayfair, you will find that in a great number of streets there is much less light than will be left to the plaintiff after the building, as proposed, has been erected. I confess I find a great difficulty in applying any doctrine of locality with such particularity as that suggests. I can understand that you may have a locality which may be described as residential or manufacturing E or industrial, and different considerations may apply in those areas to which you can apply these adjectives broadly. But I do not find it possible to accept that by "locality" you mean an area which is determined in its limits arbitrarily, or, perhaps, usefully, for postal purposes and determining what is the right address to which a letter could be sent, or, perhaps, also usefully to a surveyor or agent for the purpose of enhancing the values of properties which lay within the margin of that so-called locality. F But it seems to me quite unreasonable to say that, because you find that in some places in Mayfair there is less access of light than would be left here in Chesterfield-gardens, it can be said that the plaintiff has suffered no wrong. Whether you are to consider that all persons living in that locality are possessed of ancient lights or not I am not sure—whether you are to take into account the squares that lie there or not I do not know. But if you are only to select particular streets, it seems to me that the test of so-called G locality must break down. I prefer the evidence which was given by the plaintiff and Mr. Grainger, his manager, and really not contested, that when this building has been set up there will be a diminution of light reaching the windows which will put the premises beyond the margin of which the House of Lords speaks, namely, that the occupation of the house would be rendered uncomfortable according to the ordinary notions of mankind. H It will be observed from the passages I have quoted and the principles which are laid down that they are very loose; it is almost impossible to reach precise definitions when you are talking of the occupation of a house being uncomfortable according to the ordinary notions of mankind, when you are talking of different localities, and the like. I believe, for my own part, that one will have to go back to the words which were laid before the jury in Back v. Stacey (5) by BEST, C.J., and say that it is a matter of degree, and, therefore, a question of fact to which persons who I have got to determine it will have to apply the sort of reasoning which would be applied by a jury, and will have to determine on those lines whether the privation of light is sufficient to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable and less beneficial than it had formerly been. If one attempts to do more than give a broad rule which may be given to the jury for the purposes of their coming to their verdict, I think one gets into a range of difficulties which are by no means easy to solve.

Having regard to the facts which were proved in this case I think it would be unreasonable to treat Chesterfield-gardens on the same basis as other streets in Mayfair. It may be that for the purposes of local administration Chesterfield-gardens is on the same basis as other streets in Mayfair. It may be that for the purposes of local administration Chesterfield-gardens is a street, but it is a street in which there is a considerable access of light, and to the whole of that quantum the plaintiff is clearly not entitled; but he is entitled, I think, to have consideration given to the type of house in which he is living, and that in a locality which is residential rather than manufacturing or industrial and one in which, perhaps, the value of the house is enhanced by its situation, and you may test what would be uncomfortable and would be a privation of light as somewhat different in this particular house than if it was being used for wholly different purposes, and not residential purposes. But, having regard to the learned judge's judgment in this case in the court below, I am satisfied that he did not in any part of his judgment leave out of sight the question of locality, or misdirect himself upon the evidence on the main question of whether the plaintiff had suffered a nuisance or not. It is true that he did not refer in actual terms in the later portions of his judgment to locality, or use the word "locality," but in the first seven or eight pages he clearly indicated that he had got that in mind, and I think it would be an unfair criticism of his judgment to treat it otherwise than directly in accordance with the rules which have been laid down.

On the question of locality I will only add one or two more words, namely, that LORD LOREBURN, in Jolly v. Kine (9) says this ([1907] A.C. at p. 2):

> "He does not obtain by his easement a right to all the light he has enjoyed. He obtains a right to so much of it as will suffice for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business according to the ordinary notions of mankind, having regard to the locality and surroundings."

There is a passage by LORD PARKER in Hammerton v. Dysart (10) ([1916] 1 A.C. at p. 86), where he says:

> "Further, the character or circumstances of the neighbourhood are always material in considering the degree to which the owner of the right said to have been infringed is entitled to immunity from interference by others. What may be a nuisance by smoke or noise or interference with light under one set of circumstances is not necessarily a nuisance under a totally distinct set of circumstances. That which the law protects is the reasonable enjoyment of the right in question, and in deciding whether the right is infringed the law has due regard to the needs and interests of others. The convenience or inconvenience entailed by the assertion of the right is not without its materiality."

I have read those passages for the purpose of making it clear, as I think it ought to be made clear, that the learned judge rightly directed himself upon the main point, and he, after hearing the evidence and seeing the witnesses, came to the conclusion that a nuisance had been established by the plaintiff and that it was a nuisance for which he was entitled to invoke the assistance of the court. Upon that I am not prepared in any way to differ from him, and I accept that conclusion.

Then comes another very difficult question: What is the remedy which is to be employed? No doubt, in the old days before the passing of Lord Cairns' Act, 1858, there would have been in equity an injunction granted. If the action had been brought at law, damages would have been granted. The courts of law could not have granted an injunction, and the courts of Chancery could not have granted damages. But by Lord Cairns' Act, it was declared by s. 2 that in all cases in which the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against any wrongful act, "it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured . . . in substitution for an injunction in all cases." Some efforts have been made to lay down some guiding rules as to which the court ought to choose or adhere to an injunction or when it is sufficient that it should grant damages. Perhaps the best known place in which some rules are stated is the judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J., which is to be found in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. (1) ([1895] 1 Ch. at p. 322). I will not read those four rules again, but the learned judge continues:

> "There may also be cases in which, though the four above-mentioned requirements exist, the defendant by his conduct, as, for instance, hurrying up his buildings so as if possible to avoid an injunction, or otherwise acting with a reckless disregard to the plaintiff's rights, has disentitled himself from asking that damages may be assessed in substitution for an injunction. It is impossible to lay down any rule as to what, in the differing circumstances of each case, constitutes either a small injury, or one that can be estimated in money, or what is a small money payment, or an adequate compensation, or what would be oppressive to the defendant. This must be left to the good sense of the tribunal which deals with each case as it comes up for adjudication."

Those words at the commencement and at the conclusion of the four rules clearly indicate that A. L. Smith, L.J., was only attempting to lay down some sort of canons which ought to be followed appropriately as a guide in determining whether an injunction or damages should be granted, but in the very terms he eliminates any stringency from them and indicates that the tribunal itself must consider what is the right course in any particular case. Lindley, L.J. ([1895] 1 Ch. at p. 316), says this:

> "Without denying the jurisdiction to award damages instead of an injunction, even in cases of continuing actionable nuisances, such jurisdiction ought not to be exercised in such cases except under very exceptional circumstances."

Then he says he will not attempt to lay down rules for the exercise of judicial discretion and then comes the passage which has been read:

> "In all such cases as these, and in all others where an action for damages is really an adequate remedy—as where the acts complained of are already finished—an injunction can be properly refused," and so on, and he there, in the Shelfer Case (1) grants the injunction. Be it remembered that the Shelfer Case (1) was a case in which, by reason of vibration, the lives of the persons in the house were rendered not merely uncomfortable, but that in some measure their health was endangered. The Shelfer Case (1) seems to me the high-water mark of what might be called definite rules, and at the same time, when you examine those rules, both A. L. Smith, L.J., and Lindley, L.J., held that those tests are, if I may use the expression, "of imperfect application."

When we come to Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (4) once more, we find that the matter is left more at large than it was in the Shelfer Case (1) not, perhaps, more at large than it was in the Shelfer Case (1) when you read the passages which are concomitant to the rules, but more at large than it was left if you focus your attention upon the rules and the rules only. Lord Macnaghten in the Colls Case (4) ([1904] A.C. at p. 193) says this:

> "But the recovery of damages, whatever the amount may be, indicates a violation of right, and in former times, unless there were something special in the case, would have entitled the plaintiff as of course to an injunction in equity. I rather doubt whether the amount of the damages which may be supposed to be recoverable at law affords a satisfactory test. But if there is really a question as to whether the obstruction is legal or not, and if the defendant has acted fairly and not in an unneighbourly spirit, I am disposed to think that the court ought to incline to damages rather than to an injunction."

Lord Lindley ([1904] A.C. at p. 212), again, says this:

> "The present case is eminently one in which damages would be an adequate remedy, even assuming the plaintiffs could prove a small nuisance for which some damages could be properly given; and where that is the case an injunction, and especially a mandatory injunction, ought not to issue."

I pointed out in Slack v. Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society (11) that the so-called tests in the Shelfer Case (1) were no more than what had been anticipated by Sir George Jessel in Aynsley v. Glover (12), and that they did no more—that the Colls Case (4) had not altered those rules; but it must not be taken I held that the rules in the Shelfer

A Case (1) by themselves were now prescribed as the guiding tests for the court. I think my judgment indicates that one must bear in mind, not merely the Shelfer Case (1) but also the Colls Case (4), and also what had been said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL in Aynsley v. Glover (12) and it is important just to look at what he did say. SIR GEORGE JESSEL said this (L.R. 18 Eq. at p. 552):

> B "As I understand it, the rule now is—and I shall so decide in future, unless in the meantime the appeal court shall decide differently—that wherever an action can be maintained at law and really substantial damages, or perhaps I should say considerable damages (for some people may say that £20 is substantial damages), can be recovered at law, there the injunction ought to follow in equity; generally, not universally, because I have nothing to add upon that subject. In this case I do not C think that anybody would doubt the damages would be substantial. The obstruction would in fact destroy the use of the room altogether; it would so darken it that perhaps it might be used for a cellar," and so on. Then he goes on (L.R. 18 Eq. at p. 555):

> "The discretion, being a reasonable discretion, should, I think, be reasonably exercised, and it must depend upon the special circumstances of each case whether D it ought to be exercised."

After one turns to the passages in the previous judgments to which I was referring in the Slack Case (11), I do not think it could be said that that judgment was intended in any way to cut down, as indeed it could not cut down, the previous authorities to which I was referring. In Kine v. Jolly (9) in the decision below, which stood affirmed after E the case had been argued in the House of Lords, damages were considered. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. ([1905] 1 Ch. at p. 496), says this:

> "The only other matter which, according to LORD MACNAGHTEN'S speech, remains to be considered is whether this injury cannot be fairly compensated by money damages. I think it can be, and therefore I think there ought to be no mandatory injunction."

F In other words, following out the principle which LORD MACNAGHTEN appeared to indicate, that the court ought to incline towards damages more than to an injunction, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., applies that course. Again ([1905] 1 Ch. at p. 504), COZENS-HARDY, L.J., says this:

> G "I think it is impossible to doubt that the tendency of the speeches in the House of Lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (4) is to go a little further than was done in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. (1), and to indicate that as a general rule the court ought to be less free in granting mandatory injunctions than it was in years gone by."

It seems to me, therefore, that these rules in the Shelfer Case (1) must now be taken with the concomitant passages to which I have referred in the later cases, in Colls (4) H and in Kine v. Jolly (9), and that we ought to incline against an injunction if possible. It is not possible to say what the injury to the plaintiff will be when estimated in money. I think the damages that he may be given will be a substantial sum—not a trivial sum like £50 or £100, but a substantial sum. On the other hand, the defendants have certainly acted with circumspection, and I think with a desire to avoid any unreasonable invasion of the plaintiff's rights, and certainly not to take him or catch him at a I disadvantage. Their conduct inures to their benefit, and therefore we have to consider what would be the result to them if they had to modify their plans and to cut off a portion of their building. They may be unable to use the site in a manner in which they have a right to use it when they are making use of this now vacant piece of land and building upon it in a manner which is not uncommon at the present time, a liberty which cannot be restrained because of what LORD HALSBURY said in the Colls Case (4), namely, that there is a right to build upon a piece of land like this within the city of Westminster.

I have come to the conclusion on the whole that this is a case in which damages will be a sufficient remedy. Even though those damages may sound a not inconsiderable sum, we are dealing with sites of large value. The plaintiff himself has to pay a high rental, and he is subject to a covenant under which he had to make a large outlay when he took possession of these premises. One cannot be surprised, therefore, if, appropriately to the site and to his own position as lessee, the figures involved are considerable. But I also think that one ought to consider whether the defendants will be oppressed in the sense that they will lose so very large a quantum of the enjoyment of their site as to amount to oppression. In all the circumstances of the case, following Lord Macnaghten's rule and following Sir George Jessel's rule, I think we ought to leave the matter to be decided by the imposition of damages. Therefore, there will be an order that the case be remitted for the purpose of ascertaining what damage the plaintiff has suffered, and the mandatory injunction will be discharged.

I come, lastly, to the question what order ought to be made as to costs. The plaintiff below asserted the right, which the judge held he had got, and he claimed that he had suffered an injury to that right, which the learned judge held also, and we have affirmed the learned judge on that point. Therefore no order need be made in reference to the costs below. The only change which will be made in the order made by the learned judge is to discharge the injunction. Upon the appeal here, the appellants have failed upon their main point in the argument, namely, that the plaintiff was not entitled to any assistance from the court; but we have held that the remedy ought to be a different one from that imposed by the learned judge. In all the circumstances of the case we have come to the conclusion that the respondents are entitled to tax their costs and to be paid by the appellants one-half of those costs on the ground that the respondent has succeeded in preventing the appeal succeeding upon the main point upon which it was originally brought. That course will, I think, obviate the procedure in taxation better than if we had ordered separate taxation with a set-off? Therefore the appeal will be allowed to the extent of a variation of the order made by Crossman, J., and the respondent will be entitled to half the taxed costs which have been incurred in the course of the appeal.

ROMER, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The attack upon the decision in the court below is made upon the ground that Crossman, J., misdirected himself upon the law applicable to the case in that he disregarded all questions of locality, that is to say, it is said that Crossman, J., paid no attention to the character of the neighbourhood in which the plaintiff's house is situated. I do not think that criticism is well-founded. Crossman, J., in directing himself upon the law, said this:

> "The first question which arises is whether the admitted diminution of light which will be caused by the obstruction is such as to cause an actionable nuisance, and that, as I understand it, means such as to interfere substantially with the comfortable use and enjoyment of the house as a dwelling-house according to the ordinary requirements of mankind."

A little later he said:

> "At one time, of course, many years ago, that was the case [that is to say, that you considered whether the light which the plaintiff had previously been receiving was substantially diminished] but what he is entitled to is what is required for the ordinary purposes of the inhabitants of the tenement according to the ordinary notions of mankind."

It is true that in those passages there is no direct reference made to any question of locality, nor, indeed, is there any direct reference to such a question in any part of the learned judge's judgment, but neither will you find any direct reference to the question of locality in the statement of the law made by Lord Macnaghten in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (4) ([1904] A.C. 179), nor in the passages from Back v. Stacey (5) and Parker v. Smith (6), and Wells v. Ody (13), cited by Lord Macnaghten in his speech. If Crossman, J., misdirected himself, then so did Lord Macnaghten, Best, C.J., misdirected the jury, and in Parker v. Smith (6) the same charge could be brought against Tindal, C.J., and, in Wells v. Ody (13), against Baron Parke. But it must be taken that none of those learned judges was ignorant of the fact that in all cases relating to nuisance, the question of locality has to be taken into consideration, though I venture to think that in cases of nuisance by obstruction of ancient lights the question of locality has very much less to do with it than cases relating to other nuisances. In point of fact there is a passage later in the judgment of Crossman, J., which seems to me to indicate pretty clearly that he had in his mind the question of locality, because, after again stating the question he had to decide, which was whether what the defendants had done would interfere substantially with the comfortable use and enjoyment of the plaintiff's house as a dwelling-house according to the ordinary requirements of mankind, he says this:

> "I think that 'according to the ordinary requirements of mankind' does not mean having regard to the precise amount that people in the streets round about have got, but having regard to what a reasonable person—which is the expression to use —would require."

A reasonable person would not expect precisely as much light in Mayfair as he would get in the country, and he would not expect precisely so much light in the city of London as he would get in Mayfair.

But, in truth, having regard to the findings of fact by the learned judge in this case, the question of locality has little or nothing to do with the matter. Crossman, J., heard the plaintiff in the witness-box, and he accepted his evidence. The evidence so accepted by Crossman, J., is stated by him in this way:

> "In the plaintiff's house, the plaintiff lives himself in a flat on the ground floor as you go in—that is to say, the south part of the house—and he tells me in evidence that he now—that is to say, in the last few weeks—has to use artificial light to eat his lunch, though formerly he could do so by daylight. He also tells me that he now has to turn on the light in his room on the ground floor on the south side of the house an hour earlier in the afternoon than he did when Chesterfield House was standing."

—that has been referred to as room No. 4 in this case. "He also tells me that in the room on the other side of the ground floor," and so on. Counsel for the defendants has criticised the evidence of the plaintiff upon that point in this respect, that the plaintiff did not state—because he was not asked in cross-examination—in what particular part of the room he had his lunch, but it does emerge from the evidence, I think, as a reasonable inference to be drawn in the plaintiff's favour, that he was lunching in the same part of the room when he had to use the electric light as he had been previously accustomed to lunch in when he did not have to use the electric light. Whatever may be said about the neighbourhood of Mayfair or the west end of London generally as regards the angles subtended by buildings in front of the ground floor rooms in the streets, I know of no evidence whatsoever in this case which suggests that the inhabitants of Mayfair as a rule always have to have electric light when they are having their lunch. If such evidence had been given, I have no doubt that the learned judge would have disbelieved it, and properly disbelieved it. So we are not here concerned, as it seems to me, with the neighbourhood of this house. In whatever neighbourhood a dwelling-house is situated, a man is entitled to have his ancient lights protected to this extent, that he may be able to go on having his lunch without the use of electric light in places where obviously he had so lunched. The learned judge had no direct evidence of that kind as regards the other room, No. 6, on the ground floor; but a glance at the daylight plans will show that the percentage of diminution of the former light in No. 6 is larger than it is in No. 4, and as regards No. 6 he was told by the plaintiff, and he accepted the plaintiff's evidence that the darkness in No. 6 had become very noticeable during the last few weeks, and this, it is to be observed, was at a time when the defendants' building had not been carried up to anything like the full extent that the defendants intend, unless restrained by injunction, to carry it. The learned judge also found that the rooms in the basement would be darkened, and he accepted the evidence as to the effect of the defendants' building upon the light to the rooms in the basement. It must, however, be remembered that as regards the rooms in the basement, whoever originally built Chesterfield-gardens thought fit for his own purposes to build his basements, as most basements are built, in the ground, and that the light coming to them over Chesterfield House was largely obstructed by the fact that they were built in the ground, and that in front of them—at what height, I do not precisely know—there was the wall of the area. In those circumstances the plaintiff could not complain of any obstruction to the light of the basement if that obstruction would not have been actionable if he had chosen to build his rooms in the basement without the obstruction of the area wall in front. If, however, the defendants' building would cause an actionable nuisance to those rooms if they had been built without the area wall in front, then the plaintiff is entitled to complain. In those circumstances it is only necessary really to consider the question of the rooms on the ground floor because, if the rooms on the ground floor had not been obstructed to an actionable extent, then the rooms in the basement would not have been obstructed. If, on the other hand, the rooms on the ground floor have, as the learned judge found, been obstructed to an actionable extent, then so must the rooms in the basement have been. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the learned judge was right in deciding that the plaintiff had sustained an actionable nuisance in respect of the obstruction of the light to the rooms 4 and 6 on the ground floor, and, therefore, the rooms 1 and 3 in the basement.

The question then arises whether the plaintiff should be granted an injunction, or whether he should merely be granted a remedy in damages. It has been said by counsel for the plaintiff that in all these cases of injunction or damages the court exercises a discretion, and that where the learned judge in the court below has exercised his discretion, this court should not interfere with that exercise of discretion. As regards that I would point out, as the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has pointed out, that in Kine v. Jolly (9) this court, under Lord Cairn's Act, did interfere with the exercise of discretion by KEKEWICH, J. In Slack v. Leeds Industrial Co-operative (11) the matter came back to this court from the House of Lords for the purpose of considering an appeal from myself, as I had intimated my opinion that, if I had had power to grant damages in lieu of an injunction, I should have exercised that power. The court here would not merely accept my finding in that respect; they went fully into the facts of the case, and in the end they came to the conclusion that they would exercise their discretion in the same way as I was prepared to exercise it in the court below. But, even assuming that counsel makes good that point, the exercise of discretion by the learned judge can always, of course, be reviewed if it appears that in exercising his discretion, he has proceeded upon a wrong principle. With all respect to CROSSMAN, J., I think that as regards this question of injunction or damages he has misdirected himself because he seems to have come to the conclusion that if, in any case, any one of the four conditions referred to by A. L. SMITH, L.J., in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. (1), are not fulfilled, the court must grant an injunction. But I do not take that view at all. Where the four conditions enunciated by A. L. SMITH, L.J., are fulfilled, I do not doubt that a court will grant damages in lieu of an injunction, but it by no means follows that A. L. SMITH, L.J., intended to say or did say or in fact could say that in all cases in which those four conditions do not prevail, the injunction must be granted; he could not have intended to have fettered the discretion imposed upon the courts by Lord Cairns' Act. The fact that he did not do that is apparent, I think, from the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., in the same case. LINDLEY, L.J., said:

> "Without denying the jurisdiction to award damages instead of an injunction, even in cases of continuing actionable nuisances, such jurisdiction ought not to be exercised in such cases except under very exceptional circumstances. I will not attempt to specify them, or to lay down rules for the exercise of judicial discretion. It is sufficient to refer, by way of example, to trivial and occasional nuisances; cases in which a plaintiff has shown that he only wants money; vexatious and oppressive cases; and cases where the plaintiff has so conducted himself as to render it unjust to give him more than pecuniary relief. In all such cases as these, and in all others where an action for damages is really an adequate remedy—as where the acts complained of are already finished—an injunction can be properly refused."

It is quite plain, therefore, that in every case, even though the four conditions laid down by A. L. SMITH, L.J., are not to be found, the court has, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, a discretion which it can exercise in the matter. What Lord Macnaghten said in the Colls Case (4) is, of course, to be taken very seriously into consideration in all cases relating to light when the question of the exercise of this discretion crops up. I will not read the passage at length; I will only refer to this part of it ([1904] A.C. at p. 193):

> "But if there is really a question as to whether the obstruction is legal or not, and if the defendant has acted fairly and not in an unneighbourly spirit, I am disposed to think that the court ought to incline to damages rather than to an injunction."

He had previously stated that he rather doubted whether the kind of damages which may be supposed to be recovered at law affords a satisfactory test.

In the present case there can be no dispute, I think, that there really was a question whether the obstruction caused by the defendants was legal or not. It cannot, I think, be said that the defendants have not acted fairly or in a neighbourly spirit. But there is one other circumstance to which personally I attach the greatest importance. In my opinion, having regard to the conduct of the plaintiff up to the time of the trial of this action, it would be unfair to grant him an injunction in respect of the main part of the building. When the plaintiff's attention was first called to the proposed erection by the defendants of the flats on the site of Chesterfield House, Mr. Cole, acting on behalf of the plaintiff, wrote to Messrs. Burnett and Eprile, who were acting as architects on behalf of the defendants, saying that he was very perturbed as to the effect of their proposed new building, and that he must ask them to consider some adjustment with regard to the projecting wing. That is the only thing of which he complained at that time. Mr. Burnett has told us that, as a consequence of that fact, namely, that Mr. Cole only complained of the projecting wing, he did not trouble further about the possible effect on the plaintiff's building of the main part of the proposed new flats because he said this:

> "When Mr. Cole wrote to us objecting to the projecting wing, and did not mention the main building at all, I assumed, and I think reasonably, that his objection referred to the wing only, so I considered the position if the wing was taken away, and I found the difference between the wing being there and the wing not being there was absolutely insignificant."

If the objection had been taken at that time not only to the wing but to the main building, and Mr. Burnett had gone into the fact of what effect the main building would have on the plaintiff's lights, for aught I know to the contrary he might have been convinced then that some alteration in the height of the main building was necessary. It was not until after Mr. Cole had had the daylight plans prepared by Mr. Swarbrick that he came to the conclusion, as I understand the facts of this case, that the plaintiff's lights would be damaged by the main building, and by the main building more than by the wings themselves. But he never drew the attention of the defendants to that fact. We find the solicitors for the plaintiff writing on Jan. 18, 1935, referring to the wing in particular. What they said was:

> "We are surprised to be informed by our client Mr. Fishenden that your clients are proceeding with the erection of their building, particularly with the wing which is immediately opposite our client's premises."

On Feb. 13 the plaintiff's solicitors wrote as follows:

> "In reply to your letter of the 12th inst., we are instructed by our client that notwithstanding the present proceedings and our previous correspondence your clients are continuing with the erection of the wing of the building immediately opposite our client's premises and have up to to-day's date filled in the framework up to the third floor," but there is not a word about any interference with light caused or likely to be caused by the main building. It is true that in the statement of claim, which was delivered at about this time, the plaintiff's objection was not confined to the wing, nor, of course, would it be confined to the wing in a plea by any wise pleader. The fact of the matter is that the defendants' attention was never specifically called to the question that the plaintiff really objected to anything other than the wing. In those circumstances the defendants proceeded with the erection of their main building. As I say, they did not seriously consider the question of whether the main building was likely prejudicially to affect the plaintiff's lights. In those circumstances, speaking entirely for myself, I think that, in the words of Lindley, L.J., in the Shelfer Case (1):

> "The plaintiff has so conducted himself as to render it unjust to give him more than pecuniary relief in respect of the main building."

The same thing, of course, cannot be said of him as regards his claim in respect of the wing. But when one puts to oneself the question whether an injunction should be granted in respect of the wing alone, or damages in respect of the wing should be granted, it is to be observed, now that we have got the daylight plans before us, that the additional obstruction caused by the wings is very small indeed—the amount of it is more or less accurately shown on Exhibit P.J.W.4, it being the space of light between the brown line and the green line. That is to say, if the wings were not there, the light left to the plaintiff in the rooms indicated on P.J.W.4 would go back to the green line instead of the brown line. That was a very small interference, in fact, with the light—it is an interference which, by itself, would add very little to the damages sustained by the plaintiff, and, in the circumstances, it would, I think, be oppressive to the defendants, having regard to the small amount of damage sustained by the plaintiff in respect of that addition, which certainly is a matter which could be compensated in damages, to grant a mandatory injunction as regards the wing.

For these reasons, in addition to those which have been given by the Master of the Rolls, I am of opinion that this appeal fails on the main point, but succeeds upon the question of an injunction or damages, and that an order should be made such as has been indicated by the Master of the Rolls.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—The plaintiff, who is the leaseholder of No. 8, Chesterfield-gardens, seeks an injunction, or, in the alternative, damages, to restrain the interference with some admitted ancient lights of his premises facing the gardens. The learned judge has granted an injunction in the usual form as regards future building by the defendants, and has granted also a mandatory injunction which puts upon the defendants the obligation to pull down so much of the section now standing upon the defendants' premises as constitutes a nuisance.

I should like to observe, in the first place, that I think a mandatory injunction, except in very exceptional circumstances, ought to be granted in such terms that the person against whom it is granted ought to know exactly what he has to do. I can quite understand that it is impossible in many cases to let the defendant know how far he can go, or to do more than restrain a man continuing with his building, but when the defendant in an action is going to be ordered by the court to take active steps with regard to something to be done on his own premises, I think certainly the better course is and, in my belief, the general course adopted in both divisions of the High Court, has been to tell the defendant precisely what he is bound to do. That, however, is by the way, and I mention it because I think the defendants here had, as was pointed out by counsel, some occasion for complaining of the form of the order, apart from the question of substance.

Coming to the merits of the present case, there are, as my brethren have pointed out, two questions: First, whether the plaintiff has suffered or will suffer an actionable injury by reason of what has been done or what is proposed to be done, and, secondly, the question of the character of the remedy appropriate to the present case if the plaintiff established his first proposition.

In my opinion, there could be no question, and I think it is not very much contended that there is a question what the test is, though a great deal may be said about how you apply the test and as to what the test involves. Since Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (4) it has been decided that the proper test is the test which existed before the Prescription Act was passed, and that you must go back to the summing-up of Best, C.J., in Back v. Stacey (5), and to the statement of the Lord Chancellor in Clarke v. Clark (14), and that you must, therefore, ascertain whether the obstruction threatened or occasioned by the defendant is such as would deprive the plaintiff of such a degree of light as he might reasonably calculate upon enjoying on the presumption of a lost grant, or, in other words, whether the building of the defendant will cause such an obstruction of light as to amount to an interference with the ordinary occupations of life, which is the same thing as what is required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business according to the ordinary notions of mankind. It should be added that, in answering that question, you must pay regard, as you must pay regard in the ordinary case of alleged nuisance owing to noise and vibration, to the locality in a wide sense. As I understand the argument put forward on behalf of the defendants on this part of the case, it amounted to this, that the test imposed by the House of Lords in the cases I have mentioned might be expressed as being the test afforded by the answer to the question whether the proposed building of the defendants would deprive the plaintiff of the amount of light which is enjoyed by other persons in the locality, or by most other persons in the locality, and both in the court below and in this court great stress has been laid on the fact that a large number of houses in Mayfair, where this house of the plaintiff is situate, do not receive at their ground-floor windows such an amount of light that, if the defendants' premises are erected to the full, the plaintiff will be in a worse position. I do not agree that that is a proper test. As has been pointed out, "nuisance" as a word applied to a light case differs in many respects from the ordinary common law nuisance in which the plaintiff seeks to restrain the making or causing of noise, smell, vibration, and so forth, so as to interfere with his ordinary comfort. If the plaintiff has lived for twenty years in a clearing in the forest of buildings in either Mayfair or in the city, I am of opinion that it is no answer to him to say that his neighbours, or people in the locality, either because they have consented, perhaps for a consideration or because their premises have been built by landlords who own houses on both sides of the street, or for any other reason, have come to be so situated that the premises opposite obstruct so much light that the ground floors of the premises are exceedingly inconvenient, and that the conditions possibly amount to a nuisance, using the word in the artificial sense in which it is used in this connection. To my mind, it is far better to keep to what was decided by the House of Lords in the Colls Case (4) or to the directions to juries upon which the House of Lords laid such stress, and to ask oneself the questions which they suggested should be asked, not, I agree, entirely omitting the locality, but not placing any such hard and fast reliance upon the enjoyment of light by other people in the locality as has been suggested on behalf of the appellants here. I would add that LORD LINDLEY, at any rate, most pointedly refused to agree to the fact that if people in the locality had a certain amount of light left, and only a certain amount, that afforded the proper test. The passage will be found [1904] A.C. at p. 210, and I need not repeat it.

Having regard to what has already been said, I am not going into any elaborate consideration of the facts in the present case so far as they relate to the question whether in the circumstances there has been, or will be, an actionable nuisance by the defendants' building. It should be pointed out that the action originally was largely a quia timet action. The result is that the inhabitants of the plaintiff's premises have been unable to tell exactly the obstruction that the house will cause when complete so far as regards light, and expert evidence has necessarily had to be very largely relied upon. It has to be remembered, however, and this point is, I think, of importance in regard to the question of remedy, that the original buildings on the defendants' property were very low, and that the plaintiff enjoyed in respect of his ground floor windows, to take them only for the present purposes, an exceptional degree of light before the demolition of the defendants' building. The angle from the sill of the plaintiff's ground floor windows to the obstructing point of the main part of the old building was 27 deg. Accordingly, there were 63 deg. of unobstructed light. If you looked at the stables of the old buildings, the angle from the plaintiff's ground floor windows to the obstructing point was as little as 24½ deg. Another thing which has to be considered to some extent in weighing evidence such as has been given by the plaintiff himself is that when the demolition of certain buildings takes place in order to erect some other building, there is a time when the access of light to the plaintiff's property is almost unobstructed, and, accordingly, people in that position are a little bit tempted to exaggerate the injury A that they are going to suffer as the defendants' buildings actually go up. The comparison in their mind sometimes, at any rate, is between what happened when there was no building, and the obstruction day by day and week by week as the erection proceeds. The proposed new building does not, I think it must be admitted, cause anything like the serious obstruction which all of us who are acquainted with light cases have often found to be involved in those cases. It is argued on behalf of the defendants that an B average amount of light over 45 deg. unobstructed, will remain, taking into consideration the whole ridge of the main proposed building and taking into consideration the projected wing. It is agreed that at the projecting wing an obstruction of more than 45 deg. is caused, but it is contended that on the whole ridge of the main proposed building 45 deg. is left to the plaintiff, and that, as I understand what was argued in the court below, was the main point upon which this case, so far as that part of it is con- C cerned, was fought.

I want to make one observation with regard to the daylight plans upon which the plaintiff relied in this case. I think the so-called daylight plans are exceedingly useful as showing the court what amount of obstruction will be caused by the proposed building, and for my part I think they have been very useful in this case. I think also that sections showing the angle of light which will be obstructed by the proposed building D as compared with the light which was previously enjoyed and as compared with the light which the plaintiff might reasonably expect to enjoy, are of great use. But I do not think myself that either daylight plans or sections or angles, or anything like that, can be regarded as in any way conclusive in such a case. I think that so many surrounding circumstances have to be considered, including, of course, the element of locality and including the question whether the plaintiff's premises are situated in town E or country, that no hard and fast mathematical standards can be applied, and I think the House of Lords clearly so decided in the case of Colls (4). The Court of Appeal must have clearly decided it in Kine v. Jolly (9), and the House of Lords, when that case (sub nom. Jolly v. Kine (9)) came to them, never attempted for one moment to restore or to apply the hard and fast mathematical test of an angle of 45 deg. I think myself that the learned judge who heard the evidence has not misdirected himself on this part of F the case at all. He has taken a perfectly correct view as to the weight to be attached in the particular case to the angle of 45 deg. He has cited a number of cases, which I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat, showing what views have been taken by a number of judges on this question of the angle, and, in my opinion, it is impossible for this court to avoid coming to the same conclusion of fact as that to which he has come, namely, that some, at any rate, of the windows of the plaintiff's house, either one or G more of the windows in rooms numbers 1, 3, 4 and 6, have suffered or will suffer an actionable injury by reason of the defendants' proposed building in this sense, that there will be left to some or one of those windows an amount of light such that the enjoyment of the rooms lit by those windows, within the meaning of the phrase as used in the House of Lords, will suffer an actionable nuisance. I should add that daylight plans may, I think, often be exceedingly misleading if the so-called 50–50 rule with regard to the H amount of light which the rooms should enjoy is applied to a room which has any unusual depth in it, or applied to a room where the windows are in any sense unusual, because the light falling at table height from the window at a particular part of the room depends directly upon the depth of the room and the height of the window, and obviously those things have got to be carefully considered in applying the rule.

One thing more will I say on the question whether an actionable injury has been I caused. I should like to express my regret that LORD MACNAGHTEN's suggestion in the Colls Case (4) ([1904] A.C. at p. 192) is so little used in cases of light. A recent rule has been passed, Order XXXVIIA, under which there may be, in certain circumstances, a court expert. But if, for any reason, there is no such expert, I feel very strongly that the words of wisdom of LORD MACNAGHTEN should be remembered—the words where he wonders why the court does not more frequently avail itself of the power of calling in a competent adviser to report to the court upon the question. In all these cases, as we know, there is a great amount of expense involved by the fact that the experts on both sides have diametrically opposed views as to whether there is or is not an actionable injury, and a great deal of time and money is spent in a case where very often an independent expert could give to the court evidence which would help the court very materially in deciding the case and therefore save a great deal of expense.

I turn to the question of remedy, and there I want to say at the outset that, in my opinion, the statement of A. L. SMITH, L.J., in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. (1) ([1895] 1 Ch. at p. 322) has been in certain cases misunderstood, and is, at any rate, not being properly understood, when counsel are arguing that there is a definite working rule applicable to all cases for determining the question whether there should be an injunction or whether the plaintiff should be left to seek his remedy in damages. In the first place, I want to say quite clearly that, for my part, I am of opinion that the learned lord justice, when he laid down what he called a "good working rule," was in that case saying something which was an obiter dictum, for it was not necessary for the decision of the case. The Shelfer Case (1) was, as I think my brethren have pointed out, a case where the vibration and noise caused by the construction and the working of the electric lighting plant were causing actual structural injury to the house, cracks were being created in the building, and the enjoyment of the premises was apparently being rendered almost impossible; as LORD HALSBURY says at the beginning of his judgment ([1895] 1 Ch. at p. 308), and there are other passages which show how serious the injury was. In such a case, apart from any special working rule, there was ample ground for the granting of an injunction. It was a case of continuous injury by noise and vibration, and it is apparent that that case differs enormously from a case where the injury is an interference with an easement of light. Before applying the general rule, which I agree may be of value in a certain number of cases, you have to consider the enormous difference which exists between such a case as there was in Shelfer (1), and such a case as there is here. In the Shelfer Case (1) the plaintiff, if the injunction was refused, was bound to have his house shaken down unless he was constantly underpinning it or repairing cracks, and it looked as though, owing to his proximity to the electric lighting works which were being created, he would never be able to enjoy his house in peace at any time of the year. But in a light case you have a totally different state of things. Take the room where the plaintiff lives here. It cannot be alleged to be uninhabitable now, as the plaintiff could have said his room was in the Shelfer Case (1). That is proved, among other things, by the fact upon which I think counsel for the defendants was entitled to rely for this purpose, that many other ground floor rooms in the locality all over Mayfair will have less light than this room will have when the defendants' premises are completed. The test of nuisance in the case of a light obstruction involves a kind of average based upon the daylight hours during which light comes through the aperture alleged to possess an easement throughout the year. Everybody knows what an enormous difference there is between dawn and midday, but not everybody knows, I think, how enormous the difference is in the light coming through a particular aperture between December and June. It is within the mark, I think, to say that at least five times as much light comes to an ordinary house in June, all other things being equal, as in December, and the effect of an obstruction is not to render a room left with 45 deg. of light uninhabitable, though no doubt it means that a little more artificial light will be used after the obstruction is erected. If I may give an example to show clearly what I mean in this case, I should imagine that if we take an average day as being, say, about April 14, it may be that the plaintiff will find that on April 14 in a particular year he will have only as much light as he would have enjoyed in the old days when Chesterfield House was up, about a fortnight earlier. That is the sort of injury which a plaintiff suffers in such a case as this, and in June and July the possibility is that he will have partly to draw his curtains because he will be getting too much light in his rooms for the ordinary, convenient enjoyment of it. Then I ask myself whether in the Shelfer Case (1) the same rule would have been applied or suggested by A. L. SMITH, L.J., if it had been shown that the City of London Electric Lighting Co. proposed to cause an injury for A ten days, or perhaps a fortnight, and then not one which was of a very serious character. The injury caused by the obstruction of light is of the nature of a temporary nuisance during certain hours of the day. It does not follow from these considerations that the injury does not justify any relief in such a case as this. But the injury may be of a comparatively small character, very different from that which would be occasioned, for instance, if the main building proposed, instead of being 99 ft. way, were merely 50 ft. B away. Accordingly, as I think, the working rule laid down by A. L. SMITH, L.J., is not a universal or even a sound rule in all cases of injury to light, and I would observe, as my brother ROMER has observed, that LINDLEY, L.J., suggested a different rule, which I, for my part, would be perfectly willing to accept. It may be added that he used similar language in the House of Lords in the Colls Case (4), and I rely also on the passage to which ROMER, L.J., has referred in the judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN. If C I may respectfully follow the view expressed by LORD MACNAGHTEN, I think myself that the amount of damages in a light case, unless considered in relation to all the other circumstances, does not afford a satisfactory test.

> "of the reality and gravity of the nuisance no serious denial has been made before us,"

There is one other short passage to which I want to refer, and that is only a few lines in the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., in the case of Slack v. Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society (11) ([1924] 2 Ch. at p. 494); it is a passage with which I think, so far D as I can judge, the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and WARRINGTON, L.J., agreed. He said this, after considering the argument put forward there on behalf of the plaintiff, which resembled to a great extent the argument put forward here on behalf of the plaintiff:

> "In my judgment there is still left a border-line of cases with regard to the obstruction of light where the injury may be sufficiently substantial to justify some relief, E and yet may be of so comparatively small a character as to be properly and adequately compensated by damages."

That phrase precisely represents the view which, after very careful consideration, I have formed with regard to the facts in the present case, and accordingly I agree with my learned brethren in thinking that there must be here an inquiry as to damages in lieu of an injunction, and in other respects I fully concur with what they have said. F

Appeal allowed on first point. On second point case remitted to Crossman, J., for assessment of damages.

IN THE ESTATE OF LEVER

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Langton, J.), October 23, December 5, 1935]

Probate—Leave to swear to death—Special grant of administration—Grant to person not primarily entitled—Applications in single motion—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict., c. 77), s. 73—Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49), s. 162—Administration of Justice Act, 1928 (18 & 19 Geo. 5, c. 26), s. 9.

It is open to the court to grant leave to swear that a person died on or since a certain date and to grant letters of administration under the special statutory powers of the court to someone not primarily entitled to representation on a motion combining the two applications.

Where it is uncertain if a person presumed deceased died before or after Jan. 1, 1926, the special powers of the court under s. 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, or under the equivalent provisions relating to deaths after 1925, may be alternatively exercised in making a grant to someone not primarily entitled, if the persons entitled in priority decline to take out representation.

Notes. As to applications for leave to swear death, see 16 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 191, para. 326. As to grants of administration under the special statutory powers of the court, see 16 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 224, para. 410. For the Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 73 and the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 162, see 9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 692, 777.

Probate Motion

The court was prayed for leave to swear that the death of Mrs. Ida Gertrude Lever had occurred on or since Jan. 1, 1894, and for a grant of administration of her estate under the special powers provided by s. 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, or the equivalent provisions relating to deaths after 1925.

The presumed deceased, who had been living apart from her husband, was last heard of in Paris in 1893. Her husband died in 1914. She was entitled to an interest in one-third of the unappointed funds subject to the marriage settlement of her parents, now deceased.

The applicant, Miss Evelyn E. W. Gardner, was the residuary legatee under the will of the deceased's mother (who died in 1932), and she prayed for a joint grant to herself and an assurance company. Inquiries had been made in vain to discover if the deceased were still alive, or if she had left any children. Thus there was no evidence to show whether the deceased survived her husband or a sister of hers, who had died in 1923, a spinster, intestate. In the latter event the deceased (Mrs. Lever), if alive, would have been entitled to further trust funds. It had been arranged that the administrators of the deceased should pay over her estate to the executor of the deceased's mother and the executor of the deceased's husband in two equal shares, and an insurance policy had been taken out covering all risks incurred by the arrangement.

F. L. C. Hodson, on behalf of the applicant, asked for leave to swear that the deceased had died on or since Jan. 1, 1894, and for a joint grant to Miss Gardner and the Guardian Assurance Company.

LANGTON, J., raised the question whether the two applications could be made in one motion according to practice.

Hodson.—There is no rule to the contrary, and a precedent for such a course appears in Form No. 47 at p. 1055 of MORTIMER ON PROBATE (2nd Edn.).

LANGTON, J., made an order in the terms of the motion, having regard to the special circumstances.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Greer, Slesser and Roche, L.JJ.), February 5, 6, 7, March 1, 1935]

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 113; 104 L.J.K.B. 549; 153 L.T. 245]

Account Stated—Action on—Entries in balance sheet of company showing indebtedness of director—Claim against director.

Company—Director—Powers of management given to directors—Control by shareholders.

Practice—Striking out action—Want of authority—Procedure.

An objection by the defendant to an action to the plaintiff's right to sue should be taken by an interlocutory motion or summons, but, if that procedure is not adopted and the matter goes to trial and the court is informed of facts which prove conclusively that the action before the court has been brought without the authority of the person named as plaintiff, the action should be struck out: Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. (1), [1916] 2 A.C. 307, applied. The court ought not to ignore evidence of lack of authority either to bring an action or to defend it and give judgment in favour of or against a party who, ex hypothesi, is not in court. If the question of authority is left in doubt the right course for the court to take is to try the action and give judgment according to the evidence, leaving the losing party to apply to set aside the judgment on the ground that he had never authorised the action or the defence as the case might be: Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Mulhouse (2), [1925] A.C. 112, explained.

If powers of management are vested in the directors of a company, they and they alone can exercise those powers. The only way in which the general body of the shareholders can control the exercise of powers vested by the articles in the directors is by altering the articles of the company or refusing to re-elect the directors of whose actions they disapprove. They cannot usurp the powers which by the articles are vested in the directors: Quin & Axtens, Ltd. v. Salmon (3), [1909] A.C. 442, applied.

The balance sheet of a company was signed by two directors of the company who were indebted to the company in sums specified in the balance sheet.

Held: the balance sheet was not an account rendered to the directors by the company as creditors and accepted by the directors as debtors; it was a statement by the company of the state of their assets and liabilities, and not a debtor and creditor statement between the company and the directors; it was signed by the directors as directors and not in their personal capacity; and, therefore, it was not an account stated between the parties on which the company could sue the directors for the amount of their indebtedness.

Appeals from orders made by du Parcq, J., in two actions tried together by him at Manchester Assizes.

The actions were brought by the plaintiff company, which was registered as a private company, against John Shaw and Peter Shaw, who were, with others, directors of the company, claiming against Peter Shaw £11,483 4s., and against John Shaw £15,088 18s. 9d., being the amounts "found and admitted to be due to the plaintiffs as shown by the plaintiffs' balance sheet" dated Dec. 31, 1932. By their defences each defendant denied that the alleged or any account was stated between the plaintiffs and him. Each defendant pleaded that the demand for payment had been made without the authority required under the articles of association of the company, and they relied on a resolution passed at an extraordinary meeting of the company requiring the chairman to instruct the company's solicitors to discontinue the action.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Greer, L.J.

By art. 95 of the articles of association:

> "The business of the company shall be managed by the directors who . . . may exercise all such powers of the company and do on behalf of the company all such acts as may be exercised and done by the company and as are not by the statutes or by these articles required to be exercised or done by the company in general meeting, subject nevertheless to any regulations of these articles, to the provisions of the statutes, and to such regulations being not inconsistent with the aforesaid regulations or provisions as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting, but no regulation made by the company in general meeting shall invalidate any prior act of the directors which would have been valid if such regulation had not been made."

The articles of association as subsequently altered provided:

> "84. The directors of the company shall be eight in number of whom three shall hold office as permanent directors as hereinafter defined and five shall be ordinary directors. The first permanent directors shall be Ernest Farrell, Charles Halliday, and Mark Wheatley Jones. The ordinary directors shall, subject to the provisions of these articles, be the present board, namely, Peter Shaw, John Shaw, Percy Shaw, John Bryan Shaw, and James Fitzgerald Fern. . . . A

"86. As from Aug. 18, 1933, three of the ordinary directors of the company shall be Peter Shaw, John Shaw, and Percy Shaw, and they shall remain as ordinary directors during their respective lives, so long as they devote their whole time and attention to the business of the company. . . . B

"86A. The said Peter Shaw, John Shaw, and Percy Shaw as directors shall have no control over, and no right to deal with, on behalf of the company, any of the debts due from them or any of them mentioned in the said terms of settlement, and shall have no right as shareholders to vote on any matter connected with such debts and shall have no right either themselves or through their nominees to vote on any question affecting their position as directors either directly or indirectly. C

"87. The ordinary directors, including the said Peter Shaw, John Shaw, and Percy Shaw, shall have no right at directors' meetings to vote in respect of, nor shall they have any control over, the financial affairs of the company, and with regard to the management of the company's business they shall have only such rights of voting and such control over the management as may from time to time be conferred upon them by the permanent directors. . . . D

"111. The permanent directors shall appoint one of themselves as chairman of the company, and another permanent director vice-chairman, and the chairman or in his absence the vice-chairman shall preside at meetings of directors. If at any meeting neither the chairman nor vice-chairman is present within five minutes after the time appointed for holding the same the remaining permanent director shall be chairman. No board meeting shall be held unless at least one permanent E director is present.

"121A. All dividends payable on the ordinary shares held by Peter Shaw, John Shaw, and Percy Shaw at the date of this resolution shall be retained by the company on account of the debts mentioned in the said terms of settlement until the said debts are liquidated. Except as above provided that said debts shall not be called in or the charges mentioned in the said agreement enforced for a period F of twenty years from the date of this resolution except in the event of a creditors' winding-up of the company, and this clause shall be so construed that after the death of any one or more of them the said Peter Shaw, John Shaw, and Percy Shaw his estate shall be entitled to the benefit thereof."

Cur. adv. vult.

March 1.—The following judgments were read.

GREER, L.J.—The defendant Peter Shaw in the first of these two appeals, which were H heard together, and the defendant John Shaw in the second, ask this court to reverse the judgment of the trial judge who decided that they were liable to pay to the plaintiff company the respective sums of £11,483 4s. in their action against Peter Shaw, and the sum of £15,088 18s. 9d. in their action against John Shaw.

The cause of action alleged in both actions was money due on an account stated. The claim was based on the defendants' signatures as directors of the company to a I balance sheet in which the sums above mentioned were entered as balances at debit of the defendants respectively. The facts relevant to the determination of the questions involved in the appeal are fully and accurately stated in the judgment of the trial judge, DU PARCQ, J., and I need not state them in detail, but in order to make my judgment intelligible I find it necessary to state what the situation of the parties was immediately before June 17, 1932, when the terms of settlement of two actions were provisionally agreed by the company and the defendants and their brother Percy Shaw, and the events that followed the settlement.

These three brothers were the principal shareholders in the company, and together with James Bryan Shaw and James Fitzgerald Fern they formed the board of directors. Peter Shaw was governing director with large powers which, under the articles of association, as they then were, gave him absolute power to carry on the business of the company as he thought fit, without consulting the other members of the directorate. Subject to his overriding powers, the other two brothers and Mr. Fern were entitled to exercise the powers exercisable by the directors under the articles. Percy Shaw had, in 1925, admitted that he had become indebted to the company in respect of moneys and property of the company which he had wrongfully used for his own purposes in the sum of £13,150, and had given to the company a mortgage or charge on all his assets to secure the payment of this debt.

In 1931 Percy Shaw appears to have discovered, as the fact was, that his two brothers, Peter and John, had been guilty of similar defalcations or breaches of duty to the company. It seems probable that this course had been pursued by the three brothers in order to conceal their true incomes from the income tax authorities. In all probability they did not defraud the other shareholders of the company to any serious extent, as, if they had not in years of prosperity taken the money or property of the company for their private purposes directly, they would have been entitled to much larger dividends than they received on their share, but in that case the income tax authorities would have received from the company and from the three brothers much larger sums in respect of income tax and super tax than they in fact received.

When Percy Shaw discovered that he was not the only black sheep in the flock, he instituted two actions in the Chancery Court of the county palatine of Lancaster. In the first of these actions he claimed that an account should be decreed against his brothers, and payment to the company of the amount found due on taking the account. The parties to this action were Percy Shaw as plaintiff, Peter Shaw, John Shaw and the company as defendants. The other action was for an injunction to restrain his removal from the offices of manager and secretary, which he then held. The defendants Peter Shaw and John Shaw delivered a defence to the first of these two actions in these words:

> "1. Save that there are certain inaccuracies in the particulars given in para. 6 of the statement of claim, these defendants admit all the allegations contained in the statement of claim and will submit to judgment as claimed therein."

The business of the company was a family business, the shares in the main being held by the three brothers and their relations, and it was felt by their advisers for many reasons eminently desirable that the action and all disputes should be settled. Negotiations for a settlement resulted in an agreement signed by counsel for the company, for Peter Shaw and John Shaw, and for Percy Shaw. The agreement is dated June 7, 1932. It is not in dispute that the three brothers authorised the signing of this agreement, and were bound by it from the time of its signature. But by cl. 14 of the agreement it was stated that the agreement was not to be binding on the company until the consent of the shareholders was obtained by the three brothers "so as to make the said arrangements binding on the company." This clause and cl. 15 have such an important bearing on the questions to be decided in this appeal that I think it necessary to read both of these clauses in full:

> "14. For the carrying out of the above terms the said Peter John and Percy Shaw shall execute and do all such deeds agreements acts and things as may be necessary and shall procure that the company's articles of association are altered and the consent of the shareholders obtained so as to make the said arrangements binding on the company. Peter John and Percy Shaw shall not vote at any meeting of the company called for the purpose of approving or carrying out the said arrangements."
> "15. The costs of altering the company's articles and the costs of Peter John and Percy Shaw of any negotiations deeds agreements acts and things preliminary to or executed or done for the purpose of carrying out this agreement are to be paid by the company. These terms must be embodied in an agreement under seal between Peter John and Percy Shaw and the company such agreement to be > conditional on the company passing the necessary special resolutions and the company's bank being willing to allow the same to be carried out." A

In my judgment, as soon as the shareholders approved the agreement it became binding on all the parties. It was not a mere proposal of the terms to be embodied in a deed. It was, in my judgment, a concluded agreement, subject to the condition that the company should pass the necessary resolutions, and the company's bank should allow the same to be carried out. It was common ground that these conditions were complied with. B The agreement was not conditional on the execution of a contract under seal. It merely contained as one of its terms that such a deed should be executed.

The material terms of this agreement are accurately stated by DU PARCQ, J., in these words:

> "Those terms of settlement provided that Peter Shaw should resign his office of C governing director and that the company should appoint two quite independent persons to be permanent directors of the company; Peter, John and Percy Shaw were to be ordinary directors; the articles were to be regulated, so as to provide that Peter, John and Percy Shaw should have no control over and no right to vote in respect of the debts due from them or any of them; Mr. Halliday, an accountant, was to be appointed to investigate the affairs of the company and certify the aggregate D liability of the three brothers to the company; Peter, John and Percy Shaw were to admit that they were responsible for all defalcations which had occurred and their liability was to be made one undivided fund, but without interest, and for this fund each of them was to be jointly and severally liable, but as between themselves and their personal representatives liable in equal one-third shares. No interest was to be charged on the fund. The deed of mortgage given by Percy Shaw E in 1926 was to be cancelled, and in its place, Peter, John and Percy Shaw were to charge all their private assets still remaining to the company on account of the joint indebtedness—I say in passing, it seems to me that there could be no doubt still remaining at the date of these terms of agreement. Then there is a provision that dividends were to be paid by the company; dividends payable to Peter, John and Percy Shaw were to be retained by the company on account of the debt F and the debt was not to be called in or the charges enforced for a period of twenty years except in the event of a creditors' winding-up of the company. The articles of association were to be altered and the brothers were to procure that they should be altered. Then finally comes this clause: 'These terms must be embodied in an agreement under seal'—there was an obvious reason for that, the debt was not to be called in for twenty years—'between Peter, John and Percy Shaw and the company G such agreement to be conditional on the company passing the necessary special resolutions and the company's bank being willing to allow the same to be carried out.' There was a modification of those terms of settlement on July 18, 1933, to which I think I need not refer."

It is clear that these terms of settlement were provisional in the sense that they would only become the terms of a contract binding as between the company and the three H brothers when the shareholders at an extraordinary general meeting should pass a resolution approving of the terms—see cls. 4 and 14 of the terms of settlement. It seems equally clear that when such a resolution was passed, the terms of settlement became a contract binding on all parties, to be carried out in the manner there set out.

As it seemed reasonably certain that the terms would be approved by the shareholders, Mr. Halliday commenced his investigations without waiting for the share- I holders' approval. By such investigations he assessed at the figure of £47,226 18s. 8d., the amount which was to be debited to the three brothers as owing by them to the company jointly and severally, and payable as set out in the terms of settlement. Though they were all to be jointly and severally indebted to the company, and were entitled to have set off against the total indebtedness all sums due from the company to them or any of them, as between themselves they were to be debited with one-third of the total, and have credit for any moneys due to them respectively by the company, and any payments they might make an account as against their several third shares of the total. Having ascertained these figures, Mr. Halliday prepared the balance sheet which is dated Dec. 31, 1932. He admitted at the trial that he carried out his investigations and prepared his figures under the terms of settlement. On March 18, 1933, he sent a copy of the proposed balance sheet to Peter Shaw with a copy for John Shaw. Peter Shaw took Mr. Halliday's letter and the balance sheet to his solicitors, Messrs. Richard Hilditch and Sons, and correspondence took place between them and Mr. Halliday's firm. It is unnecessary to refer to this correspondence. Its substance was that it raised several points for the consideration of Mr. Halliday, and, in particular, pointed out that the balance sheet should show that the total liability was a joint liability of the three brothers. Mr. Halliday answered that, having regard to the accounts, he had to show the amount as divided in equal parts, because "drawings and repayments were dealt with in each director's account," and he added: "The total amount due by directors is clearly shown on the face of the balance sheet." He obviously did not intend his balance sheet to be inconsistent with the terms of the settlement. He regarded it as showing the total debt payable as provided by the terms of settlement, and entered the several debts in order to show how much the three directors were entitled to by way of set-off or payment on account. It is, however, manifest that the balance sheet as it stands would be very misleading to anyone unacquainted with the terms of settlement. The total amount of the joint and several indebtedness of the three brothers should have appeared as one item, and its value as an asset ought to have been discounted by the fact that it was not payable for twenty years. However this may be, it is clear that in putting forward the balance sheet Mr. Halliday was not presenting it for signature by the directors as an account independent of the terms of settlement, but rather as one which was intentionally drawn up in consequence of the settlement terms, and as in no way inconsistent therewith.

On Aug. 18, 1933, an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was held, and resolutions were passed as required by the terms of settlement approving those terms with some amendments that had in the meantime been agreed to by counsel for all parties, and altering the articles of association in such a way as to carry out the terms of the agreement so approved. The minutes of this meeting were not put in, but it was not in dispute that the resolutions were duly passed. They are recited in the deed afterwards prepared for sealing and in fact sealed by the company.

Clause 8 of the terms of settlement provides that the three brothers were to be bound by the total liability as certified by Mr. Halliday. No formal certificate was produced at the trial, but the brothers on Sept. 25 signed the following letter:

> "To the Permanent Board of Directors, John Shaw & Sons (Salford) Ltd.—Dear Sirs,—In accordance with clause 8 of the terms of settlement, dated June 17, 1933, we hereby agree our liability to the company (which has been made one undivided fund for which each of us is jointly and severally liable in equal one-third shares) to be £47,226 18s. 3d. as certified by Mr. Halliday. (Signed) Peter Shaw, John Shaw, Percy Shaw."

The annual general meeting of the company was held on Oct. 23, and the balance sheet prepared by Mr. Halliday, and by this time signed by Peter and John Shaw as directors, was passed by the shareholders. It did not appear from any evidence given at the trial when they signed the balance sheet. I think it was probably signed on some date between Sept. 25 and Oct. 23. However this may be, it is clear that they signed it after the terms of settlement had become a binding agreement. As Mr. Halliday and his co-directors, and I think all the shareholders, had approved the agreement, their signatures, if they could be treated as an admission at all, could only be an admission of a debt ascertained and admitted by them under the terms of settlement, and therefore as a debt not presently payable, but payable in twenty years. The fact that they afterwards failed or refused to comply with one of the terms of the agreement could not alter the meaning of their signature, which must be interpreted having regard to the circumstances as they existed at the date when they signed the document.

In December, 1933, disputes arose as to the meaning of the terms of settlement which still remained to be performed, and letters passed between the solicitors for Peter and John Shaw, and the solicitors for the company. Most of the points raised were satisfactorily settled by agreement between the two firms, but it transpired that the two brothers had disposed of some of their assets which remained at the date of the terms of settlement to enable them to settle certain claims of the revenue authorities, and they wanted a clause in the deed, the draft of which was under consideration, relieving them from responsibility, and they refused to sign the deed, as it was not within their power to charge their assets as they were at the date when the terms of settlement were signed, or even as they were when those terms were approved by the company. They, undoubtedly, committed a serious breach of the terms of settlement.

At this time, pursuant to the company's articles as they had been altered in accordance with the terms of settlement, the directors consisted of two categories—permanent directors and ordinary directors. The permanent directors were Ernest Farrell, Charles Halliday, and Mark Wheatley Jones; the ordinary directors were Peter Shaw, John Shaw, Percy Shaw, John Bryan Shaw, and James Fitzgerald Fern. John Bryan Shaw was a son of John Shaw.

On March 16, 1934, the three permanent directors held a meeting, to which none of the ordinary directors were summoned. The permanent directors carried a resolution by two to one to instruct the company's solicitors to issue the writs in this action. Accordingly, the solicitors caused two specially indorsed writs to be issued. The statement of claim indorsed on the writ in the action against Peter Shaw was in the words following:

> "The plaintiffs' claim is £11,483 4s. upon an account stated between the plaintiffs and the defendant. Particulars: Dec. 31, 1932: To amount found and admitted by the defendant to be due to the plaintiffs as shown by the plaintiffs' balance sheet of this date £11,483 4s. Amount claimed £11,483 4s."

The statement of claim in the action against John Shaw was similar except that the amount claimed was £15,088 18s. 9d.

The defendants answered the claim in two ways. They contended (i) that the facts as proved or admitted failed to establish a cause of action for money due under an account stated or any cause of action whatsoever; (ii) that the permanent directors had no authority to commence the action on behalf of the company, and as the company were, therefore, not before the court no judgment could be given in their favour.

I deal first with the second of these contentions. No objection was taken at the trial that the court could not decide the second point on the ground that it is not a matter of defence, but only a ground for a motion to stay the action and make the unauthorised individuals and the solicitors pay the costs, and the question of authority was fully argued and decided by the trial judge in the plaintiffs' favour.

In the appeal, however, counsel for the company did contend that the court was bound in law to refuse to consider the question whether the action was instituted by the authorised agents of the company. As will be seen presently, I am of opinion that the action was commenced and carried on by the authority of agents clothed with authority by the company's articles, and that the meeting of the shareholders on April 30, 1934, had no power to order the chairman to instruct the solicitors to discontinue the actions. If this be right, the preliminary question whether this court is entitled or is not entitled to decide the question of authority does not arise, but, as my view as to the meaning and effect of the relevant articles may not be accepted, I propose to say something about the preliminary question whether the court can entertain the question at all.

In my judgment, neither Lord Cave nor Lord Atkinson, nor Atkin, L.J., by what they said in Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Mulhouse (2), intended to lay down as a rule of law that when it is clear from the evidence given in an action that the supposed plaintiff did not authorise the bringing of the action, the court is bound to allow the action to go on to judgment, and thereby allow judgment to be obtained in favour of a person or company ex hypothesi not present in court and not asking for a judgment, or against a person or company who have not been served with process and have never instructed anyone to appear on their behalf.

I understand Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. (1) to be a decision to the effect that where the court is informed of facts which prove conclusively that the solicitors had an authority to bring the action, the action should be struck out. The want of authority was established by the failure of proof that the Continental Company had before the war clothed the English secretary with authority to commence actions on their behalf, and the incapacity of the enemy directors in whom authority to bring actions was vested after the war had begun made it clear to demonstration that the action was unauthorised.

In Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Mulhouse (2) the court held that the evidence established that the English representative of the Russian corporation had authority to bring the action, but LORD CAVE, LORD ATKINSON and ATKIN, L.J., went beyond what was necessary to decide the case and expressed the opinion that the point of want of authority could not be raised by way of defence, but ought to be raised by notice of motion to stay or dismiss the action. These observations do not, in my judgment, mean that if the facts actually put in evidence prove that the solicitors commenced the proceedings without any authority from the named plaintiff, the court ought to ignore those facts and give judgment in favour of or against a party who ex hypothesi is not present in court. In my opinion, the court has inherent jurisdiction to say:

> "As it is clearly established that the action has been brought by solicitors who were not authorised by the named plaintiff to bring it, we will strike it out."

They would not, then, be entitled to award costs against the nominal plaintiff, nor would they as a rule make any order that the solicitor should pay the costs, but would leave these matters to be determined on a motion to which the solicitors would be parties. On the other hand, if the question of authority were left in doubt, the right course for the court to take would be to try the action, and give judgment according to the evidence, leaving the losing party to apply to set aside the judgment on the ground that he had never authorised the action or the defence, as the case might be.

In the present case, in the view I take of the company's new articles, the preliminary point does not arise. Articles 86A and 87 of the articles are couched in the negative. In form they say what powers the three brothers and the ordinary directors shall not have, but they necessarily have the same meaning they would have if framed in a positive form. Article 86A restricts the rights and duties of the three brothers, and prohibits them as directors from dealing on behalf of the company with any of the debts due from them under the terms of settlement. It has the same effect as it would have had if it had said: "the directors other than the three brothers shall alone have power on behalf of the company to control the conduct of the company with regard to such debts, and the sole right to deal with them." Article 86A alone would not have had the effect of excluding the two additional directors, John Bryan Shaw and James Fitzgerald Fern, from control over or from dealing with these debts, but art. 87 has a wider effect than 86A. This article applies to all the ordinary directors, and not only restricts their rights at directors' meetings to vote in respect of, but it also provides that they shall have no control over, the financial affairs of the company, and that they shall only have such rights of voting and such control over the management as may from time to time be conferred upon them by the permanent directors. The effect of this article is the same as it would have been if it had provided that the power of control over the financial affairs of the company, and all powers of management of the affairs of the company, except such as might from time to time be conferred upon the ordinary directors by the permanent directors, should be vested in the three permanent directors alone. The effect of these articles may be illustrated by saying the same result is achieved if you say eight minus five, as if you say three. There is no evidence that any, or, if so, what, powers of management had been conferred on the ordinary directors by the permanent directors.

In my judgment, on March 23, 1934, when the permanent directors decided to instruct the company's solicitors to bring these actions on behalf of the company, they had power under the articles to do so. The power was not in the board of directors, but in the permanent directors. The ordinary directors were not entitled to any say on the question, which was the only one considered at the meeting. If they had been summoned and had come to the meeting they could have been directed by the permanent directors to retire and could not have refused.

It seems to me in any case to be carrying technicality to an absurd length to say they ought to have been summoned to the meeting in order that they might be directed to retire. I do not, and am not entitled to differ from the decision of this court in Young v. Ladies' Imperial Club, Ltd. (4), and Re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Ltd., Badman's Case, Bosanquet's Case (5). Those decisions mean that a meeting of directors having power to make a decision on a given matter is invalid if one of the directors entitled to take part has not been summoned. The decisions have no relation to the question we have to determine.

It was further argued that the power of the permanent directors to institute actions on behalf of the company was so restricted by art. 121A that it did not extend to the present actions. I fail to appreciate the force of this argument. Assuming that an agent's authority to bring actions is established, the principal is bound by what the agent does within the scope of his authority. The fact that the action is one that cannot succeed does not limit the authority of the agent, though it may give the principal a right to complain of the conduct of his agent, and to recover damages from him for his breach of duty as agent. Further, in this case the action was not brought for money due under the terms of settlement, or for money due under art. 121A. The action was based on a cause of action which arose out of the defendants' signature to the balance sheet, and this cause of action, whether likely to succeed or not, was one in respect of which the permanent directors were, in my opinion, empowered to commence the suit and carry it on.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the learned judge was right in refusing to dismiss the action on the plea that it was commenced without the authority of the plaintiff company. I think the judge was also right in refusing to give effect to the resolution of the meeting of the shareholders requiring the chairman to instruct the company's solicitors not to proceed further with the action. A company is an entity distinct alike from its shareholders and its directors. Some of its powers may, according to its articles, be exercised by directors; certain other powers may be reserved for the shareholders in general meeting. If powers of management are vested in the directors, they and they alone can exercise these powers. The only way in which the general body of the shareholders can control the exercise of the powers vested by the articles in the directors is by altering their articles, or, if opportunity arises under the articles, by refusing to re-elect the directors of whose actions they disapprove. They cannot themselves usurp the powers which by the articles are vested in the directors any more than the directors can usurp the powers vested by the articles in the general body of shareholders. The law on this subject is, I think, accurately stated in Buckley on Companies (11th Edn.) at p. 723, as the effect of the decisions there mentioned.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the court ought not to dismiss the action on the ground that it was instituted and carried on without the authority of the plaintiff company.

It remains for me to consider whether the action ought to have failed on other grounds. I am satisfied that judgment should have been given for the defendants on the ground that no cause of action for money due on an account stated was established by the proved or admitted facts. If the balance sheet could in any sense be treated as an account stated, I am inclined to think that it would be one of the second class of cases referred to by Lord Cave in Camillo Tank Steamship Co. v. Alexandria Engineering Works (6), but it is unnecessary to decide this point because, for reasons I am about to state, I think the balance sheet was not an account stated at all, either of the first, second, or third kind mentioned by Lord Cave.

I am of opinion, first, that the balance sheet was not an account stated between the company as creditors, and accepted by the defendants, so as to involve a fresh promise to pay the amounts stated at debit of the defendants, and, secondly, if it be an account stated in the sense of an admission by a debtor or an agreement to pay a balance of account, the only promise to pay which can in the circumstances be implied is a promise not to pay in præsenti, but a promise to pay in twenty years' time.

As to the first point, the balance sheet was not an account rendered to the defendants by the company as creditors and accepted by the defendants as debtors. It was a statement by the company of the state of their assets and liabilities. As such a statement it was inaccurate, but, though by signing it the directors who signed and those who did not sign, but agreed to the presentation of the balance sheet to the shareholders, vouched its accuracy, this did not make it a debtor and creditor statement between the company and the defendants. It was not signed by the defendants in their personal capacity; it was signed on behalf of all the directors as a statement by the directors to the shareholders of the state of their assets and liabilities. It was not a contract by the company to accept in place of the £47,226 18s. 3d. to which they were entitled in twenty years' time from the two defendants the sums debited to them in the balance sheet. Nor was it a contract by the two defendants severally to pay immediately the sums debited to them in the balance sheet. It was only an inaccurate statement by the board of the assets of the company, which might have landed them in difficulties and liabilities to shareholders who suffered damage by acting in the belief that the statements in the balance sheet were true. I have, however, very little doubt but that most, if not all, of the shareholders knew the real state of the facts. The company was a family concern.

As to the second point, all the directors knew at the time the balance sheet was signed that it was not intended in any way to alter the effect of the terms of settlement. It falls to be interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and if the defendants can be treated as making any promise to pay, such promise is implied and not express, and in the light of the surrounding circumstances it should have been held to be a promise to pay in twenty years, and not a promise to pay immediately.

For these reasons the action should have failed, and it seems unnecessary to deal with the contention of the company that when the writ was issued the settlement agreement had ceased to be binding by reason of the defendants' liability to grant the agreed charges on their assets, and their refusal to sign the deed. This is not a case of repudiation before the date of performance has arrived. When the defendants refused to perform the terms of the contract that still remained, that is, to give the agreed charges, and to sign the deed, the greater part of the agreement had been already performed by the defendants, and the company had had the benefit of the terms so performed. All the terms numbered one to eight inclusive had been effectually carried out. Peter Shaw had given up his exceptional powers as governing director; the articles had been altered so as to deprive the ordinary directors of such powers of management as they previously had, and to leave their powers subject to the discretion of the permanent directors. It is possible that the company might have been entitled to rescind the contract, by reason of a breach of a fundamental term, but they could not continue to retain the benefits of the agreement so far as it had been performed and at the same time insist that the agreement was no longer binding on them. It does not seem reasonable or just that the permanent directors should exercise the power to commence and carry on an action which they never would have had if the terms of settlement had not been agreed to, while at the same time saying the other contracting parties have ceased to have any right to the benefits conferred by the agreement. They cannot exercise the powers given to them by art. 86A and 87 and successfully contend that the appellants were not entitled to the suspension of liability for twenty years provided for under the terms of settlement and in art. 121A, which continued to operate as one of the articles of association of the company.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal succeeds, and judgment should be entered for the defendants against the company.

SLESSER, L.J.—In this case the material facts have been stated by GREER, L.J., in his judgment, and on them two fundamental questions fall to be decided. First, the initial question whether the plaintiff company have shown any title in the circumstances of the case to sue at all, and, secondly, if they are before the court, whether their claim is well founded.

The action is brought against two defendants, John and Peter Shaw, who were at all material times directors of the plaintiff company, for amounts said to be found and admitted by them to be due upon accounts stated between the plaintiff company and the defendants respectively. The sums claimed in each case differ, but the issues in the two cases are identical; the actions have been consolidated and have been treated throughout as one matter.

The procedural grounds upon which the appellants contend that the "action is altogether irregular and should be struck out"—to use the language of Lord Parker in Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain) Ltd. (1) ([1916] 2 A.C. at p. 348),

> "are three in number: first, they say that the persons who authorised the issue of the writs on behalf of the company had no power in the circumstances so to act, in that they purported to act as, but were not, a meeting of the directors, who alone could exercise such power; secondly, they say that under the articles, in particular art. 95, the power of the directors to do, on behalf of the company, all such acts as the company might do is limited in that they must act in a manner subject to the articles and that the amended art. 121A of the articles of association expressly excludes such an action at law as was here taken; and, thirdly, they contend that, by reason of a resolution passed by the shareholders at an extraordinary meeting on April 30, 1934, directing the chairman of directors to instruct the company's solicitors to discontinue the action forthwith, thereafter, whatever authority the directors or any of them had to bring or continue the action was determined."

To all these objections counsel for the respondents argues that, in any event, the whole matter cannot properly be raised as a defence in these proceedings.

I propose to deal with these contentions seriatim. First, as to the authority of the persons who started the actions to act for the company: under the articles of association, as amended on Aug. 18, 1932, there are constituted, by art. 84, eight directors, of whom three hold office as permanent directors, and five are ordinary directors. The permanent directors were a Mr. Farrell, Mr. Halliday, and Mr. Jones. These three alone were summoned to a meeting at Mr. Farrell's office some time before the issue of the writs, when the actions were then decided upon and solicitors instructed by a majority vote of Mr. Farrell and Mr. Halliday, Mr. Jones dissenting. The five ordinary directors, who were, admittedly, not summoned or present, consisted of the defendants, their brother Percy Shaw and two other gentlemen—John Bryan Shaw and James Fitzgerald Fern.

I entertain no doubt that if it was necessary under the articles that a valid decision to bring an action must be arrived at at a meeting of the directors, that no such meeting was then held, by reason of the failure to summon the ordinary directors. The authority, if authority be needed for such a conclusion, is to be found in the case of Re Homer District Consolidated Mines, Ex parte Smith (7), where, on a failure to summon certain directors to a board meeting, North, J., said (39 Ch. D. at p. 551):

> "I come to the conclusion that what was done on that occasion was not the act of the board of directors, and did not bind the company"

(Re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Ltd., Badman's Case, Bosanquet's Case (5); and on the same principle in this court, Young v. Ladies' Imperial Club, Ltd. (4) are to the same effect.) As was stated in D'Arcy v. The Tamar, Kit Hill, and Callington Rail. Co. (8) it is > "quite clear that the directors are to act together, and in a meeting"

—per Martin, B. (L.R. 2 Exch. at p. 161). But the argument in this case proceeds upon another footing, for it is said that the peculiar powers conferred upon the permanent directors by these articles, and the exclusion of the ordinary directors from all the management of the affairs of the company, enabled the permanent directors to authorise the starting of proceedings as a part of their exclusive powers.

It, therefore, becomes necessary to examine in some detail what powers are so given to the permanent directors to the exclusion of the ordinary directors. It is clear from art. 111, as amended in the revised articles of Aug. 18, 1932, that it is contemplated that at a board meeting the ordinary members shall normally have the right to attend, for it is there provided that "no board meeting shall be held unless at least one permanent director is present," and further, that, the chairman and vice-chairman being absent, "the remaining permanent director shall be chairman." This may be construed in connection with art. 109, which provides, inter alia, that "unless otherwise determined two shall be a quorum, and in the case of an equality of votes, the chairman shall have a second or casting vote." So that at a board meeting it is clearly contemplated that ordinary members have a right to attend and constitute a part of the board.

The articles which give special powers to the permanent directors must next be considered. Under art. 95 of the original articles it was provided that, generally subject to the powers of the governing director under arts. 89–92, the business of the company should be managed by the directors. By art. 93 the directors might, from time to time, appoint some of their body to be managing directors and vest such of the powers as were in the directors in the managing directors on such terms as they might think fit. By the amended articles, arts. 89–92 as to the governing director were cancelled, but not art. 95, the provisions of which, however, became subject to the amending arts. 86A and 87. Art. 86A is concerned only with the two defendants and their brother, Percy Shaw. Art. 87 concerns all the ordinary directors, that is to say, in addition to those three gentlemen, it affects John Bryan Shaw and James Fern. It is convenient to consider art. 87 first, because, if the permanent directors had no authority to authorise these proceedings without inviting John Bryan Shaw and James Fern to their meeting, it must follow, subject to matters still to be considered, that the authorisation would be defective, apart altogether from the special cases of the two defendants and their brother, Percy Shaw. I do not find that the learned judge, in his judgment, deals with the cases of John Bryan Shaw and Mr. Fern at all. They had no interest in any of the debts due from Peter, John, and Percy Shaw to the company, which are dealt with under art. 86A, and the observations of FARWELL, J., in Re Greymouth Point Elizabeth Rail. and Coal Co., Yuill v. Greymouth Point Elizabeth Rail. and Coal Co. (9) ([1904] 1 Ch. at p. 35), as to their being "interested against the company" can have no application to them on any general principle, and, if they could be excluded, it could only be by reason of the specific provisions of art. 87.

Article 87, so far as it is here material, provides that > "the ordinary directors . . . shall have no right at directors' meetings to vote in respect of, nor shall they have any control over, the financial affairs of the company, and with regard to the management of the company's business they shall have only such rights of voting and such control over the management as may from time to time be conferred upon them by the permanent directors."

In fact, the permanent directors did not at any time confer upon them any rights of voting or control over management. So that, in the result, the ordinary directors have no vote either on financial affairs or the management of the company's business. But it is to be noticed that it is at a directors' meeting, which for the reasons I have given they would be entitled to attend, that the article provides that they are debarred from the right to vote. Article 87 appears to contemplate their presence, but a limitation of their powers at such a meeting. So far as regards a directors' meeting, I cannot see why they are not entitled to attend and do all things at such meeting, except vote, in respect of the financial affairs of the company or the management. Thus art. 118, as amended, for example, seems to assume their presence, if one permanent director is also present, under art. 111, to authorise the affixing of the seal to an instrument.

Article 86A, which I have postponed for consideration, further provides that Peter, John, and Percy Shaw, as directors, shall have no right to deal with, on behalf of the company, any of the debts due from them mentioned in certain terms of settlement, but this does not apply, as I have said, to John Bryan Shaw or to James Fern. I think that these two directors, at any rate, by consultation, exhortation or opposition, were entitled to endeavour to influence the minds of the permanent directors although they themselves had no franchise.

But next, it may be said that their exclusion from the management of the company's financial affairs and business enabled the permanent directors as part of their management, outside altogether of a directors' meeting, irrespective of voting, to authorise these proceedings. I cannot agree. In fact, in this case, the decision was taken by voting with a division of opinion at what appears to have been regarded by those present as a directors' meeting. Mr. Halliday calls it a meeting of the permanent directors and the learned judge seems to regard it as a purported directors' meeting. In any event, art. 95, subject to its consequential alterations, is still extant, and that article distinguishes between the business of the company which is to be managed by directors and the exercise of powers and doing of acts on behalf of the company by them.

In art. 87 of the amended articles, a distinction is drawn between management of the business and control over the financial affairs, and the proper way to regard such a power as the power to authorise actions on behalf of the company is, I think, to hold that such powers can only be exercised by the directors as such at a proper meeting. In John Morley Building Co., Ltd. v. Barras (10) I read the judgment of Stirling, J., to indicate that the directors as such are the proper persons to authorise proceedings in the name of the company; for a motion having been instituted in that case on the ground that an action in the name of a company had been instituted without the authority of the applicants, he said ([1891] 2 Ch. at p. 391):

> "The real applicants are, no doubt, the defendants, and I have to decide whether they have been appointed directors of the company."

For these reasons, I think that this first ground succeeds and that this action was improperly started for want of authority of the directors.

But, secondly, if the action was competent to the permanent directors to authorise, it is said that their powers were limited by art. 121A, which provides that

> "all dividends payable on ordinary shares held by Peter Shaw, John Shaw, and Percy Shaw [the first two being the defendants] shall be retained by the company on account of the debts mentioned in the said terms of settlement until such debts are liquidated," and, "except as above provided, the said debts shall not be called in . . . for a period of twenty years from the date of the resolution except in the event of a creditors' winding-up."

In my view, if the present action were one for calling in the debts which has been brought within twenty years of the passing of the resolution amending the articles, it is one of the matters which might arguably be excluded from the powers of the directors under art. 95 and under the amending arts. 86A and 87, but if the present action on the account stated is not a calling-in of the debts, this argument does not avail. In form it is certainly not such an action, and if the respondents' case is well founded it is an action on an account stated, which is a separate cause of action: (2 Williams' Saunders, 122; Irving v. Veitch (11)). The appellants, on this head, are in a dilemma, for if the action is well founded on an account stated it is not a mere calling-in of the debts, and art. 121A would not limit the powers of the permanent directors, if otherwise they have them, to bring the action. If, on the other hand, the action does not succeed on the account stated, the point does not arise. I think, therefore, that this ground of objection to the action fails.

As to the third ground of want of authority, that the shareholders instructed the directors to discontinue the action on April 30, 1934; if the permanent directors had power under the articles to bring the action, I do not see how the shareholders could interfere with that power, otherwise than by altering the articles, which they have not proposed to do. This would seem to be the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in Quin and Axtens v. Salmon, Ltd. (3), though the decision of Neville, J., in Marshall's Valve Gear Co., Ltd. v. Manning, Wardle & Co. (12) is difficult to reconcile with that case. However, I do not think it necessary in the present circumstances to decide the point finally, but I incline to the view that art. 95 in matters within the powers of the permanent directors would require an alteration of the regulations by special resolution to prevent this action continuing; that is to say, that Lord Loreburn's dictum in Quin and Axten's Case (3) is correct, that the words "regulation" and "article" in the articles in that case, which were substantially similar to the present art. 95, mean the same thing (see also Thomas Logan, Ltd. v. Davis (13)).

To summarise, therefore, on this head, I think that the defendants are right on their first ground that the permanent directors, in that they failed to summon to their meeting the ordinary directors, were incompetent to pass the vote to authorise proceedings in this case, and so find it unnecessary to conclude finally on the second or third propositions.

My view thus being that the action is misconceived because the directors have not authorised its institution, counsel for the company argues, in reply, that, even if this be right, this court has no power "to strike out and discharge the action," because the defendants failed properly to proceed by motion to ask for this relief and relied upon their pleading in defence in this case and the argument before the judge, which is not the right way to raise the matter. His difficulty in this contention is not rendered easier by the fact that the learned judge has, on the invitation of both sides, considered this aspect of the case in his judgment, has dealt with it, and decided in the respondents' favour, holding that the action was authorised.

The various dicta in the authorities as to the methods open to a defendant to contest the authority to bring an action are not altogether easy to reconcile or understand, but having come to a conclusion in this case on the matter I think it right to express it. There is no doubt that the case of Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. (1) is authority, if one be needed, that an action can be struck out if it be brought in the name of a company which is incompetent to authorise its agents to give a retainer. The majority of the House in that case did not decide that the respondent company was incapable of suing, though that was the view of LORD HALSBURY, but that the action was commenced without authority and that the directors were incapable of acting, being, all but one, enemy aliens, and that they could not, therefore, properly authorise their secretary to bring the action. But also it has been decided in the case of a non-extant company that an action could not be defended: (Simmons v. Liberal Opinion, Ltd. (14)). But here it is argued that a different position exists, that the company is admittedly incompetent, and that at most it may be said that authority, though it might have been given, in fact was given by the directors to sue, was not given on this matter. Counsel for the company relies upon the judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Mulhouse (2) ([1923] 2 K.B. at p. 672)—approved in the House of Lords ([1923] A.C. at p. 148), per LORD ATKINSON—adopting and approving the words of WARRINGTON, J., in Richmond v. Branson & Son (15) ([1914] 1 Ch. at p. 974) to the effect that > "the real question is the authority of the solicitor. Is that a question which can be raised as a relevant issue in the action and at the trial? . . . The business of this court could not be carried on if one were not entitled to assume the authority of the solicitor unless and until that authority has been disputed and shown not to exist in the proper form of proceeding, namely, a substantive application on the part of the parties concerned to stay the proceedings on the ground of want of authority."

The italics are my own. ATKIN, L.J., continued in the Russian Bank Case (2) ([1923] 2 K.B. at p. 672):

> "The Daimler Case (1) does not appear to be inconsistent with this view. That was a case where no retainer could be given at all, and in such a case the court may very well refuse to hear the action on being informed of the facts."

In my view, the reasons for the conclusion of the House of Lords and of ATKIN, L.J., in the Russian Bank Case (2) and of WARRINGTON, J., in Richmond v. Branson (15) were that in those cases questions of fact on which it needed to be decided whether there was or was not authority had to be considered, and the court declined to go into such matters of evidence except upon a substantive motion. But the rights of the court in its inherent jurisdiction to stay actions which would be an abuse of its process if they are not properly upon the record, either because the plaintiff was not existent at the time of the issue of the writ or because they are satisfied on the facts that he had not authorised the proceedings, has so far been undoubted, and this, altogether apart from the desire of either party, if the facts are before the court. Where the court may properly come to a conclusion on sufficient or admitted evidence that there is no action properly before it, it may well think it right to act in accordance with that inherent jurisdiction, to refuse to proceed, and the difference which has been sought to be found between the case where no retainer could be given at all, and the case where what is still in dispute is whether in fact there was or was not authority to give one, is not a difference in principle, but a difference of expediency, depending upon whether a court is or is not so informed of the facts that it does or does not think it right to come to a conclusion on the matter as a question of law.

In the present case, as I have said, the facts which have been found by the learned judge are before the court; they show, to my mind, a complete absence of authority of the company to sue in this action. In other words, I have come to the conclusion that the company is not before the court at all, and that, therefore, for this reason, the appeal succeeds and the action must be struck out; but as there is no one who is before the court who can be made liable for costs, the defendants, if they desire costs, must pursue such other remedies in other proceedings on this head as they may think advisable.

In these circumstances, I have not thought fit to deal with the merits of the case; but in case this action should go further, I would say that if I am wrong in my view as to the incapacity of the company to sue, I agree with the views of the Lords Justices that the action on the account stated must fail for the reasons by them given.

In my view, this appeal should succeed without costs, here or below, but, as this is not the opinion of the majority of the court, judgment will be as they decide.

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be allowed. As to the substance of the matter, that is to say, whether assuming the action to be properly brought the plaintiff company is entitled to succeed, I agree with the conclusion arrived at by the Lords Justices who have given judgment. There was, in my opinion, no such account stated between the parties as was alleged and relied upon by the plaintiff company. I have nothing to add to the reasons assigned by Greer, L.J., for this conclusion.

As to the preliminary question whether the plaintiff company was properly before the court, that is to say, whether the action was instituted and carried on with its authority, I have arrived at the same result as Greer, L.J., but for different reasons, which I propose briefly to state.

I agree with both the Lords Justices as to the result of the decided cases, and particularly of the Daimler Case (1) and of the Russian Commercial Bank Case (2). The principles to be derived from them are that such an objection to a right to sue as is here taken should be taken, not at the trial, but by an interlocutory motion or summons; that, if such procedure is not adopted, the court need not, and ordinarily should not, entertain such an objection at the trial as if it were a defence. If it were otherwise, then, for reasons pointed out by Warrington, J., in Richmond v. Branson & Son (15), the position of the court would be wellnigh intolerable. Nevertheless, as appears from the decision in the Daimler Case (1), if want of capacity or authority to sue plainly appears at any stage the court may then strike out the action. It was argued for the company that the application of the latter principle was limited to objections on the issue of want of capacity to sue and did not extend to objections to want of authority to sue. I see no reason for such limitation of the powers of the court, and in my opinion the argument is not well founded. When it clearly appears that there is want of authority to sue, for example, if an admission in that sense were made in the course of the hearing, the same result, in my opinion, ought to follow and the action in question ought to be struck out. In the present case the defendants did not proceed by motion or summons, but pleaded the matter in their defences, and the learned judge, apparently without objection from the plaintiffs, adjudicated upon the matter at the trial and reached an affirmative conclusion adverse to the defendants, as has Greer, L.J., upon the hearing of the appeals. Speaking for myself, I do not find materials for reaching such an affirmative conclusion, and before feeling myself able to adhere either to the opinion of the trial judge and Greer, L.J., or to the contrary opinion of Slesser, L.J., I should require more information as to several facts which, as it seems to me, might make all the difference in the decision of a point where the balance rests so even.

The case was left at the trial singularly bare of such evidence, and the minute books do not seem to have been produced. I will mention in support of my view only one matter. The court does not know whether, before the meeting at which these actions were decided upon, the permanent directors had conferred any, and, if so, what, powers upon the ordinary directors, nor does it know whether the meeting purported to be a meeting of directors and appeared as such in the minute book, or whether it was in form, as well as in fact, a meeting of permanent directors on a matter within a class of matters previously excluded by them from the purview of the ordinary directors. It appears to me that such information and other similar information has or may have a bearing on the right of the ordinary directors to be summoned to attend the meeting. The result of this reasoning is that by a different road I reach the same result as GREER, L.J., and it follows that, with great respect to SLESSER, L.J., I am unable to concur in his affirmative conclusion in favour of the defendants upon this point. In short, in my opinion, this is a case where, apart from the nicety of the matters of law and constructions involved, the court has not, with regard to matters of fact, the information necessary for a decision whether effect should be given to this objection of the defendants to the competence of the actions. The onus was upon the defendants and they have failed to satisfy me clearly or at all that the objection is a good one.

Accordingly, I agree with GREER, L.J., as to the form of order he proposes.

Appeal allowed.

Weights and Measures—Food—Prepacked article—Deficiency in weight—Material time—Deficiency at time of inspection—Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926 (16 & 17 Geo. 5, c. 63), s. 4 (2) (a).

By the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, s. 4 (2): "A person shall not sell or have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article of food of any of the kinds set forth in Sched. I to this Act, unless—(a) the article is made up for sale in quantities of two ounces, or in multiples of two ounces up to a limit of eight ounces, in multiples of a quarter of a pound up to a limit of two pounds, in multiples of half a pound up to a limit of four pounds, or in multiples of one pound. . . ."

The meaning of the above subsection is that a person shall not have in his possession for sale a pre-packed article of food unless the article at the time of inspection is in a condition of being made up for sale in the proper quantity. An offence, therefore, is committed if a deficiency in weight exists at that time, although no such deficiency may have existed at the time when the article was put in its package.

Notes. As to provisions regarding weight applied to the sale of food, see 33 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 665 et. seq., and for cases, see 44 DIGEST 143 et seq. For Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, see 26 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1292.

Case Stated by justices for the county of London.

An information was preferred before a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Catford by an inspector of weights and measures authorised and appointed by the appellants, the London County Council, against the respondents, Royal Arsenal Co-operative Society, Ltd, charging them that on March 22, 1935, at 50, Rushey-green, Catford, they had in their possession for sale pre-packed articles of food, namely, 113 packages of butter, the said butter not being made up in the quantities prescribed by s. 4 (2) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926.

On the hearing of the information it was proved or admitted that the inspector entered the respondents' shop at 50, Rushey-green on March 22, 1935. Behind the provision counter there were a number of boxes of pre-packed butter, one of which contained seventy-seven packages of fresh butter, each package being marked "½ lb. net." The inspector weighed each package in that box, and each was deficient in weight by from seven to two drams. The total deficiency on the seventy-seven packages was 21 oz., 14 drams, an average of 4·3 drams per package, being 3·3 per cent. of the marked weight. The inspector also weighed five other boxes containing salt butter, marked "½ lb. net," which turned out to have an average deficiency of 2·1 per cent. of the marked weight. The manager of the shop alleged that all the packages had been weighed on March 18 by the staff at the shop. The inspector tested the respondents' scales and found them in order.

The respondents contended that it was not proved that the packages of butter were made up for sale in quantities other than those prescribed by s. 4 (2) of the Act, and that the alleged deficiencies in weight on March 22 were not evidence of an offence committed when the goods were packed. The appellants contended that the respondents had been proved to have in their possession for sale pre-packed articles of food which were made up for sale in quantities not in accordance with the requirements of s. 4 (2) (a), and that that subsection was applicable to cases where a person had in his possession a pre-packed article of food which was deficient in weight.

The justices held that s. 4 (2), did not deal with the question of deficiencies of weight, but only prescribed the units in which pre-packed articles were to be made up for sale and that the words "made up for sale" referred to the act of putting the article in its package ready for sale and to the time when that was performed. The prosecution, the justices found, had not proved that the butter was not made up for sale in the prescribed quantities, as the fact that some of the packages were deficient at the time of inspection was not sufficient evidence that they had not been made up for sale in those quantities. The justices were of opinion that a deficiency in weight would be a separate offence either under s. 4 (2) (b), or under s. 3 of the Act of 1926. They, accordingly, dismissed the information.

The London County Council appealed to the Divisional Court.

The Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, provides:

> Section 4 (2): "A person shall not sell or have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article of food of any of the kinds set forth in Sched. I to this Act [which included butter], unless—(a) the article is made up for sale in quantities of two ounces, or in multiples of two ounces up to a limit of eight ounces, in multiples of a quarter of a pound up to a limit of two pounds, in multiples of half a pound up to a limit of four pounds, or in multiples of one pound; and (b) the wrapper or container bears thereon, or on a label securely attached thereto, a true statement in plain characters of the minimum net weight of the article contained therein, or, in any case where the weight of the wrapper or container is permitted by [s. 4 (1)] to be included in the weight purported to be sold, of the minimum weight of the article with its wrapper or container: Provided that, in the case where the article is made up for sale on the premises where it is sold or kept for sale by a retailer and > is made up in quantities of two ounces, four ounces, eight ounces, one pound, or a multiple of one pound, it shall not be necessary that such a statement as aforesaid should be borne on or attached to the wrapper or container." (3) "Any such statement as aforesaid shall not be deemed to be untrue if it is shown that it was true at the time of packing or of importation, whichever was the later, and the original wrapper or container has remained intact."

> Section 12 (3): "In any proceedings under this Act in respect of an alleged deficiency in the weight of any article of food delivered to a purchaser, the defendant shall be discharged from the prosecution if he proves to the satisfaction of the court that the alleged deficiency was due to unavoidable evaporation or drainage and that due care and precaution had been taken to avoid such deficiency."

LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a Case stated by justices of the peace for the county of London, sitting at Catford. It concerns an information preferred by an inspector of weights and measures of the London County Council under the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, against the respondents for that they, on March 22, 1935, at premises in Catford, unlawfully had in their possession for sale pre-packed articles of food, namely, 113 packages of butter, the said butter not being made up in the quantities prescribed by s. 4 (2) of the Act. The justices dismissed the information, and the question which is raised by this Special Case is whether, in so deciding, they came to a correct determination in point of law.

On March 22, 1935, the county council's inspector went into the respondents' shop and found that there were there, behind the provision counter, a number of boxes of pre-packed butter. One of those boxes contained seventy-seven packages of fresh butter and each of those packages was marked "$\frac{1}{2}$ lb. net." The inspector weighed every package in the box and every one of them was deficient as regards the marked weight to an amount ranging from 7 drams to 2 drams. The total deficiency on the seventy-seven packages was over 20 oz. There were also at that time five other boxes containing packages of salt butter, each of which was marked "$\frac{1}{2}$ lb. net." From each of three of those boxes the inspector weighed twelve packages and every one of those was found to be deficient, so far as the marked weight was concerned, to an amount ranging from $4\frac{1}{2}$ drams to 1 dram. The total deficiency on these thirty-six packages was over 6 oz. The manager of the shop said that all the packages had been weighed on March 18, that is to say, four days before, by the staff of the respondents at that particular shop. The inspector tested the respondents' scales and found that they were in order.

Apparently the sole contention which was put forward on behalf of the respondents was that it was not proved that the packages of butter were made up for sale in quantities other than quantities prescribed by the section, and that the deficiencies in weight were not evidence of any offence. That contention means that it was not proved that, at the time when the packages were being made up, they were made up in the wrong quantity. For the appellants it was contended that the respondents were found to have had in their possession a pre-packed article of food made up for sale in quantities not in accordance with the section, and that the section was applicable to cases where a person had in his possession a pre-packed article of food deficient in weight.

The justices, in expressing their opinion, have gone beyond the contention that was raised. They say:

> "We were of opinion that s. 4 (2) (a) of the Act (a breach of the terms of which clause was alleged in the information) does not deal with the subject of deficiency of weight, but only prescribes the units in which (inter alia) pre-packed butter is to be made up for sale; that the expression 'made up for sale' used in that clause refers to the act of putting the article in its package ready for sale, and to the time when that act was performed; that the prosecution had not proved that the butter was not made up for sale in those quantities, as the fact that some of the packages were deficient of those quantities at the time of inspection by the informant was not sufficient evidence that they had not been made up for sale in those quantities; and that deficiency of weight is a separate offence under s. 4 (2) (b), or under s. 3 of the Act, and was not charged in the information." A

In my opinion, with all due respect to these justices and to the long and elaborate argument which we have had the advantage of hearing from counsel for the respondents, their conclusion was entirely wrong. It is too late now to reconsider the scheme and system of this Act, or to call attention to some apparent contradictions or omissions B exhibited or suggested by s. 12 of the Act, which has been inserted for the purpose of protecting traders. This court has to construe the Act as it is. We cannot, if we would, make another, and it seems to me that, upon the plain words of this section, the offence charged in this information was committed and the view which found favour with the justices was erroneous.

In my opinion, it is nothing to the purpose to say, with regard to a penal statute C that it may in some circumstances expose an offender to two different kinds of prosecution, nor is it to the purpose to point out that in some circumstances the Act of Parliament has afforded a protection which, in other circumstances, it has refrained from affording. No Act of Parliament is perfect, and it may be that this Act of Parliament has not gone to the last possible length in providing protection for the trader. That is not the slightest reason why this court should, even if it could, extend that length and D afford further protection.

Here the information was laid under s. 4 (2) of the statute. That section provides, inter alia, that a person shall not have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article of food of any of the kinds set forth in the schedule, unless—and then two conditions follow. What is meant by the expression "shall not . . . have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article of food" unless it fulfils these conditions? This Act, although it E contains s. 12, the marginal note of which is "Safeguards to traders," is an Act, as its title says, and as its provisions confirm, "to provide for the better protection of the public in relation to the sale of food." It is not content to deal with the offence of selling short weight or misrepresenting the weight, or other matters in connection with the sale. It contains also precautionary provisions, and one of them is to be found in s. 4 (2): "A person shall not . . . have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article of food" F unless, &c. In this Act, which is entitled the Weights and Measures Act, 1926, what is being dealt with is an ordinary sale, and in the ordinary course, except for the sake of convenience, the particular commodity might be required to be weighed then and there in the presence of the purchaser, but, for the convenience of persons carrying on retail business, shopkeepers may have in their possession articles which are not then and there to be wrapped up and after that be weighed, but which are pre-packed, it being supposed G that they have been weighed beforehand. Shopkeepers are not to be protected against the offence of giving short weight by the mere fact that the articles were pre-packed, made up beforehand. The section provides that a person shall not have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article unless the article is made up for sale in quantities which are named—2 oz., in multiples of 2 oz. up to a limit of 8 oz., in ½ lbs. up to a limit of 2 lb., in ½ lbs. up to a limit of 4 lb., or in multiples of 1 lb. H

What does "made up" mean? It seems to me, with all due respect to the argument we have heard, that it would be fantastic to hold that what is there being referred to is the moment of making up. The person who is being protected is the buyer. Of what use is it to a man, who gets 3 oz. short, to be assured that at the moment when the article was weighed in the packing warehouse of the wholesale dealer it was entirely correct? In my opinion, the clear meaning of the words "shall not . . . have in his possession for I sale any pre-packed article. . . unless the article is made up for sale in quantities of 2 oz.," &c., reinforced by the obvious purpose of the Act, is that the article is to be tested at the moment of its being in the seller's possession, and if a man is charged with having an article in his possession made up apparently in these quantities when it is not accurately made up in these quantities, the offence is committed. It is quite true that two conditions are provided. The pre-packed article is not to be in his possession for sale unless it fulfils each of two conditions. Those conditions are not disjunctive. The word which unites them is "and." An article is to be made up in what may be called the prescribed quantity and the wrapper or container of the pre-packed article must bear a true statement in plain characters of the net weight. The section is, therefore, providing (i) that the article must be of the prescribed weight, and (ii) that it must contain a true statement of that weight, and then follows a proviso which has reference to the small shopkeeper or retailer who makes up the article for sale upon the premises. The Act is intelligible, though perhaps hard to explain, but we have to construe it as it is. Then follows, in sub-s. (3) a provision that the statement upon the wrapper or container shall not be deemed to be untrue if it is shown to have been true at the time of packing or of importation, whichever was the later, and the original wrapper or container has remained intact.

The argument has been presented to us as a case of reductio ad absurdum. It is said, here are two conditions required to be fulfilled, but with regard to the second requirement, namely, the truth of the statement, the seller is protected in a particular case if the statement was true at the time of packing or of importation, and it seems illogical that protection under the second limb should be given if liability still remains under the first limb. I have tried hard to see what is illogical in that state of affairs, and I entirely fail to do so. The requirement that the pre-packed article shall be of the regular or prescribed weight remains. As far as the statement of the minimum net weight is concerned, that additional requirement is foregone in a particular case, subject to certain proof. I cannot understand the argument that, because relief is given in certain circumstances with regard to the second condition, relief therefore should be given with regard to the first condition. It is to be observed that if the statement were not protected, as it is by s. 4 (3), the making of an untrue statement would be a separate offence under s. 2 and s. 3.

It seems to me that the plain meaning of s. 4 (2) is that a person is not to have in his possession for sale a pre-packed article of food unless the article then and there is in a condition of being made up for sale in the proper quantity. He has it in his possession pre-packed and made up in a certain way, and if he has it in his possession when it does not satisfy the requirement as to prescribed weight, he has committed an offence.
